limitations are good. It is very clear that if it were a limitation of personal estate or by way of executory devise it would offend against the rule against perpetuities, because Emma Frost was unmarried at the date of this will. She might have married after the death of the testator a person who was not born in the testator's lifetime, and it might, therefore, have been a limitation to Emma Frost for life, remainder to a person unborn for his life, with a contingent remainder to the children of Emma Frost living at the death of that unborn person, or such of them as should be then dead leaving issue then living, with an alternative limitation to other persons still to be living at the death of that unborn person, or to have left issue then living. That clearly would offend against the rule against perpetuities, because it would tie up the estate not merely during the life of Emma Frost, who was in existence at the death of the testator, but during the life of Emma Frost's husband, who might possibly not be in existence at the death of the testator. But it is said:—"This is not an executory devise, but simply a legal limitation by way of contingent remainder, and therefore the rule as to perpetuities does not apply to the case at all." Be it so. No doubt contingent remainders were invented long before the rule against perpetuities, and they were not originally subject to any such rule. But they were subject, before this rule was invented, to another rule, which was thus expressed in the old legal language, that you could not limit a possibility upon a possibility, and the familiar illustration is that you could not limit by way of legal devise or conveyance a gift to A., an existing person, for life, with remainder to his unborn son for life, with remainder to any child of such unborn son. That last remainder was void because, according to the phrase used by the old lawyers, it was a possibility upon a possibility. Now I think there is no question that this is the law to this day, although the reason for it has been contested by modern lawyers (see Williams on Real Property, 13th ed., pp. 276, 277). I lately had to consider this point in Whitby v. Mitchell, and I decided that the rule still exists. [His lordship then read the passage in Butler's Note to Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 10th ed., p. 565, beginning, "No question of perpetuity could arise," and ending, "confer an estate by purchase on that person's issue," and continued:—]. This note recognizes that the rule exists, and has as much force in the present day as when it was originally invented. What was the reason of that rule? As expressed by the lawyers of that day, it was on the ground of a possibility upon a possibility. What was meant by a possibility upon a possibility was that there might never be such a person as an unborn person who was to take for life—that was an obvious contingency, but besides that there was another contingency—there might never be issue of that person. Therefore, there was a double contingency or a double possibility. I quite agree that the contingency in this case is not of that kind precisely; but the mischief is the same. There is the double possibility. A husband of Emma Frost unborn at the death of the testator might never exist. Even if there were such a husband, the other contingency which is to take effect upon his death might never happen. I think that this limitation would have been held by the old lawyers to fall within the doctrine of a double possibility, and would most probably have been held void. But if it is not void upon that ground, it is certainly void as a perpetuity, if the rule against perpetuities applies to the case. Does the rule against perpetuities apply to the present case? Lord St. Leonards, in Cole v. Sewell, used language which has been read as meaning that the doctrine of remoteness never could apply to a contingent remainder; and the same language, or something like it, is also used in what I have read from Butler's note. But in every one of these cases the language refers simply to the case of an estate for life or an estate tail limited to a person in esse when the limitation takes effect. If this is so, it is quite clear that no contingent remainder to take effect upon the determination of that estate could be exposed to any objection on the ground of being too remote. But none of that language contemplates the case of there being interposed a possible estate for life to a person not in existence, and a contingent remainder over on the death of that person. However, I do not at all agree that, under the law of to-day, there cannot be any application of the rule against perpetuities to remainders. The law is stated in Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 10th ed., at p. 502. [His lordship read the passage beginning, "Here, indeed, it may not be improper to remark," and ending, "void in its creation," and continued:—] I take the meaning of that statement to be this. There are limitations which would have been void under the old law, because they would have been treated as possibilities upon possibilities, and the like limitations would now be void, but perhaps from a different reason—viz., because they offend against what is known by our modern law as the rule against perpetuities.

I think, therefore, on the whole, that the balance of authority is that this limitation, although a legal limitation, is void, because it offends against the rule against perpetuities.

There will be a declaration accordingly, and that the lands in question fall into the residue.

In re Harrison.

Townson v. Harrison. (a.)

Administration—Covenant by testator to pay annuity—Personal estate insufficient—Adjustment of accounts between tenant for life of real estate and remaindermen.

A testator devised all his real estate (except two specified estates) to trustees upon trust for his son for life, with remainder in strict settlement. And he devised the two specified estates upon trusts in favour of his two daughters respectively for life, with remainders to their respective issue. By a deed executed on the marriage of his son, the testator covenanted to pay an annuity to the son or his wife during their joint lives. The testator's personal estate proved to be insufficient to provide for the payment of the annuity.

Held, that the three real estates ought to contribute rateably towards payment of the annuity, and that each tenant for life would have a charge upon the corpus of the estate in respect of the proportion of the annuity paid by him or her, but he or she would have to keep down the interest on the amount so charged.

Adjourned summons.

Isaac Harrison, by his will, dated the 3rd of July, 1871, after appointing the plaintiff and two other persons trustees and executors of his will, and bequeathing some pecuniary legacies and annuities (which he charged on his real estate), devised all his real estate (except his estates at Gaddesby and the Gilroes) unto and to the use of his trustees in fee, upon the trusts thereinafter declared—viz., upon trust out of the rents and profits of the said real estate to pay the several annuities thereinbefore charged thereon, and then upon trust to pay certain yearly sums thereinafter specified for the benefit of his son, Isaac Henry Harrison, and subject thereto his said hereditaments were to be held in trust for his said son during his life, with remainder in trust for his first and other sons successively in tail male, with divers remainders over. And the testator devised all his real estate at Gaddesby unto and to the use of his trustees in fee in trust for his daughter Beatrice Mary during her life, with remainder in trust for her first and other daughters successively in tail male, with remainders over. And the testator devised all his lands known as the Gilroes Estate unto and to the use of his said trustees in fee in trust for his daughter Catherine Maria during her life, with remainder in trust for her first and other sons successively in tail male, with divers remainders over. And the testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to his trustees upon trust for his son and his two daughters.

By a deed of covenant dated the 20th of November, 1882 (executed shortly before the marriage of the testator's son, Isaac Henry Harrison, with Mary Marfitt), the testator, in consideration of the then intended marriage, covenanted with the son, his executors and administrators, that, if the intended marriage should take place, he (the testator) would, during the joint lives of his son and Mary Marfitt, or until the son should become bankrupt, &c., pay unto such of them, his son or the said Mary Marfitt, as the testator should think fit, the annual sum of £700 at the times and in the manner therein mentioned. The deed also contained a covenant by the testator with his son to pay him an annuity of £700 during his life or until he should become bankrupt, &c., if he survived Mary Marfitt and there should be any issue of the intended marriage, and also a covenant to pay Mary Marfitt an annuity of £500 during her widowhood, if she survived the son and there should be issue of the intended marriage. The annuities were to be substitutional, not cumulative.

The testator died on the 6th of June, 1887, and his will was proved by the plaintiff alone, the other trustees and executors having renounced probate of the said will and disclaimed the trusts thereof.

This was an originating summons taken out by the sole acting executor and trustee as plaintiff, against Isaac Henry Harrison and Maria Harrison, his wife, Isaac Frank Odams Harrison, an infant, their eldest son, and the testator's two daughters, Beatrice Mary Harrison and Catherine Maria Harrison, as defendants, to have the following (among other) questions determined by the court—viz.:

Whether the several annuities respectively covenanted to be paid by the testator by the deed of the 20th of November, 1882, to Isaac Henry Harrison and Mary Harrison respectively ought to be valued, and upon what principle, and how?

How and in what manner the amounts at which the annuities shall be valued respectively, ought to be raised, and out of what part or parts of the testator's estate, and in what proportions, and how?

Nothing had been paid on account of the annuity of £700 since the testator's death. The last payment was made on the 20th of May, 1887.

There was evidence that after providing for the payment of the testator's debts and other liabilities there would be left in the hands of the plaintiff personal estate amounting only to £1,500 available for satisfying the claim of the annuitants.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiff.—The annuity ought to be paid out of the income of the estate, and the tenant for life would then be entitled to a charge upon the corpus of the estate, and liberty should be given to apply to the court after the lapse of a reasonable time to have it ascertained how the payments should be apportioned between the corpus of the estate and the income: In re Muffett, Jones v. Mason, 37 W. R. 9, 39 Ch. D. 534; Yates v. Yates, 28 Beav. 637, 9 W. R. Ch. D. 111; Allhusen v. Whittell, L. R. 4 Eq. 295, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 122; Cranley v. Dixon, 23 Beav., p. 517, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 123.

Everitt, Q.C., and Ingle Joyce, for the son and his wife.—The value of the annuities as at the time of the testator's death should be capitalized and charged on the corpus of the estate with interest at four per cent. in respect of each payment that is made: In re Muffett, Jones v. Mason; Allhusen v. Whittell; Yates v. Yates.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and Woodroffe, for Beatrice Harrison.—The question is, What ought to be the charge on the corpus when the tenant for life pays the annuity? He ought only to lose the interest upon the capital sum charged.

B. B. Swan, for Catherine Harrison.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

North, J.—I think the proper course to adopt is this. The tenant for life is tenant for life of the estate, and as such is entitled to the whole income of it; he is not merely tenant for life of the residue after payment of the testator's debts. But there are certain contingent debts of the testator created by deed in his lifetime in the shape of annuities which may become payable. One or two years' payments of these annuities have already become payable, and as some of the annuitants are still alive other payments will probably have to be made. Each of these annuities is a debt of the testator, and ought to be paid out of his personal estate in the first place; his personal estate, however, is insufficient, consequently the three real estates devised by the testator must contribute towards payment of these annuities according to their respective values, since there is nothing to throw the burden on one estate more than on the other. That, of course, does not bind the annuitant; his claim is to be paid out of the testator's real estate, not out of any particular part of it. Nor is his claim upon capital or income, he has a right to be paid out of the estate. Probably the capital is the thing to which he would have to resort if he took legal proceedings to enforce his claim, because, though he might possibly ask for a receiver of the rents, he would not be likely to get one appointed against the tenant for life unless he also undertook to take steps to raise his annuity out of capital. But his legal claim is against the whole estate not distinguishing between capital and income.

In what proportions, then, are the persons who are interested in the estate as tenants for life and remaindermen respectively to pay? The principle to be applied will be the same quâ each tenant for life as if there were only one tenant for life of the whole estate, and it will be more simple to state it with reference to such a case. The tenant for life is entitled to the income of the estate for his life, and so long as there is nothing to intercept it I think it ought to be paid to him. But at the end of a year a payment of the annuity will become due. It will become payable to the annuitant out of the estate. If the rights of the parties were worked out strictly it might be necessary to sell a sufficient portion of the estate to raise £700, leaving the estate diminished by the amount so sold, and the tenant for life in receipt for the future merely of the income of that diminished estate. The same thing, as a matter of principle, would have to be done at the end of each year so long as the annuitant lived. I do not, however, think the tenant for life would be entitled to have the estate sold bit by bit in that way. But I do think that if any part of his income is applied in payment of the annuity, he would be entitled to stand in the shoes of the person whom he paid as against the estate, and to have a charge upon the estate in respect of the sums so paid. Therefore, for the first year after the testator's death (assuming for convenience that the annuity is, under the deed, payable at the end of each year), the tenant for life would receive the whole income of the estate (I assume that all the testator's other debts and liabilities have been provided for out of his personal estate); at the end of that year £700 would have to be found, for paying the annuitant, and the tenant for life would pay it, and he would then be entitled to stand in the place of the annuitant. He would have a charge upon the estate in respect of the sum which he had thus paid. As tenant for life he would still be entitled to receive the whole income of the estate, but he would have to pay out of such income to himself as incumbrancer interest upon the sum which he had thus provided. In other words, he would pay the £700, which would then become a charge upon the estate, but during his life he would have to keep down the interest on it. At the end of the second year the same thing would be done again, and the charge of £700 would become a charge of £1,400. The tenant for life would have a charge for £1,400, and at the end of the next year he would have paid two years' interest on half of it, and one year's interest on the other half, and so on, so long as the annuity lasted. That seems to me to be the principle on which the thing should be worked out. The decision in Allhusen v. Whittell does not furnish me with much assistance in this present case, for it was based on the principle that the tenant for life of residue is not tenant for life of the whole estate, but of the whole estate minus something, and that something must be ascertained before it can be said of what he is tenant for life. He is not tenant of the whole estate, and he is not entitled to receive the whole income; and the rule in Allhusen v. Whittell was adopted as a convenient and fair rule for ascertaining the share of the estate which really represented residue, and of which the tenant for life was entitled to receive income, as distinguished from the entire estate. That rule, in my opinion, does not apply to the present case.

In re Jodrell. Jodrell v. Seale. (a.)

Will—Construction—"Relatives hereinbefore named"—"Vested transmissible interest."

A testator gave the residue of his estate amongst such of his relatives thereinbefore named who should become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of his property.

Held, that "transmissible" meant "capable of transmission" after death, and that persons having life interests took no part of the residue, and that "relatives hereinbefore named" meant legitimate relatives mentioned nominatim.

Sir R. Jodrell, who died on the 12th of November, 1882, by his will, dated the 28th of March, 1868, after appointing executors, gave certain specific bequests to his wife and to his cousin Richard Jennings and his cousin the Rev. Charles P. P. Jodrell by name.

By clauses 14 and 15 he gave his general real and personal estate to his executors upon trust, after payment of debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, for the benefit of his wife during her life, and after her death for sale and conversion, and out of the proceeds thereof to set apart and pay the legacies specified in the twenty following paragraphs of his will, with a direction to marshal in favour of charities. The testator then gave bequests in favour of (1) "such one or more of the children of my late cousin Major Edward Jodrell, other than his eldest son," as should be living at the testator's wife's death and attain twenty-one; (2) the children of "my cousin the Rev. Henry Jodrell," other than his eldest daughter, who should be living at his wife's death and attain twenty-one; (3) "my cousin Mary Bishop" for life, and then for her children surviving her and the testator's wife and attaining twenty-one; (4) "my said cousin Richard Jennings" and his wife during their lives, and then for their children surviving them and the testator's wife and attaining twenty-one; (5) "my cousin Louisa Buller" for life, and after her death for Charles Seale Hayne if he should survive her and the testator's wife; (6) "my niece Emily Higgins" if she should survive his wife and attain twenty-one; (7) "my two nieces Mary Champagné and Blanche Champagné" if they should respectively survive his wife and attain twenty-one; (8) "my cousin Major George King" for life, and then for his children who should survive him and the testator's wife and attain twenty-one; (9) "my cousin Georgiana Forde" for life, and then for her children who should survive her and his wife and attain twenty-one; (10) "my cousin Emily MacDonell" for life, and then for such of her children as should survive her and his wife and attain twenty-one. There were also bequests for a god-daughter of the testator and for various charities.

The 37th clause was as follows:—"As to all the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate not hereby effectually disposed of, I direct the same to be equally divided among such of my relatives hereinbefore named as, by virtue of the trusts and provisions hereinbefore contained, shall become entitled to a vested transmissible interest in any part of my property, and as to such of them as are females for their separate use respectively and without power of anticipation."

The testator made five codicils to his will. By the first he revoked the legacy in favour of his nieces Mary and Blanche Champagné, and directed that such legacy should fall into residue. By the fifth he gave to Alfred Jodrell, who was the eldest living son of Major Edward Jodrell, £1,000; he then revoked the bequest in favour of his niece Emily Higgins, and directed that it should fall into residue; and by the same codicil (clause 10) he declared that neither of his said three nieces should participate in the division of his residuary estate under clause 37 of his will.

The testator's widow died on the 1st of March, 1888, and the present summons was then taken out for the purpose of determining who was entitled to his residuary estate.

On the 29th of March, 1888, an order was made on the summons directing (inter alia) an inquiry what persons named in the first thirty-six clauses of the will were relations of the testator.

By his certificate the chief clerk found that Charles Seale Hayne was a first cousin once removed of the testator, and that Louisa Buller and Charles P. P. Jodrell both died in the testator's life; and that Major George King, Georgiana Forde, and Emily MacDonell (all of whom were dead) were descended from illegitimate children of the testator's grandmother. The other persons named in the will as cousins were legal cousins.

Dec. 14.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued:—Various questions have been raised as to the meaning of several of the expressions which occur in the 37th clause of the will. The first is as to the meaning of the word "transmissible." I think this means "capable of transmission after death." No clearer illustration of its meaning can be found than the language of Lord Eldon in Nannock v. Horton, 7 Ves., at p. 402, where he speaks of an annuity not being transmissible, but ceasing with the annuitant. It follows that all persons who, under the trusts and provisions of the will, take merely life interests are excluded from participation in the residue. The main question, however, arises as to the meaning of the words "relatives hereinbefore named," and as to this three views have been put forward. The first rests on two elementary rules of construction, that a will is so to be construed as to give effect to each word rather than in a way which will leave some of them inoperative, and that words are to be taken in their strict and accurate meaning unless an intention can be inferred to use them in another. The strict and accurate meaning of the word "relatives" is "legitimate relatives." The strict and accurate meaning of the word "named" is, as stated by Kindersley, V.C., in In re Holmes, "mentioned nominatim, if not by all their names, by some at least, either their christian or their surnames." If the testator used the word "relatives" and "named" with those meanings, it is found that the class of persons who could have taken under clause 37, if the testator had died immediately after the execution of his will, consisted of (at most) five persons — namely, Charles P. P. Jodrell, named in clause 12; Charles Seale Hayne, named in clause 20; Emily Higgins, named in clause 21; and Mary Champagné and Blanche Champagné, named in clause 22. Three of these are females, to whom the directions as to separate use and restraint on anticipation in clause 37 are applicable. Every word in the clause has effect given to it. What is there against this construction? First, it is said, and with some force, that if this was the testator's meaning he has adopted a very circuitous mode of designating these five persons. Secondly, it is pointed out that of these five persons Charles P. P. Jodrell died in 1875, prior to the date of the fifth codicil; that the legacies to the Misses Champagné were revoked by the first codicil, and that to Miss Higgins by the fifth codicil, so that the class of persons to take is reduced to one, namely, Mr. Seale Hayne; yet that the testator in the fifth codicil speaks of the "division" of his residuary estate under the 37th clause, a term which naturally imports participation by several. The weight of this observation appears to me to be diminished by the circumstance that this clause of the fifth codicil is in reality superfluous, and appears to have been inserted ex majori cautelâ; for the only trusts and provision contained in the will under which the Misses Champagné and Miss Higgins took any benefit were those relating to the revoked legacies, and the revocation was sufficient to deprive them of vested transmissible interests in any part of the testator's property, and so to exclude them from participation under clause 37 of the will. The use of the word "division" in clause 10 of the fifth codicil may be attributable to the like caution on the part of the testator. Next, on behalf of the relatives strictly so called of the testator, it is contended that the word "named" is used in the secondary sense of "mentioned" or "referred to." This construction renders the word inoperative, for if this be its true meaning the clause would have precisely the same effect if the words "hereinbefore named" were omitted.

In support of this contention the case of Bromley v. Wright was cited. That was, however, a decision on somewhat different words, and the learned Vice-Chancellor does not appear to me to lay down as a general rule that the words "hereinbefore named" are to be disregarded. Lastly, on behalf of those persons who, though not, strictly speaking, relatives, nevertheless appear to have been recognized by him as such, it was contended that the words "hereinbefore named" pointed in some way or other to some recognition. It is, however, to be observed that the persons who, not being, strictly speaking, relatives of the testator, are themselves recognized as such, do not take vested transmissible interests in the testator's property, and that such interests are given to the children of those persons, so that, in order that this contention may be effectual on behalf of those in whose interest it is put forward, it is necessary to read the words "relatives hereinbefore mentioned" as having some such meaning as follows:—"Persons who, if the statements as to relationship hereinbefore contained were well founded, would be relatives of mine." This construction does give effect to the words "hereinbefore named," but, on the other hand, it seems to me to import into them a very great deal more than the testator has actually expressed. Now the clause in question is one which contains a somewhat unusual disposition of residue. The will bears marks of having been penned, not by the testator himself, but by some legal adviser, and, on the whole, I come to the conclusion that, in construing it, it is best to adhere as closely as may be to the actual language of the testator. I therefore adopt that construction which gives effect to every word in the clause, and attaches to each word its strict and accurate meaning. The result is that, in the events which have happened, Mr. Charles Seale Hayne is entitled to the whole of the residue.

Pawnbroker—Special contract—Sale—Deficit—Right to recover balance of loan—Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 93).

Where a pawnbroker has advanced money to a pawner upon an article pledged under a "special contract," and has sold the article according to the provisions of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, upon the expiry of the period of redemption, the liability of the pawner for the debt is not extinguished (in the absence of any express stipulation in the special contract), and the pawnbroker is entitled to recover the balance if the sale has failed to realize the full amount of the loan.

Appeal from the Liverpool County Court.

The plaintiff was a pawnbroker, and the defendant (by an agent) had pledged a gold watch with him and had received £8 upon it. The pawnticket which was given to the defendant had printed upon the back of it a "special contract" in the form given in the Pawbrokers Act, 1872, 3rd schedule, VII. The watch, not having been redeemed within the year of redemption and days of grace, was sold by auction according to section 19 of the Act. It produced £5 5s. The pawnbroker sued the defendant to recover £2 15s., the balance of the loan, and the county court judge held that he was not entitled to recover, on the ground that the existence of the special contract excluded the pawner's liability for the debt.

The pawnbroker appealed.

Finlay, Q.C. (Bonsey with him), for the appellant.—There is nothing in the special contract to deprive the plaintiff of his common law right to sue to recover the amount of his loan to the defendant. Section 22 of the Act clearly contemplates a liability on the part of the pawner for a deficit on a sale; for a surplus resulting from the sale of another pledge of the same owner may be applied in reducing a previous deficit.

O'Feely.—Where there is a special contract the parties are bound by it alone. All the terms are contained in it, and no common law right outside it can be set up.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am clearly of opinion that the learned county court judge was wrong, and that the appeal must be allowed. This contract is a contract of pledge, and at common law the pledgee is undoubtedly entitled to recover the balance of the amount he has lent if a sale of the property pledged does not suffice to satisfy the whole sum. Is there anything in the Act to prevent the exercise of that common law right? The contract must certainly be read with the Act, but there is nothing in the Act or the schedules to it to exclude the plaintiff's right to recover his debt.

MATHEW, J.—I agree. I will only add that section 22 of the Act, which deals with the application of a surplus on the sale of one pledge to supply the deficiency on the sale of another pledge of the same pawner, is, to my mind, conclusive as to the right of the pawnbroker to recover the amount of the deficit.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF THE COUNTY OF LONDON. Ex parte BUCKLE. (a.)

Licensed house—Reconstruction—Provisional grant of licence—Final order—Renewal of licence—Refusal—Appeal—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 22—Licensing Act, 1820 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 27.

A provisional grant of a licence made under section 22 of the Licensing Act, 1874, may be renewed from year to year in like manner as an ordinary licence, and an appeal to quarter sessions lies from a refusal of the licensing justices to renew such a licence.

Rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up, in order that it might be quashed, an order of quarter sessions reversing the decision of licensing justices, who had refused to renew a provisional grant of a licence in respect of a public-house.

The facts were as follows:—In carrying out some street improvements at Hampstead four public-houses were pulled down, and it was proposed to build one large public-house to take their place. Application was made to the licensing justices and confirming authority, for a provisional grant of a licence for the proposed public-house under section 22 of the Licensing Act, 1874; plans were submitted to and approved by them, and the provisional grant was made. The plans were prepared for a level site, but the site was afterwards found to be on a slope. Application was made to the justices for leave to alter the plans to suit the nature of the ground, but this was refused. The house was then constructed upon the original plans with the alterations rendered necessary by the nature of the ground, and an application was made to the justices at the general licensing meeting for a final order under section 22. This was refused, on the ground that the building was not in accordance with the plans, and an application for a renewal of the provisional grant was also refused. On appeal from this refusal the quarter sessions reversed the decision of the justices and granted a renewal. This rule was then obtained, on the ground that the decision of the licensing justices refusing to make the final order was conclusive, and that no appeal lay from it, and also that a provisional grant under section 22 was incapable of renewal.

Bompas, Q.C., and Woollett, in support of the rule.—The decision of the justices that this house was not built in accordance with the plans is conclusive, and there is no appeal. The applicants were then thrown back on their rights as they existed before the passing of the Act of 1874, and their proper course was to apply for a new licence for the house after it was built. This provisional licence from April to April is wrong in form; it is not an annual licence, and the provisions of the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 27, do not apply; there is no renewal and no appeal.

Poland, Q.C., Forrest Fulton, and R. D. Muir, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Any case which involves the consideration of more Acts of Parliament than one must take time, but I do not for a moment complain of the time which this case has taken; it is a case of importance, and considerable property is involved. We think that there was an appeal to quarter sessions, and that this rule ought to be discharged.

The important section is section 22 of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49. The substance of that provision is that whereas, before it was enacted, there must have been a building in esse before a licence could be granted, and in consequence of the absolute discretion vested in the justices to grant or refuse a licence, much money might have been lost by persons who had invested in new buildings which were intended to be public-houses, under that section, where the architect's plans have been approved, a provisional licence may be granted before the building has been begun. This pledges the faith of the justices that where the site of the proposed public-house is such that if it were an erected house they would grant a licence, if a house be erected there according to plans which they have approved, they will grant a licence to that house subject to the condition that the occupant shall be a proper person to hold it. This gave the persons who were laying out their money a protection which they had not before; they have thus a security that, if only the conditions to which I have alluded are complied with, the magistrates shall grant a licence.

In the present case I do not wish to go through the various steps which were taken, for as the magistrates are not, technically speaking, represented here, I would rather not state the impression which their action has left on my mind.

The first question which arises is whether or not this provisional licence under section 22, like an ordinary licence, runs from year to year and is renewable. If it be so, then the sections of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, as to appeal, apply, and there is an appeal to quarter sessions from an order of justices refusing to renew one of these provisional licences. Secondly, does the time which elapsed prevent an application for renewal? As to the first question, I think that both the words of the Act and the obvious sense of the Act show that that construction is necessary, and I have had no doubt upon the point throughout the argument. The word used in the Act is "shall"—the magistrates "shall" grant the licence subject to the two conditions (adherence to the approved plans and the fitness of the occupant) being fulfilled. Now, if it had been an ordinary licence for a year it is clear, keeping in view section 27 of the Act of George 4, that there would have been an appeal. If the licence is once granted and a vested interest thus created there would be an appeal from a refusal to renew. Then, turning to the Act of 1874, that Act gives to owners of houses not yet erected, who have obtained this provisional grant, vested interests like those of the owners of existing houses.

It was contended that if a vested interest, however large, has been created by the magistrates, it may also be destroyed by them, and that without appeal. That would be very extraordinary, and it is not a correct view. The Legislature, although not favourable to creating vested interests in this trade, is careful to protect those which already exist. We are giving the true meaning of the Legislature in deciding that there is an appeal in the case of vested interests created in this way.

Then it is said that the appeal in this case was too late; that the refusal was acquiesced in, and the provisional licence was gone, and that steps had been taken to turn the provisional licence into an actual one. But it has been decided that in such a case it is not too late to fall back upon the provisional licence. Mr. Bompas said that the whole licence in this case is wrong in form and good for nothing, being made out for a year—April to April—whereas the provisional licence covers the whole period of building, however long. There is no authority for that. If it were to be decided that there is only one termination to a provisional licence—viz., a final order—that would be to say that there would be no appeal, and persons spending these large sums on the faith of the provisional grant would be at the mercy of two justices. I think that a licence of this kind may be granted for whatever term the magistrate thinks fit, and that from a refusal to renew there is an appeal as in the case of other licences. That is enough to settle this question.

As to the right of inhabitants to appear and oppose the renewal I reserve my opinion. As to the facts of the case, it has been impossible for me not to show that, if they were as they appeared during the argument, they produced a very unfavourable impression upon my mind. But my interlocutory remarks are sufficient, and the magistrates are not represented before us.

MATHEW, J.—I agree. Assuming the facts to be as they were allowed to be by counsel, they give me a very unfavourable impression as to the conduct of the magistrates. They did, in the first instance, proceed on the assumption that the plans might be altered, and they would have been wise to adhere to that opinion. In accordance with the plans means in substantial accordance, and if this case comes before the magistrates again I hope they will bear our remarks in mind.

Rule discharged.

PARNELL v. WALTER. (a.)

Practice—Interrogatories—Action of libel against newspaper—Payment into court—Issue as to damages—Discovery of names of informants—Discovery as to extent of circulation of newspaper.

In an action of libel against a newspaper, where the defendant takes upon himself the responsibility of defending the action, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to inquire by interrogatories as to the sources of the defendant's information, even though the only issue in the action is as to the amount of damages, and the object of the interrogatories is to increase the damages by showing gross recklessness on the part of the defendant.

Hennessy v. Wright, 36 W. R. 879, considered and followed.

Where the plaintiff asks how many copies of the paper containing the libel were issued to the public, the defendant cannot decline to give the number on the ground that it is inconvenient or even impossible to do so: he must give the number approximately.

Appeal from an order of a master, referred by Field, J. to the court.

This was an action for libel against one of the proprietors, and the printer and publisher of the Times newspaper. The plaintiff complained of the publication in the defendants' newspaper of four alleged letters, of which it was imputed that the plaintiff was the writer, one of them being published in facsimile, and also of the further publication of the facsimile letter in a pamphlet entitled "Parnellism and Crime."

The defendants, in their defence, pleaded that they brought forty shillings into court, and that that sum was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim; and on that defence issue was joined.

The plaintiff delivered a set of interrogatories for the examination of the defendants. The first two interrogatories asked how many copies of each of the numbers of the Times of three specified dates, and how many copies of the pamphlet, were issued to the public and circulated by sale or otherwise. The defendants answered that the Times newspaper, as was notorious, had a large and general circulation, and the numbers referred to were issued and circulated in the ordinary and usual way, and not otherwise. They declined to state the number of copies either of the newspaper or the pamphlet issued to the public, on the grounds that they did not know the number, and had not the means of ascertaining it without a difficult and troublesome inquiry of persons not connected with the paper and its publication, who were not under any obligation to give them the information, and that the answer would involve a disclosure of the business transactions of the defendant Walter and of other persons, not parties to the action, who were his partners in the publication of the Times, and that the precise number of copies issued to the public was not material or relevant to any matters in question in the action.

The other interrogatories were in substance as follows:—3. From what person or persons did you obtain the originals of each of the four alleged letters? 4. What sum or sums of money did you pay for each of the said four alleged letters, or for all of them? 5. State precisely what inquiries you made of the person or persons from whom the said four alleged letters and each of them were obtained, (a) as to the person or persons to whom the said letters were respectively addressed, or (b) as to the person or persons from whom, or the place in which, or the means by which the person or persons from whom the Times obtained the same had got possession of the said four alleged letters, or any and which of them. 6. State precisely what information, if any, was given to you, and at what date or dates, by the person or persons from whom the said four alleged letters were obtained, as to the above matters. 7. State precisely, with dates, the steps, if any, taken by you to test or verify the information, if any, so given. 8 and 9. State precisely what steps, if any, and whether by the comparison of handwriting or otherwise, and how, were taken by you to ascertain or test the genuineness of the said alleged letters. 10. When did you first learn, and how, that the said four alleged letters, or any and which of them, had been obtained by the person or persons from whom the Times obtained the same from or through Richard Pigott? What inquiries, if any, did you then or subsequently, and when, make, and of whom, and how, as to the antecedents or character or repute of the said Richard Pigott?

The defendants declined to answer interrogatories from 3 to 10 inclusive, on the grounds that they were irrelevant and not material, and that the object of the plaintiff was to discover the evidence they proposed to adduce in support of their case, and that they were unreasonable, unnecessary, and vexatious, and were not put bonâ fide for the purposes of the action, but for the purpose of incriminating third parties who were not parties to the action, and that the matters inquired into related solely to the defendants' case.

On the application of the plaintiff the master made an order that the defendants should make a further and better answer to interrogatories 1 and 2, and should also answer the other interrogatories.

On the defendants appealing Field, J., referred the matter to the court.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Graham, for the defendants.—The answers to the first two interrogatories are sufficient: Moore v. Craven, L. R. 7 Ch. 94n. The remaining interrogatories ought not to be allowed. It was decided by the Court of Appeal in Hennessy v. Wright, 36 W. R. 879 (which was followed in Gibson v. Evans, 23 Q. B. D. 384), that in an action of libel against the proprietor of a newspaper, where the defendant takes upon himself the responsibility of defending the action, it is not allowable for the plaintiff to interrogate as to who was the writer of the libel or gave the information on which it was based. See also M'Colla v. Jones, 4 Times L. R. 12.

Asquith (Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The defendants ought, in answer to the first two interrogatories, to give an approximate estimate of the number of copies issued. As to the other interrogatories, the cases cited do not apply to this case, the issues being different. Here there is no plea of justification, or privilege, or fair comment. The only question is as to damages. What the Court of Appeal decided in Hennessy v. Wright was that the plaintiff in an action of libel against a newspaper ought not to be allowed to ask for the name of the writer in order that if it should turn out that the writer had a malicious feeling towards him he might impute that malice to the defendant. Here the object of the plaintiff is not to impute malice, but to show gross negligence and recklessness on the part of the defendants in trusting persons who were notoriously untrustworthy, for the purpose of increasing damages, the question of damages being the only question in issue, and one on which the plaintiff will be entitled at the trial to adduce affirmative evidence in chief. This object of increasing damages was not within the consideration of the court in Hennessy v. Wright and the other cases. It has recently been decided that in assessing damages in an action for libel the jury are entitled to take into consideration the whole conduct of the defendant in the matter from the time the libel was published down to the time the verdict is given: Praed v. Graham, ante, p. 103, 24 Q. B. D. 53.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., in reply, cited Robertson v. Wylde, 2 Moo. & R. 101.

Denman, J.—Our decision in this case must be partly in favour of the view taken by the master, and partly contrary to it. The action is one for libel against a newspaper. The plaintiff complains of an imputation that he was the author of certain letters, which, if he was the author of them, would show him to be a bad man. The defendants do not justify the libel, neither do they plead privilege; they do not raise any defence, but they pay a sum of money into court, which they say is sufficient, so that all the jury will have to do at the trial will be to assess damages.

Now, in answer to the first interrogatory, asking how many copies of the paper were issued to the public, the defendants decline to state the number, on the ground that it would give trouble to themselves and other persons, and would involve the disclosure of the state of their business. But they are not entitled to withhold all information on the ground of inconvenience; they must give some information. We are told that it is impossible to say what the precise circulation was. But counsel for the plaintiff says that he does not want the precise number, he will be satisfied with an answer within tens of thousands. To suppose they cannot answer within such limits is absurd. Therefore they must give the best information they can; and the same thing applies to the pamphlet. That part of the order must stand.

As to the other interrogatories, I am not perfectly confident that if the question had come before me for the first time, I should not have ordered answers to be given to interrogatories as to the conduct of the defendants with reference to the libel. I think it might have been held that it was relevant to inquire where the newspaper got its information—whether from a notoriously disreputable person, or from a person of good character. Even, however, if interrogatories might be put for that purpose, I do not think the interrogatories administered in this case are allowable, for they are not interrogatories asking for admissions, but are rather in the nature of cross-examination. But we are bound by the decisions not to require any answers to be give to these interrogatories. It has been plausibly contended that Hennessy v. Wright and the cases cited do not apply to the present case. It was said that the issues were different, the issue here being merely as to damages, and the interrogatories being put for the purpose of increasing the damages. But it is impossible to look at the decisions without seeing that the court intended to lay down the rule that in an action of libel against a newspaper, where the defendant takes upon himself the responsibility for the publication, the plaintiff shall not be allowed to ask for the name of the person from whom the paper got its information. The question of damages is a main question in every action of libel, and it must have been taken into consideration in the previous cases whether mentioned in the judgment or not. We cannot order these interrogatories to be answered, and as regards them the order of the master must be reversed.

WILLS, J.—I think the difficulties raised as to the first and second interrogatories are illusory. As to the others, the question is covered by authority. We cannot allow these interrogatories without supposing that the court in all the cases cited overlooked the bearing of the proposed interrogatories on the question of damages. The question of damages is a most important issue in every action of libel. Logically the question is, what injury the plaintiff has sustained? and therefore, logically, the conduct of the defendant is immaterial. The rule which has been laid down recently in Praed v. Graham, that all the circumstances of the case may be taken into consideration, is rather a concession to the impossibility of excluding such consideration than a logical deduction from principle. Such interrogatories as these have not been allowed during the whole of the time that the practice of interrogatories has existed. The decision of the master with respect to them must be reversed.

Divorce—Decree nisi on wife's petition—Money paid into court to secure wife's costs—Time of payment out—Rule 201.

Where a sum of money had been paid into court before trial, on the order of a registrar, to secure the wife's costs at the trial, and a decree nisi was pronounced on her petition, the court, on appeal from chambers, refused to order payment out to the wife or her solicitor of such sum of money before the decree was made absolute, as being against the provisions of rule 201.

Appeal from an order in chambers, refusing to direct payment out to the wife or her solicitor of a sum of £90 paid into court by the husband on the order of the registrar to secure the wife's costs in both suits.

These were cross petitions by husband and wife for dissolution of the marriage. At the hearing the court pronounced a decree nisi on the wife's petition, and condemned the husband in costs. The Queen's Proctor had intervened, charging both parties with collusion and suppression of material facts.

B. Deane, in support of the motion, referred to Gladstone v. Gladstone, L. R. 3 P. & D. 260, 23 W. R. Dig. 182.

Middleton, for the husband, against the motion, relied on rule 201, which provides that "the order for payment of costs of suit in which a respondent or co-respondent has been condemned by a decree nisi shall, if applied for before the decree nisi is made absolute, direct the payment thereof into the registry of the Court of Probate, and such costs shall not be paid out of the registry to the party entitled to receive them under the decree nisi until the decree absolute has been obtained; but a wife who is unsuccessful in a cause, and who, at the hearing of the cause has, in pursuance of rule 159, obtained an order of the Judge-Ordinary that her costs of and incidental to the hearing or trial of the cause shall be allowed against her husband to the extent of the sum paid or secured by him to cover such costs, may nevertheless proceed at once to obtain payment of such costs after allowance thereof on taxation." The object is that where husband or wife is successful no order for payment out of the costs shall be made until after decree absolute, in order that the court may be able to review the conduct of the petitioner or the petitioner's solicitor when the case is finally concluded. When the wife is unsuccessful, then the judge at the trial, if applied to, determines once for all what costs, if any, shall be allowed.

Deane, in reply.—The first part of rule 201 only applies to the full costs given when the decree nisi is pronounced. What the court is asked to deal with is the sum paid in to cover costs, and if the court has not power now to order payment out of such sum, then a guilty wife is in a better position than if innocent, as, under rule 159, she ordinarily gets her costs paid out immediately.

BUTT, J.—I must decide against Mr. Deane's contention. Notwithstanding Mr. Middleton's explanation, I cannot see that the provisions of rule 201 are rational provisions; but there is the rule, by which I am bound, and therefore payment out of all costs must be deferred till the decree is made absolute.

Appeal refused; costs of appeal not to be taxed against the husband.

Damage—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 12—Fog—Duty of sailing vessel in stays to sound fog-horn.

A sailing vessel in stays in a fog is required under article 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea to make with her fog-horn, at intervals of not more than two minutes, when the wind is blowing on her starboard side one blast, and when the wind is blowing on her port side two blasts in succession.

This was an action of damage instituted by the owners of the schooner Iona against the Norwegian barque Constantia to recover the damage arising out of a collision which occurred between the two vessels in a fog in the Bristol Channel on the 29th of March, 1889.

The action was now heard before Butt, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House.

The result of the evidence and the arguments of counsel, so far as material to this report, appear from the judgment.

BUTT, J.—The one principal question in this case is, What was the density of the fog? Was the fog at the time of this collision so thick that the barque Constantia could only see the schooner about a ship's length off, or was it only such weather as would have enabled the barque, with a proper look-out, to have discerned the schooner at a considerably greater distance than she did, and thus have avoided the collision? We are told that the density of the fog has been considerably over-stated by the defendants. On the other hand, we think that it was not likely that a vessel's lights would be discerned so far off as the plaintiffs' witnesses say they were—namely, half a mile or three-quarters of a mile. One thing is quite clear in this case, and it is that The Constantia was being most improperly and negligently navigated. She was a vessel in a fog going round from the starboard tack to the port tack, and rather than call up the men from below to assist, the look-out man is actually allowed to leave the look-out for some ten minutes and assist in manœuvring the ship. He was not only the look-out man, but the man who had charge of the fog-horn, and during the whole of these ten minutes there was no fog-signal given by any blast or blasts from the fog-horn. We have no doubt that if a signal had been given by the look-out The Constantia would have been seen sooner. Therefore, on that view, The Constantia is to blame. But we also think it quite unjustifiable for a vessel which has altered her course to lie in a fog anything like so dense as the evidence shows was the case without making any sound whatever.

Various suggestions have been made by counsel with regard to the signals which should have been given by The Constantia, but I think the real interpretation of article 12 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea is, that so long as the wind is on the starboard side of a sailing ship, the ship, for the purposes of the rule, must then herself be held to be on the starboard tack, and must sound a blast on her fog-horn at an interval of not more than two minutes, and that as soon as she gets the wind on the port side she must sound two blasts in succession at intervals of not more than two minutes. However, I really do not think it necessary to comment further upon this point, because we find, quite apart from that, that she was to blame for negligent navigation, and I must so pronounce.

An originating summons was issued by the mortgagees of property to which the mortgagors were beneficially entitled under the trusts of a will. The mortgagors and the trustees were made defendants to the summons, which claimed, as against the mortgagors, payment of the mortgage-moneys, or, in default, sale or foreclosure, and, as against the trustees, an account of the income of the mortgaged property received by them as trustees of the mortgagors. The trustees defendants brought in an account and gave evidence claiming to be entitled to retain a large portion of the income of the property in question, by virtue of a mortgage, made to them by their cestui que trusts, prior in date to the mortgage of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs alleged that they had given notice of their mortgage to the trustees, and that, at the time of the issue of the summons, they had no notice given them by the trustees of any prior charge on the property.

Held (affirming North, J.), that the originating summons should be dismissed as against the trustee defendants, on the ground that the question which had arisen as to priority of the mortgages was a question which could not be properly dealt with on proceedings by way of originating summons.

Held, also, per Cotton and Lopes, L.JJ. (Lindley, L.J., dubitante), that the court had no jurisdiction to determine a question of disputed priority of mortgages on proceedings by way of originating summons.

Appeal from North, J.

Under the will of the testator Giles, certain property was devised to W. Giles and P. Giles on trust to receive the rents and profits, and to pay one moiety thereof to Fanny Michell, wife of W. Michell. In May, 1883, Mr. and Mrs. Michell executed a mortgage of their interest in this property, and in August, 1884, this mortgage was transferred to the Real and Personal Advance Co., who gave notice of the transfer to the trustees.

In 1886 the company issued an originating summons, the defendants being the mortgagors (Mr. and Mrs. Michell) and the trustees of the testator's will (W. Giles and P. Giles). As against the mortgagors, the plaintiff company, by their summons, claimed an account of what was due to them on their mortgage, and in default of payment thereof, sale or foreclosure; and, as against the trustees, the plaintiff company claimed an account of the rents and profits of the property comprised in the plaintiff company's mortgage received by these defendants since January, 1885, as trustees of the testator's will.

After the issue of the summons the defendants, the trustees, furnished an account of the rents and profits of the property in question received by them, but they made affidavits in which they claimed to be entitled to retain the greater portion of the same, under an instrument of charge made by Mrs. Michell on the 19th of January, 1883—prior in date to the mortgage of the plaintiff company—to secure the repayment of sums of money from time to time advanced to her by the trustees. The account furnished showed a small balance then due by the trustees to Mrs. Michell.

The plaintiff company alleged that the trustees had concealed the existence of this charge in their own favour from the plaintiff company, and that the plaintiff company had no knowledge of its existence until the trustees, after the issue of this summons, made their affidavit.

The summons was heard by North, J., in chambers on the 26th of July, 1889, when he made an order dismissing the summons as against the defendants, the trustees, with costs to be paid by the plaintiff company, the dismissal to be without prejudice to any other action the plaintiff might bring by writ; and as against the mortgagors he made an order for foreclosure in default of payment. In making the order dismissing the summons against the trustees, the judge expressed his desire to have the matter further argued before him in court, and accordingly gave no certificate.

On November, 16, 1889, the plaintiff company gave notice of motion before the judge in court to discharge that part of the order of July 16 which dismissed the summons as against the defendants, the trustees. The motion came on for hearing on November 22, 1889, when counsel for the defendants, the trustees, took a preliminary objection to the motion being heard, on the ground that the notice of motion was out of time, not having been given within twenty-one days from July 26, 1889, and cited In re Johnson, Manchester Banking Co. v. Beales, 37 W. R. 765, as an authority. North, J., allowed the objection, and made no order on the motion (see 34 S. J. 79).

On December 7, 1889, the plaintiff company gave notice of appeal from the orders both of July 26 and November 22. The appeal came on for hearing on January 28, 1890, when

D. L. Alexander, for the respondents, the trustee defendants, took the preliminary objection that, having regard to the provisions of section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1873,* no appeal lay from the order in chambers of July 26, no certificate having been applied for or obtained from the judge below, and no effectual motion to discharge or vary the order in chambers having been made.

T. Eustace Smith, for the appellant company.—The Rules of the Supreme Court nowhere contain any provision fixing any limit of time for moving to discharge a final order made in chambers, and until the case of In re Johnson before Kay, J., there was no reported case which fixed a limit of twenty-one days for moving to discharge a final order in chambers. That case was only decided on July 26, 1889, and though it was reported in the WEEKLY REPORTER of August 17, 1889 (37 W. R. 765), and is so cited in the Annual Practice, 1889-90, p. 52, it was not published in the Law Reports until December, 1889. Until that case, there was at least considerable doubt as to the proper time for moving to discharge final orders made in chambers. I was not aware of the case in the WEEKLY REPORTER until it was cited on the motion before North, J., in November last, and I then asked the judge to extend the time. The Court of Appeal has power to give special leave to proceed with the appeal, and there are special circumstances in this case. The notice of appeal has been given within twenty-one days of November 22.

Alexander, in reply.—Misconstruction of the rules or mistake as to the proper practice, is no ground for obtaining special leave to appeal: International Financial Society v. City of Moscow Gas Co., 26 W. R. 272, 7 Ch. D. 241. The plaintiff company ought to have given notice of motion in the court below for an extension of the time.

* Section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1873, so far as material, is as follows:—"Every order made by a judge of the High Court in chambers, except orders made in the exercise of such discretion as aforesaid"—(i.e., orders made by consent or as to costs only)—"may be set aside or discharged upon notice . . . by the judge sitting in court, . . . and no appeal shall lie from any such order to set aside or discharge which no such motion has been made, unless by special leave of the judge by whom such order was made, or of the Court of Appeal."

COTTON, L.J.—The preliminary objection taken on behalf of the respondents raises rather an important point. An order had been made by the judge in chambers dismissing the summons as against two of the defendants, and he asked to have the case further argued, and, accordingly, a motion was made in court to discharge the order made in chambers. Now such a motion is in no way an appeal, but merely an application for rehearing before the same judge. The notice of motion was given more than twenty-one days after the date of the order in chambers. In my opinion that was wrong. It has been established for some time, that the time for giving notice of motion to discharge an interlocutory order made in chambers, following the analogy of interlocutory orders made in court, is limited to twenty-one days, but it does not seem to have been determined (until the case of In re Johnson) that the same rule was to apply to motions to discharge final orders made in chambers. In my opinion the same rule ought to be applied.

The motion to discharge is not an appeal in any way; it is only a motion to enable the judge to hear the matter over again more fully in court, and it is merely an application made under section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to discharge or vary the previous order.

In my opinion, therefore, North, J., was right in holding that he could not hear this motion in court after the twenty-one days had expired.

But the practice on this point was doubtful until the case of In re Johnson had been reported. An application to discharge an order made in chambers is made under section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1873, by the latter part of which, a discretion is given to this court to give special leave to appeal.

[The Lord Justice read the section, and proceeded:—] I am not quite satisfied that the condition imposed by section 50 as to making a motion before the judge has not been performed by the appellant, although, by a blunder, it was made in such a way that the judge could not hear it. But the Court of Appeal has power, under section 50, to give special leave to appeal without a certificate from the judge, and without a previous motion made in the court below to discharge the order in chambers, and, in my opinion, having regard to the fact that there is no rule of court dealing with this point, and that there has been some doubt as to the practice, we ought in this case to give special leave to appeal, even assuming that the conditions imposed by section 50 have not been complied with.

I agree with the view entertained by Kay, J., in In re Johnson, that a motion to discharge a final order made in chambers ought to be made within twenty-one days, such a motion being a mere application to the judge to rehear the case in court.

For the future I desire it to be understood that that rule must be followed; but in the present case I think it right to give special leave to appeal, though in future I do not say what course we shall think it right to take, in a case where no certificate had been given and no effective motion made to discharge the order in chambers.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I agree. The difficulty here arises from the fact that there is no general order as to the time within which a motion to discharge an order made in chambers must be made. With respect to final orders the limit of time was not defined till the case of In re Johnson, the report of which did not appear in the Law Reports until the month of December of last year. That being so, I think the course followed by North, J., was the proper one. I think the view entertained by Kay, J., was right, and that the notice of motion ought to be given within twenty-one days. There is no rule to that effect among the General Orders, but that limit of time has been got at by a process of reasoning which appears to me satisfactory. Once that limit of time is got at, it follows that no such application as is required by section 50 of the Judicature Act, 1873, has been made in this case. But at the same time it must be remembered that this point of practice was at the time a new one. It is not a case in which there was an existing rule of court, and a blunder had been made in construing it; I do not think in the present case that anyone was to blame for not arriving by reasoning and analogy at the proper conclusion.

I think, therefore, that this is a case in which we ought to avail ourselves of the special powers given to us by section 50 and allow this appeal to proceed.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree. I think the rule laid down by Kay, J., that motions to discharge final orders made in chambers must be brought within twenty-one days, is a salutary rule. At the same time I think that there are special circumstances in this case which justify us in exercising the powers given us by section 50, and giving the appellant special leave to appeal. The special circumstances to which I refer are, that at the time when this summons came before North, J., there was no settled practice bearing on this particular point, and no rule of court dealing with it.

The hearing of the appeal was accordingly proceeded with.

T. Eustace Smith, for the appellant company.—The plaintiff company claim, as assignees of Mrs. Michell, a cestui que trust of the defendants, the trustees, and the question to be determined is really a question of account between the defendant trustees and the plaintiff company as cestui que trust; that is a question which the court has jurisdiction under ord. 55, r. 3 (c) (e), to determine on originating summons; it is at all events a question arising in the administration of the estate or trust, and therefore comes under ord. 55, r. 3 (g). The account put in by these defendants shows a small balance due by them to Mrs. Michell, and the plaintiff company were therefore at the very least entitled to have an order made in their favour for that amount. [Alexander.—The trustees offered to pay that, and you refused to take it on the ground that it might be an admittance of the priority of the trustees' mortgage.] Ord. 55, r. 5 (A), gives the court jurisdiction on originating summons to determine a question of priority between mortgagees, because that rule provides that any person entitled to an equity of redemption may take out as of course an originating summons and obtain an order for redemption, and that necessarily involves in some cases the determination of questions of priority between mortgagees.

D. L. Alexander, for the respondents, was not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal, by our special leave given to the appellant though he had not got any certificate from the judge, from an order made by North, J., in chambers, dismissing so much of an action commenced by originating summons as raises the question whether the two defendants, who are the present respondents, had priority in respect of their charge as against the mortgage on which the plaintiff relies. These defendants are trustees, but their claim is not as trustees in any way, but as mortgagees under a contract between them and one of their cestui que trusts. That claim is, therefore, entirely independent of their position as trustees, and the question to be determined as to priority is not a question in any way arising on administration of the trust. The judge held, either that he had no jurisdiction to decide the question of priority upon an originating summons, or that, if he had, it was not desirable to decide that question upon an originating summons. I agree with him. In my opinion the court has no jurisdiction to decide such a question on an originating summons, and, if it has, I am decidedly of opinion it is not a proper matter to be so decided. The question of jurisdiction depends on whether the points in issue in this case are matters which the rules of court have given power to be determined, on originating summons. I cannot find in the Rules and Orders of the Supreme Court anything to justify such a point as this being determined on originating summons.

Ord. 55, r. 3 (g), was relied on by the appellant, but that clause only relates to questions which arise in the administration of the trust as between cestui que trusts and their trustees. The procedure was intended, so far as I am aware, to enable simple matters to be settled without the expense necessarily involved in bringing an action begun by writ, not to enable the court to determine matters involving serious questions which do not come within the terms of the rule. Ord. 55, r. 5 (A), was also relied on, and it was argued that in order to work out effectually a judgment for redemption it was often necessary that priorities should be ascertained and determined, and therefore that this rule empowers this to be done. I do not agree with that. It is true that in actions for redemption such questions often arise and might have to be determined, and the court has no difficulty in dealing with such questions in an action commenced by writ in the ordinary way; but if the plaintiff chooses to come to the court by way of originating summons, although it may be more convenient to him on the ground of saving expense or otherwise, yet, unless the relief claimed comes within the terms of the order, the court has no jurisdiction to deal with it.

Even if there be jurisdiction to decide such a question as this, it would, in my opinion, be wrong to deal with it in those informal proceedings. An originating summons is a mode of procedure intended for the decision of matters of a simple, uninvolved nature, and is not calculated to determine complicated matters.

In my opinion the decision of North, J., is right.

The only point on which I have felt some doubt is as to whether it would not have been right to order the defendants to hand over to the plaintiff company, as mortgagees, the balance admitted by these defendants to be in their hands.

I think, however, the judge acted rightly, as these defendants were willing to hand it over, and the plaintiff company naturally, thinking that some difficulty might be caused by this, refused to take it.

That being so, there was nothing as to which the judge could make any order on the summons as against these defendants consistently with the view he adopted. The order is therefore right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this case an originating summons was taken out, by the mortgagees of Mr. Michell and his wife, claiming as against the Michells the ordinary foreclosure decree. That the plaintiff company have got under ord. 55, r. 5 (A), and no difficulty arises as to that. But the plaintiff company have added as defendants to the summons two persons named Giles, who are trustees of the property comprised in the plaintiff company's mortgage, and the plaintiff company ask, as against the Gileses, to have, in effect, an order for administration of the trust. These defendants say that they have a mortgage on the trust estate which is prior to the mortgage of the plaintiff company. The plaintiff company dispute the priority, and the point, therefore, which we have to decide is whether that is a question which it is proper to decide upon an originating summons. I am not sure that the court has no jurisdiction to do it. I am not so sure, as Cotton, L.J., is, that on a summons for administration of the trust under ord. 55, r. 3 (g), there might not be an inquiry as to priorities. But I am perfectly sure that North, J., was quite right in declining to deal with such a question as this upon originating summons.

The procedure on an originating summons is plainly laid down in the rules. Rule 10 of order 55 gives the judge a discretion to make an order, or not, for the administration of the trust. By rule 7 the application is to be supported by such evidence as the judge may require, which is generally evidence by affidavit, and rule 8 provides that it shall be lawful for the judge to pronounce such judgment as the nature of the case shall require. This procedure does not seem appropriate for deciding such a question as the present. No judge would like to decide a question of priority between mortgagees on affidavit evidence. If it comes, therefore, to be a mere question of expediency and convenience, it follows that it would not be right to decide this point upon originating summons. Consequently, whether the court has jurisdiction to do so or not, I am of opinion that the judge was, on the ground of expediency, quite right in declining to deal with the matter on originating summons.

LOPES, L.J.—The jurisdiction of the court in proceedings commenced by originating summons is new, and depends on the General Orders and Rules. I can find nothing giving jurisdiction to decide the question of priority of mortgages, either under ord. 55, r. 3, or ord. 55, r. 5 (A), or elsewhere. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

SMITH v. SMITH. (a.)

Divorce—Restitution of conjugal rights—Practice—Sufficiency of affidavit—"Written demand for cohabitation and restitution of conjugal rights"—Rules and Regulations in Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, rr. 2, 175, 176.

A wife, before commencing proceedings against her husband (who had been living apart from her for eleven years) for restitution of conjugal rights, served upon him a letter signed by herself giving him notice of her desire to cohabit and live with him, and demanding from him a full restitution of conjugal rights, and, further, notifying to him that, in the event of his not receiving her and providing a suitable home and habitation for her, she intended to apply to the High Court for restitution of her conjugal rights. The husband sent a reply the same day acknowledging the receipt of the letter and stating that he declined to receive back his wife or make a home for her. The wife's affidavit filed with her petition set out the letters.

Held (reversing the decision of Butt, J.), that the case was distinguished from Field v. Field, 37 W. R. 134, 14 P. D. 26, by the facts that the letter was the wife's own and not a solicitor's letter, that it expressed her desire to cohabit and live with her husband, and that he answered it with an unqualified refusal; and that the wife's letter was therefore a sufficient compliance with rule 175 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Rules and Regulations, and that a decree for restitution ought to be made.

Appeal from Butt, J.

This was an appeal from a decision of Butt, J., refusing to grant a decree for restitution of conjugal rights upon the petition of the wife, on the ground that she had not sufficiently complied with rule 175 of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Rules and Regulations. That rule is as follows:—"The affidavit filed with the petition as required by rule 2, shall further state sufficient facts to satisfy one of the registrars that a written demand for cohabitation and restitution of conjugal rights has been made by the petitioner upon the party to be cited, and that after a reasonable opportunity for compliance therewith such cohabitation and restitution of conjugal rights have been withheld." Rules 2 and 176, which are less material, are printed in a note to Field v. Field, 37 W. R. 134.

The parties were married in 1866, and lived together till May, 1877, when they separated, and had not since cohabited again. In 1888 it came to the knowledge of the petitioner that her husband had committed adultery, and she forthwith took steps for the commencement of these proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights. It appeared from her affidavit, filed with the petition under the rule above set out, that in October, 1888, with the view of complying therewith, she served the following letter, written by her solicitors, but signed by herself, upon her husband:—"I, Mary Elizabeth Smith, hereby give notice to you, Charles Frederick Smith, my husband, of my desire to cohabit and live with you, and I demand from you a full restitution of the conjugal rights of which you have deprived me; and I further notify to you that, in the event of your not receiving me and providing a suitable home and habitation for me, it is my intention to apply to the High Court of Justice for the restitution of such my conjugal rights." It further appeared by the affidavit that the husband sent a reply the same day in these terms:—"I am duly in receipt of yours, and in reply I beg to state that I decline to receive back my wife, or to make any home for her."

The respondent entered an appearance after citation, but filed no answer to the petition, and did nothing further.

Butt, J., held, upon the authority of Field v. Field, 37 W. R. 134, 14 P. D. 26, that the petitioner's letter was not a sufficient compliance with rule 175, and accordingly refused to make a decree for restitution of conjugal rights.

The petitioner appealed.

Searle, for the petitioner.—The petitioner's letter in this case was a sufficient compliance with rule 175. Field v. Field is distinguishable on several grounds. Here the letter, though drawn up by the solicitors, was signed by the wife herself, whereas in Field v. Field there was simply a lawyer's letter sent to the husband with a formal demand for cohabitation and restitution. Secondly, in this case the husband sent back an answer the same day giving an unqualified refusal to his wife's demand. In Field v. Field no answer was sent, and it did not even appear from the affidavit that the letter was received. Moreover, in that case no appearance was entered, while here an appearance was entered but no answer was filed, and nothing done by the husband to justify his unqualified refusal to take his wife back. The object of the rule is to give the respondent an opportunity to resume cohabitation or give reasons for not doing so. Rule 176 confirms that view. Before these two rules were made it had been found that the process of the court had been abused by persons taking out citations causelessly, merely for the sake of giving annoyance or getting costs.

No one appeared for the respondent.

COTTON, L.J.—The learned judge appears to have refused to make a decree in this case simply because he felt himself bound by the case of Field v. Field decided in this court; but I do not think he can have sufficiently considered the circumstances by which the present case seems to me to be distinguished from that. In the first place the letter in Field v. Field was written to the husband, not by the wife, but by her solicitors as such, was couched in peremptory and threatening terms, and expressed no desire on the wife's part to live with her husband. What it said was this:—"We are instructed by your wife, Mary Francoise Field, of South Villa, Wells-road, Great Malvern, to demand for her forthwith cohabitation and restitution of conjugal rights, and in default of your complying with this request we shall be compelled to institute proceedings for the same without further notice." That was an ordinary solicitor's letter, containing a demand for restitution of conjugal rights, followed by a threat of legal proceedings in default, and it certainly did not express any willingness or desire on the part of the wife to return to cohabitation with her husband. In the present case there is a substantial difference. [His lordship read the petitioner's letter, set out in the statement of this case, and proceeded:—] That does notify her own desire to cohabit and live with her husband. It is true that she does demand a full restitution of the conjugal rights of which she had been deprived, and that she states her intention to apply to the court in case her husband should fail to accede to her demand. But that is in reference to what she has already said as to her desire to resume cohabition with him, and we do not think there is anything objectionable in it. It is not like holding a pistol to her husband's head and requiring him to take her back. Although I quite adhere to what we said in Field v. Field, still in this case, the letter being written by the wife, and not by her solicitors, and expressing her own desire to cohabit with her husband, cannot be regarded as a mere threatening letter like the one in that case. In my opinion on that ground this appeal must be allowed and the decree granted.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I also think that this case is not at all governed by Field v. Field to the extent that the learned judge seems to have considered. In that case the letter sent to the respondent was nothing more than a lawyer's letter, and was never answered by the husband. In the next place the present appellant does intimate and express that which we were unable to find in the letter written in the case of Field v. Field—that is, a desire to resume cohabitation with her husband. Thirdly, it appears in the present case that the husband received the letter and answered it immediately with an unqualified refusal to receive his wife back, while in Field v. Field he sent no answer, and it did not even appear from the wife's affidavit that he ever received the letter.

LOPES, L.J.—Whether or not I should have put the same construction on rule 175 as was put upon it by this court in the case of Field v. Field I do not know, and it is not necessary to consider, but of this I am clear—that the present case is very distinguishable from that. Here the letter was written by the wife herself, and expressed her desire to live with her husband, but in Field's case it was written by her solicitors, and expressed no such desire. In that case no answer was sent by the husband. Here there was an answer which distinctly states that the husband will not take his wife back. I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the learned judge below was wrong.

Appeal allowed.

Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161—Voluntary winding up—Transfer or sale of business—Special resolution—Dissentient member—Notice of dissent—When to be given.

A company passed a special resolution for winding up and for the sale of its business to another company, but before such special resolution had been confirmed in the manner required by section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, a dissentient member gave notice of dissent to U., the secretary of the company, who was afterwards appointed liquidator when the special resolution was confirmed. The notice of dissent, wherein U. was styled the liquidator, was never returned to the dissentient member, and no objection was made to it until one month after the date of the meeting at which the special resolution was confirmed. Upon motion by the liquidator to restrain the dissentient member from proceeding to arbitration,

Held, that the notice of dissent was a continuing notice and valid, and that the liquidator's motion must be dismissed.

Motion.

The above-named company having passed a special resolution for the voluntary winding up, and proposing to transfer and sell the company's assets to another company under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, the liquidator now moved to restrain one of the shareholders, the respondent Charles Rumsey Knight, from proceeding to arbitration under the aforesaid section.

The question was whether the respondent had expressed his dissent from any such special resolution in writing addressed to the liquidator and left at the registered office of the company not later than seven days after the date of the meeting at which such special resolution was passed.*

On the 29th of August, 1889, and the 16th of September, 1889, respectively, special resolutions were duly passed and confirmed for the voluntary winding up of the company, the appointment of the applicant as liquidator, and the approval of an agreement for the sale of the company's assets to the Bread Union (Limited).

On the 31st of August, 1889, the applicant, who had

* The material part of the 161st section is as follows:—" . . . Subject to this proviso, that if any member of the company being wound up, who has not voted in favour of the special resolution passed by the company of which he is a member at either of the meetings held for passing the same, expresses his dissent from any such special resolution in writing, addressed to the liquidators or one of them, and left at the registered office of the company not later than seven days after the date of the meeting at which such special resolution was passed, such dissentient member may require the liquidators to do one of the following things as the liquidators may prefer; that is to say, either to abstain from carrying such resolution into effect, or to purchase the interest held by such dissentient member at a price to be determine in manner hereinafter mentioned, such purchase-money to be paid before the company is dissolved, and to be raised by the liquidators in such manner as may be determined by special resolution."

(a.) Reported by A. D. MACLAREN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

previously been and then was the secretary of the company, received from the respondent the following notice dated the 30th of August, 1889:—

"Take notice that I, Charles Rumsey Knight, of Tythegston Court, Bridgend, in the county of Glamorgan, clerk in holy orders, being the holder of 100 paid-up shares in the London and Westminster Bread Co. (Limited), dissent from the special resolutions passed at the extraordinary general meeting of shareholders in the above-named company, and held at the Cannon-street Hotel on the 29th day of August, 1889, and I require you either to abstain from carrying such resolutions into effect, or to purchase the interest held by me in the said company at a price to be determined in manner provided by section 162 of the Companies Act, 1862.

"Charles R. Knight."

On the 16th of October, 1889, the respondent's solicitors wrote a letter to the applicant, and the material parts of it were as follows:—"Referring to the course which our client, the Rev. Charles Knight, of Tythegston Court, Bridgend, has taken, we shall be glad to know by return of post what offer you propose to make him for his shares in the London and Wesminster Bread Co.," and in reply thereto the respondent's solicitors, on the 20th of October, 1889, received from the applicant a letter dated the 19th of October, 1889, of which the material parts were as follows:—"In reply to your letter I beg to inform you that the matter is still under the consideration of the directors of the Bread Union.

"Yours faithfully,
"For and on behalf of the London and West"minster Bread Co. (Limited).
"Alfred Upright,
"Liquidator."

On the 23rd of October, 1889, the solicitors of the applicant wrote to the respondent (omitting formal parts) as follows:—"We have been handed your letter of the 16th inst. by Mr. Upright, the liquidator of this company. As the notice given was informal it cannot be noticed by the liquidator." The notice of dissent remained with the applicant and was not returned to the respondent, who, on or about the 15th of November, 1889, appointed an arbitrator to settle the sum to be paid to him as the price of his interest in the company, and shortly afterwards the applicant served the respondent with notice of motion.

Byrne, Q.C., and Dunham, for the motion.—The respondent's notice of dissent was given before there was an effective resolution to wind up, and is, therefore, invalid. Consequently he is not entitled to proceed to arbitration, as he has not complied with the requirements of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 161.

They also referred to sections 51 and 162 of the same Act, and to In re Indian Zoedone Co., 32 W. R. 481, 26 Ch. D. 70.

Kenyon Parker, for the respondent.

Chitty, J., after stating the above-mentioned facts, continued:—The notice of dissent was received by the company's secretary, the present applicant, and it remained with the company and was not returned to the respondent. There was no correspondence about it, and no objection taken to it until one month after the special resolution to wind up had been confirmed. But it is plain from the letter of the 19th of October, 1889, written by the applicant that the notice of dissent had come to his notice and been present to his mind after he became liquidator. The notice may therefore, I think, be treated as a continuing notice, and I think that there has been a compliance with the Act of Parliament. Probably a notice given before any resolution had been passed would not be good, but it is not necessary to consider that question for the purpose of my present decision.

I think that the argument for the liquidator is entirely technical, and that there is no question of substance between the parties. The Act requires the notice to be left at the company's office not later than seven days after the date of the meeting at which such special resolution was passed. The object of that was to prevent the inconvenience to the liquidator and the company which would happen if members were not required to decide quickly and remained out to speculate on the possibilities of the company's assets becoming better or worse. The motion fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Moon v. Dickinson. (a.)

Practice—Action for injunction and damages—Motion for interlocutory injunction—Denial of liability—Payment into court in respect of damages—Acceptance in satisfaction of damages—Notice of discontinuance of action—Taxation of costs—Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 22, rr. 6, 7; ord. 26, r. 1.

In an action for an injunction and damages for a nuisance, the plaintiff moved for an interlocutory injunction, but, the defendants having taken steps to stop the nuisance, no order was, by consent, made on the motion, except that the costs were to be costs of the action. The defendants by their defence denied liability, but paid money into court in respect of the claim for damages. The plaintiff accepted the money, in satisfaction of his claim for damages, and wrote that he should discontinue the action, take the money out of court, and tax his costs. The plaintiff then took out a summons for taxation of his costs of the action, and the defendants also took out a summons that the plaintiff do pay them their costs of the action, including their costs of the motion for injunction, such costs to be taxed, on the ground that the plaintiff's letter was a notice of discontinuance of the action.

Held, that as the money was paid into court only in respect of and accepted only in satisfaction of the claim for damages, and as the entire claim or cause of action was not thereby satisfied, rule 7, of order 22, did not authorize the taxation of costs thereunder, and that the plaintiff's application to tax the whole costs of the action was not right; also that the plaintiff's letter was not a notice of discontinuance so as to entitle the defendants to their costs under order 26, r. 1.

Adjourned summons.

The action was commenced on the 24th of December, 1888, for an injunction to restrain John Dickinson & Co., a company carrying on the business of paper manufacturers, from allowing smoke or effluvia to issue from their mills at Crossley, in the county of Hertford, so as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiff, who resided in the neighbourhood of the mills, and for damages for the nuisance occasioned to the plaintiff.

On the 8th of January, 1889, the plaintiff gave notice of motion for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant company from allowing smoke or effluvia to issue from their mills so as to cause an annoyance to the plaintiff.

The defendant company then introduced a new process at their mills, and on the 1st of March, 1889, the motion came on for hearing, and, by consent of the parties, no order was made on it, except that the costs of the motion be costs of the action, but that was not to prejudice the plaintiff's right to apply for an interlocutory injunction if he should be so advised.

On the 25th of March, 1889, the plaintiff delivered his statement of claim, in which he claimed (1) an injunction; (2) damages; and (3) costs.

On the 8th of May, 1889, the defendant company delivered their statement of defence, in which they denied that the plaintiff had ever suffered any inconvenience from the smoke or effluvia from their mills, but stated that if he had, such inconvenience was occasioned by accidents incidental to the starting of new machinery and not from anything inherent in the nature of their manufacture; and that such accidents were incapable of recurrence, as all causes of accident had been removed; the 9th paragraph of the statement of defence was as follows:—"Under the circumstances aforesaid the defendants submit that the plaintiff cannot in any case be entitled to an injunction, and lest, contrary to the defendants' contention, any nuisance or annoyance may have been occasioned to the plaintiff or his family, servants, or tenants, or to his said property by any such accidents as aforesaid, the defendants bring into court the sum of £25, and say that the same is sufficient to satisfy the whole of the plaintiff's claim, if any, for damages in this action."

On the 21st of October, 1889, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the solicitors of the defendant company as follows:—"We shall discontinue this action and take out of court the amount paid in and tax our costs. We will send formal notice to morrow"; and on the 26th of October, 1889, the following notice was sent: "Take notice that the plaintiff accepts the sum of £25 paid by you into court in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it is paid in."

On the 30th of October, 1889, the plaintiff took out a summons "that it be referred to the taxing master to tax the plaintiff's costs of the action." The chief clerk dismissed this summons, but, at the request of the plaintiff, placed it in the judge's list.

On the 7th of November, 1889, the defendant company took out a summons "for an order that the plaintiff do pay to the defendants the costs of this action, including therein the costs of the motion for interim injunction, such costs to be taxed."

The two summonses now came on for hearing.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff has accepted the sum paid into court by the defendant company in satisfaction of the claim in respect of which it was paid in, and has given the proper notice to the defendant company, and the plaintiff is accordingly entitled to tax his costs of the action, which include the costs of his motion for an interlocutory injunction: ord. 22, rr. 6, 7. The letter of the plaintiff's solicitors of the 21st of October, 1889, is not a notice of discontinuance of the action so as to prevent the plaintiff from taking out of court the sum paid in by the defendant company and from taxing his costs of the action: ord. 26, r. 1.

Moulton, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for the defendant company.—The plaintiff's summons is not within order 22, as that order only relates to an action "brought to recover a debt or damages," and the plaintiff's action is for an injunction and for damages, which are grounded on two causes of action. Therefore, the plaintiff cannot apply to tax his costs under rule 7 of order 22: M'Ilwraith v. Green, 13 Q. B. D. 897, 14 Ibid. 766, 33 W. R. Dig. 61. The letter of the 21st of October, 1889, amounts to a notice by the plaintiff of discontinuance of the action; and, accordingly, the defendant company are entitled to issue their summons for taxation of their costs: order 26. At all events there are summonses by the plaintiff and the defendant company for taxation of costs, and the plaintiff ought to have the costs of action, by which he has obtained £25 as damages; but the defendant company are entitled to set off against such costs their costs relating to the motion for an interlocutory injunction.

North, J.—The action was brought for an injunction and for damages. Proceedings were taken with a view to obtaining an interlocutory injunction, but, certain alterations being made in the works of the defendant company, by the consent of the parties no order was made on the motion for the injunction, except that the costs of the motion were to be costs in the action, leave being given to renew the motion if necessary. The statement of claim was delivered on the 25th of March, 1889. The statement of defence of the defendant company denied any case entitling the plaintiff to an injunction, and also any case entitling him to damages, but stated in the 9th paragraph [His lordship then read the 9th paragraph, set out above, of the statement of defence, and continued:—] The statement of defence was delivered on the 8th of May, 1889. On the 21st of October the plaintiff's solicitors expressed their intention of discontinuing the action in a letter of that date. [His lordship read the letter, which is set out above, and continued:—] I do not read that as a present discontinuance of the action. It refers to something in the future. If the plaintiff's solicitors had written "We hereby discontinue," that would have been a notice of discontinuance. They were clearly not simply discontinuing, because then they could not have taken the money out of court, or have got any costs; but, having obtained £25 damages, they did not care to go on any longer with the legal proceedings. Then, on the 26th of October, they give a notice stating that the sum paid into court in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim for damages is accepted by him. On the 30th of October the plaintiff takes out a summons asking that it be referred to the taxing master to tax his costs of the action. The defendant company say that there was a discontinuance of the action by reason of the letter of the 21st of October, 1889, and, acting on that footing, they take out their summons.

I do not think that the General Orders justify what has been done in this case. Order 22 applies to an action to recover a debt or damages; but there is nothing in the order to confine it to an action to recover a debt or damages only, without seeking any other relief. In ord. 3, r. 6, the word "only" precedes the words "to recover"; but that word is not found in order 22. In this case the money has not been paid into court to satisfy the entire cause of action, but only in respect of the claim for damages, and therefore I cannot treat the whole action as satisfied thereby; and as the entire claim or cause of action is not satisfied, rule 7, of order 22, does not authorize the taxation of costs thereunder; and the application of the plaintiff to tax the whole costs of the action is not right.

With regard to the summons of the defendant company, I do not think that I can set off their costs of the motion for an injunction. I do not see how I can deal with those costs at present. There has been no discontinuance of the action so as to entitle them to have their costs taxed under order 26. I should give a wrong effect to the letter of the 21st of October, 1889, if I held otherwise. In the result I cannot make any order now for taxation of the costs of the defendant company. I order payment out of court of the sum of £25 paid in by the defendant company; but, as far as regards the costs of the summonses, I think that each party should pay his own costs.

CHRISTIE v. NORTHERN COUNTIES PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Building society—Dispute with retiring member—Arbitration—Appointment of arbitrators after action commenced.

By one of the rules of a benefit building society it was provided that every dispute between the society and any member on which the decision of the board should not be deemed satisfactory, should be settled by a reference to arbitration, pursuant to the Building Societies Act, 1874; that five arbitrators should be elected by the members at a general meeting, and in each case of dispute the names of three arbitrators should be selected by lot out of the five, as the persons to decide the dispute.

A dispute having arisen between a member who had given notice of withdrawal and the society as to the amount which the member was entitled to receive on withdrawal, the member brought an action against the society to enforce his claim. After the writ had been issued, the society, for the first time, elected five arbitrators pursuant to the above rule, and then took out a summons to stay all further proceedings in the action, and to have the matter in dispute referred to arbitration.

Held, that, as no arbitrators had been elected at the time of the issue of the writ, the action had been properly commenced, and that the society were not entitled, after litigation had been thus commenced, to have the matter in dispute referred to arbitration.

Adjourned summons.

The above-mentioned society was registered under the Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, on the 24th of September, 1866.

The rules of the society contained the following (among other) provisions:—

Rule 70, "Any member who may be desirous of withdrawing invested shares, shall, at any time, be entitled to receive back the net amount of his subscriptions as soon as there are funds available, with such interest as the committee may determine. If more than one shall give notice to withdraw, the committee shall order such withdrawals to be paid in rotation, according to the priority of the notices, provided always that the widows and children of deceased members shall have preference. But in all cases a proportionate share of the expenses, if required, shall be first deducted. Any person who shall give notice to withdraw his invested shares shall thereupon cease to be a member of this society (in respect of the shares withdrawn) and forfeit all interest therein."

Rule 76, "It shall be lawful to repeal or make any alteration or amendment of these rules in the manner directed by 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 9, as under."

Rule 77, "In case the committee for the time being shall be unable to determine any matter of dispute or difference which shall arise between the society or the trustees or officers thereof or any person acting under them, or any member or members thereof, or any person or persons legally claiming on behalf of any member or members thereof, respecting the construction of these rules, or any clause therein, . . . reference shall be made to arbitration pursuant to the 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 27. At the first meeting of this society after the enrolment of its rules five arbitrators shall be named and elected, none of them being directly or indirectly beneficially interested in the funds of the society. In each case of dispute the names of the arbitrators shall be written on pieces of paper and placed in a box or glass, and the three whose names are first drawn by the complaining party shall be the arbitrators to decide the matter in dispute."

Rule 78, "Every member, or any person claiming under a member, whether he shall have executed a mortgage to the society or not, shall be bound by and subject to these rules, and by alterations and amendments thereof."

The plaintiff was the holder of thirty £10 shares and part of another share, upon which he had paid subscriptions amounting to £303. On the 1st of April, 1887, he gave the society a written notice to withdraw all his shares. At that time no arbitrators had ever been appointed under rule 77.

On the 24th of June, 1887, the society was registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874, at a special general meeting of the members held.

On the 19th of January, 1888, a resolution to rescind rule 70, and substitute a different rule for it, was passed.

At a second meeting, held on the 3rd of February, 1888, it was resolved to rescind all the rules and to substitute a new set of rules, among which were the following:—

Rule 15 (6), "In the event of any loss occurring to the society on any mortgage, or any expense or loss whatever, or in the event of there being any apprehended loss or expense, the same shall be charged upon and divided amongst all the ordinary invested shares then in the society, in proportion to the amount of subscriptions on each share, including arrears.

(7) "All ordinary invested shares that may be withdrawn shall have deducted from them a fair proportion of such loss or apprehended loss, and the board may estimate from time to time the amount of such loss or apprehended loss, and thereupon make such deduction or charge as aforesaid."

(9) "A member who has given notice to withdraw his shares shall continue to be a member, but shall not be entitled to vote at, or take part in, any meeting of the society, and he shall not, by reason or in consequence of such notice, or otherwise, cease to be a member of the society, but shall continue to be bound by these rules, and by all alterations and amendments thereof, until he shall have received the amount payable in respect of his shares."

Rule 32 (1), "Every dispute between the society and the board and any member or person claiming by or through any member or under the rules, on which the decision of the board shall not be deemed satisfactory, shall be settled by reference to arbitration, pursuant to the Building Societies Act, 1874. Five arbitrators shall be elected by the members at a general meeting, none of them being directly or indirectly beneficially interested in the funds of the society. In each case of dispute the names of the arbitrators shall be written on pieces of paper and placed in a box, and the three whose names are first drawn out by the complaining party shall be the arbitrators to decide the matter in dispute."

The society refused to pay the plaintiff the sum of £303, claiming under the new rules to make certain deductions therefrom, which reduced this sum to £196 19s. 6d. The plaintiff accordingly, on the 18th of April, 1889, brought this action against the society to enforce his claim. At the date of the issue of the writ no arbitrators had been elected either under the old or under the new rules. On the 1st of May, 1889, notice was given to all the members (including the plaintiff) that a special general meeting of the members of the society would be held on the 7th of May for the purpose of electing arbitrators under rule 32 of the new rules. The meeting was held and five arbitrators were elected. On the 8th of May, 1889, the society took out this summons to stay all further proceedings in the action, and that the action and all matters in dispute between the plaintiff and the society might be referred to arbitration pursuant to the rules of the society.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Everitt, Q.C., and Farwell, for the society.—The plaintiff is claiming under the new rules; he is, therefore, bound by them, and by every alteration of them. If he is not a member he is claiming through a member. If he sues the society he must sue subject to the statutory provisions of the society, and one of those provisions is that all disputes shall be referred to arbitration.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and Rutherford, for the plaintiff.—Even supposing the new rules do apply, and we submit they do not, still the society have no right, after action commenced, to fix the tribunal to decide the question at issue. They do not ask to go to arbitration under the old rule, and they could not do so, as no appointment of arbitrators was made at the time mentioned in the rule: Walker v. General Mutual Building Society, 36 Ch. D. 777; 36 W. R. Dig. 26.

Everitt, Q.C., replied.

North, J. (after stating the nature of the dispute and the provisions of the original rules of the society, continued:—).—Rule 77 seems to me to provide for the determination of such a dispute as that which has arisen between the plaintiff and the society—viz., whether he is entitled to receive back the whole of his subscriptions, or whether any, and, if any, what, deductions are to be made from them? I think also that the question is clearly one which the committee are unable to determine, because the matter has been put into the hands of the solicitors; a discussion has taken place about it, and it is because the committee could not determine it that recourse has been had to litigation, and the only question is, whether the dispute ought to be settled by an action in this court or by a reference to arbitration? The rule provides that five arbitrators are to be elected at the first meeting of the society after the enrolment of its rules. I have already, during the argument, intimated an opinion that that provision is merely directory and not compulsory, and that, if for any reason it happened that the arbitrators could not be appointed at the first meeting, an appointment at a second, and, perhaps, at a third, meeting would not necessarily be bad. But the rule is very important as showing that what is contemplated is that a standing body of arbitrators shall be elected as soon as possible before any of the questions to be referred to them should have arisen, and it is out of that standing body so elected before any question has arisen that three arbitrators are to be chosen by lot to decide any dispute when it actually has arisen. Under that rule no arbitrators were ever appointed, and at the time when the plaintiff gave his notice to withdraw, on the 1st of April, 1887, there was no tribunal constituted under the rules to which any dispute could possibly be referred, because the society had allowed twenty-one years or so to elapse without complying with that requirement of the rules.

On the 24th of June, 1887, four months afterwards, the society proceeded to incorporate themselves by registration under the Act of 1874, as they had a perfect right to do, and the plaintiff, acting upon that, has issued his writ against the society as defendants. It was suggested that by suing them in that way he had estopped himself from raising any objection to their having all the rights which a body incorporated under that Act might have. I do not see that he has done anything of the kind. He has recognized the fact, to which he could not shut his eyes—viz, that the society, the persons against whom he asserted a claim, had become an incorporated body. Before they were incorporated they could only be sued in the names of the trustees. But so soon as the society, which is the same body of persons which was formerly unincorporated, became, by virtue of the registration, capable of being sued itself it was perfectly competent to the plaintiff to sue it, and in my opinion he is in no worse position in so suing them than if they had remained unincorporated and he had sued the trustees. [His lordship then read rules 15 and 32 of the new rules, and continued:—] The first question raised with regard to these rules is the important one whether they bind the plaintiff, who had, under the old rules, ceased to be a member of the society, by giving his notice to withdraw before the incorporation of the society and before the new rules were passed. That point I do not think it necessary to decide on the present occasion, and I do not intend to decide it.

I am not satisfied that the new rules are binding on the plaintiff. I may put this by way of illustration. Suppose the original rules had provided that all disputes should be referred to the decison of two arbitrators, one to be nominated by the person who had the dispute with the society and the other by the society, and that the two arbitrators might appoint an umpire. Suppose that, after a member had given notice to withdraw, and a question had arisen as to what was due to him from the society, would it be open to the society to proceed to repeal the rule which I have supposed to exist, and to substitute for it a new rule that any dispute should be decided by a person to be nominated solely by themselves. It would take a great deal of argument to convince me that anything in the rules would authorize them to make such alteration as that directly affecting a person who had ceased to be a member. I put this case to show the difficulty which I feel; but, as I have just said, I express no opinion on the point. I will assume for the purpose of my present decision that the new rules apply to the plaintiff.

But, still, in my opinion, he is not bound to submit to arbitration, and for this reason. The old rules, as I have pointed out, require that there should be standing arbitrators appointed from the first. In the new rule as to arbitration there is an alteration of the language. It does not say when the arbitrators are to be appointed; all it says is, that "five arbitrators shall be elected" by the members at a general meeting. But it goes on to give directions as to what is to be done in each case of dispute—namely, that, out of a body of arbitrators who are supposed to be then existing—a standing body of arbitrators—three are to be selected by lot. This is based on the assumption that the society have already done their duty by electing five good and competent arbitrators for the general purpose of arbitration, and then the bargain is that three persons chosen by lot out of the five shall decide the dispute. It is quite a different thing to say that any dispute is to be referred to the decision of a tribunal such as that to which I am now asked to send this dispute. No arbitrators had been appointed under the original rules, and no arbitrators had been appointed under the new rules down to the time when the dispute arose. It is found that the board cannot settle it, and the parties must settle it in some legal way, and, there being no other course open to the plaintiff, he issued his writ in the action. At the time when the writ was issued the dispute could not be referred to arbitration, because there were no arbitrators to whom it could be referred, and it is impossible for me to say that it was not open to the plaintiff to issue a writ, for, if that were so, the omission of the society to appoint arbitrators would deprive him of any remedy at all. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff was perfectly justified in commencing his action.

Then, after the writ has been served, the society proceeded to elect arbitrators by calling a general meeting of the members, at which five persons were elected. They are said to perfectly competent and trustworthy persons, and I have not the slightest reason to doubt it.

But, still, I do not consider that they constitute a tribunal such as is contemplated by the rule. The tribunal is to be a standing body of arbitrators, out of whom, when a dispute arises, three are to be chosen by lot; whereas, what has really happened is this: no arbitrators to whom the matter could be referred were elected until after the dispute had gone so far that an action had been commenced, and then the society—the defendants to the action—proceeded to nominate the judges who were to decide the action, and they ask me to say that the judges so nominated are the only persons who can deal with the matter. I do not doubt that they have been properly elected, or that they are a very good body of arbitrators, perfectly competent to deal with any dispute which may hereafter arise. But, in my opinion, the tribunal contemplated by the rule to decide a dispute between a member and the society is to consist of three persons to be elected by lot out of the standing body of arbitrators at the time, and it is not open to the society, after the dispute has arisen, to proceed to nominate the persons three of whom are to be the judges of the dispute. It is quite true that these gentlemen were appointed at a general meeting, but it was a general meeting of the members of the society who are the defendants. The general meeting would, in all probability, adopt the persons whose names are submitted to it, and those persons would be nominated by somebody. It is sufficient to prevent my sending the matter to such a tribunal that these gentlemen may have been nominated by the committee or the directors, or some of them, expressly because they, or some or one of them, are or is known to hold a particular view on this subject. Honest and impartial men I do not doubt they are, but still, they may have been elected because of their known views on this subject. In my opinion the tribunal to which a dispute of this sort is to be left is not one to be chosen by lot out of a body of persons elected by one of the parties to the dispute after the dispute has arisen.

I think, therefore, that, this action having been properly commenced, cannot be put an end to by referring the dispute to arbitrators thus elected. I must, therefore, dismiss the summons. The costs of the plaintiff will be his in any event.

Company—Winding up—Mortgage of uncalled capital—Priority of mortgagee over unsecured creditors—Companies Act, 1862, ss. 16, 38, 75, 98, 101, 133.

A company by its memorandum of association was empowered (inter alia) to borrow money by mortgage or otherwise, and issue bonds and mortgage debentures and other securities founded or based upon all or any of the real and personal assets or on the credit of the company. The articles of association, which bore even date with the memorandum of association, provided that the directors might borrow on mortgage of all or any part of the property of the company, and either with or without including in any such mortgage all or any definite proportion of the capital of the company then uncalled, such sums as they might from time to time think expedient.

The company executed certain mortgages of their property, including portions of their uncalled capital, and subsequently went into liquidation.

Held, that, the memorandum and articles of association must be read together, and that so reading them, the company had power to mortgage its uncalled capital.

Held, also, that the mortgages were valid and effectual against the unsecured creditors, notwithstanding the winding up.

Adjourned summonses.

These were three summonses raising, under circumstances which varied somewhat in detail, the question whether the mortgagees of uncalled capital were entitled to be paid, what was due on the mortgages, out of calls made in the winding up in priority to the unsecured creditors of the company.

The company was registered in 1880 with a memorandum of association, which defined the objects of the company to be (amongst others)—(l) to borrow money by mortgage or otherwise, receive money on deposit, and issue transferable and other bonds and mortgage debenture and other securities, founded or based upon all or any of the real and personal assets or on the credit of the company.

By the articles of association, which bore even date with the memorandum of association, it was provided (article 3) that the board of directors "may from time to time borrow on bonds or debentures of the company or on mortgage of all or any part of the property of the company, and either with or without including in any such mortgage all or any definite proportion of the capital of the company then uncalled, such sums of money as they from time to time think expedient."

The mortgages in question were as follows:—

1. A mortgage, dated January 3, 1882, in favour of Frederick Greenwood and John Brooke Greenwood, by which, first, all the then uncalled-up amounts of £6 per share on 3,500 preferred shares of the company; and, secondly, all the personal property, assets, and effects which then, or at any time during the continuance of the security, should belong to the company, but not including any uncalled capital of the company, except that thereinbefore expressly mentioned, were assigned to secure repayment of an advance of £2,500.

2. A mortgage dated May 3, 1886, in favour of Robert M'Ilwraith and Edward Gotto, whereby the uncalled amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares of the company were assigned by way of security against any loss or damage which M'Ilwraith and Gotto might sustain by reason of their having guaranteed to the British Linen Co.'s bank the repayment of a sum of £3,500 advanced by the bank to the company, and also guaranteed to the London and North-Western Railway Co. and to the Great Western Railway Co. the payment of such sum as might be due to those railway companies by the company for carriage of goods upon their ledger account with the railway companies.

3. A mortgage, dated August 10, 1887, in favour of Ferdinand Gautier, whereby the uncalled amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares of the company were (subject to the prior mortgages) assigned to secure an advance of £4,000.

4. A mortgage, dated October 28, 1887, in favour of Robert M'Ilwraith, whereby the uncalled amounts of £4 per share on 5,000 shares of the company were assigned, subject to the prior mortgages, to secure an advance of £3,000.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hastings, Q.C., and F. Whinney, for F. Gautier's summons.—In order to ascertain whether the mortgage is valid the memorandum must be read with the contemporaneous articles of association: In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., 44 L. J. Ch. 683, 23 W. R. Dig. 45. Reading, therefore, sub-section (l) of the memorandum with article 3 of the articles of association the company were empowered to mortgage their uncalled capital. The present case, therefore, differs from Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams, 23 W. R. 668, L. R. 6 P. C. 265, where it was held that the memorandum of association did not authorize a charge on uncalled capital. The mortgage, therefore, being valid, is not affected by the winding up: In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co.; Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 38 Ch. D. 156.

Buckley, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for M'Ilwraith and Gotto's summons, adopted the same argument.—M'Ilwraith is the holder of 583 shares and Gotto of 300 shares in the company, and the question is whether they can have a charge on calls to be paid by themselves. We submit they can. The calls here are not the property of the company, but of the mortgagees. All that the company is entitled to is the equity of redemption. Black & Co.'s case, 21 W. R. 249, L. R. 8 Ch. 254, and Grissell's case, 14 W. R. 1015, L. R. 1 Ch. 528, have no application to the present case. There is no question of set-off.

Hastings, Q.C., and F. Whinney, for Greenwoods' summons.—Greenwood, in addition to his charge on the uncalled capital, has a charge on the general assets of the company.

Gifford, Q.C., and Haldane, for the official liquidator.—In In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co. and Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co. the judges dwelt upon the fact that it was the memorandum of association which empowered the company to charge its uncalled capital. Here, although the articles do give that power, they must be controlled by the memorandum, which, by sub-section (l), limits it to personal security of the company.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and Carson, for Swan and McQueen, two unsecured creditors, who had been appointed to represent the rest.—The mortgages in question are void as against the unsecured creditors of the company. A company under the Companies Act, 1862, has no power to bind its calls made in a winding up, whatever may be its powers as regards calls made by its directors. It can only mortgage such calls as it has power to make. The power of a liquidator to make calls is independent of that of the directors, and would subsist without it. The calls so made by him constitute a fund for the special purposes of the Act. Throughout the decided cases there is a confusion between the liability of a shareholder to pay calls on his shares and that of a contributory to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of its being wound up—i.e., the liability by contract and that by statute. In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co. and Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., upon which the mortgagees rely, are inconsistent with the reasoning upon which those decisions are based, and should not be followed.

They also referred to the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, s. 38; Companies Act, 1862, ss. 16, 25, 32, 36, 38, 75, 98, 133; Companies Act, 1867, s. 11; Stanley's case, 12 W. R. 894, 4 De G. Hastings, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 13.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued:—It was laid down in Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams that the right of a company to unpaid capital "is, strictly speaking, more in the nature of power than of property; and, although that which a man has power to make his own may be charged as well as that which is actually his, it requires apt and proper words, or a sufficient context, to have this effect." It was held by Jessel, M.R., in the case of In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co. that the apt and proper words, or sufficient context, need not be found in the memorandum of association itself, and that it is sufficient if they are contained in contemporaneous articles of association. The principles on which he arrived at this conclusion are thus stated (44 L. J. Ch. 685):—"The memorandum and articles are contemporaneous documents, and the rule of construction is that if contemporaneous documents can be read in two ways, in one of which they appear consistent and in the other inconsistent, the construction is to be preferred which will render them consistent. Another principle is, that if one of two contemporaneous documents is ambiguous in its terms, but the other is clear, then force is to be given to the one whose terms are clear, so as to interpret the one containing ambiguous terms." Similar principles were acted upon by the same learned judge in the case of Harrison v. Mexican Railway Co., 23 W. R. 403, L. R. 19 Eq. 358, and, so far as they related to the matter now under consideration, do not appear to be affected by the qualifications suggested by the Court of Appeal in Guinness v. Land Corporation of Ireland, 31 W. R. 341, 22 Ch. D. 349. I propose, therefore, to act upon that.

Now the memorandum of association in the present case empowers the company "to borrow on mortgage or otherwise." Mortgage of what? The contemporaneous articles of association say, "On mortgage of all or any part of the property of the company, either with or without including in any such mortgage all or any definite proportion of the capital of the company then uncalled." Those words, read with those in the memorandum of association authorize a mortgage of uncalled capital certainly along with other property of the company to secure an advance. Further, the memorandum authorizes the issue of "mortgage debenture and other securities . . . founded on all or any of the real or personal assets or on the credit of the company." If it is conceded (as was contended in argument) that the strict or primary meaning of the word "assets" is property, and that it would not include uncalled capital in the absence of a context, still the articles of association show that uncalled capital was intended to be available as the subject-matter of a security, and I should therefore hold, if necessary, that there is here found a context sufficient to show that the word "assets," as used in the memorandum, is used in a sense which includes uncalled capital. I am of opinion, therefore, that the mortgage of the 3rd of January, 1882, which includes both uncalled capital and other property of the company, is authorized by the express terms of article 3. In the other mortgages the subject-matter of the security is uncalled capital only; and it is suggested that, as they include no part of the property of the company strictly so called, they do not fall within article 3. In my opinion, however, article 3 clearly shows an intent that the company should have power to mortgage uncalled capital.

would not include the uncalled capital. The result of that would be that a mortgage of uncalled capital alone would be invalid, whereas if it included any part, however small, of the other property of the company, it would be valid. I do not think that such a narrow construction ought to prevail, and I prefer reading the words "such mortgage" as meaning a mortgage given to secure money borrowed by the company generally. In my opinion, therefore, the mortgages of the 10th of August and the 28th of October, 1887, are within the power. There remains the question whether such a mortgage may be given by way of indemnity, as in the case of the mortgage of the 3rd of May, 1886. I postpone, however, for the present, the consideration of this question, and proceed to consider whether these charges, which I have held to be valid, are effectual against unsecured creditors as regards calls made in the winding up, it being contended that a company formed under the Companies Act, 1862, has no power to bind such calls, whatever may be its powers as regards calls made by the directors. Now, the order made in In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co., already referred to (of which I have obtained a copy), contained an expression of opinion that the mortgagees had under their mortgage a first charge on the unpaid capital of the company and on the proceeds of all future calls made and to be made on the shares in the company; and it was ordered that the liquidator should get in the unpaid capital under the direction of the judge, and should place the same and the proceeds of all future calls to be made on the shares in the company to a separate fund to be entitled "calls in respect of unpaid capital"; and the unpaid capital and the proceeds of any future calls were not to be dealt with by the liquidator without notice to the mortgagees. It therefore appears that the mortgagees were recognized and dealt with by the court as having a charge not only on calls made by the directors but on those to be made in the winding up; but no notice of any suggestion of a difference between them is to be found either in the arguments of counsel or the judgment of Jessel, M.R., as reported. A similar decision appears to have been given by Kay, J., in Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., but here also there is a like silence as to any distinction between calls made before and those made after the commencement of the winding up. It is now contended that these decisions ought not to be followed on the ground that they are inconsistent, if not with other cases binding on me, at all events with the grounds on which the decisions in those other cases are based. Before proceeding to consider those cases I may remark that in the earliest or one of the earliest cases in which the validity of a mortgage of unpaid capital was considered—viz., Stanley's case, Turner, L.J., appears to have rested his decision against the validity of the charge on the ground that it would be inconsistent with the discretion vested in the directors as to the making of calls. This, however, was set aside by Jessel, M.R., in the Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co.'s case, who relied mainly on the analogy furnished by section 38 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, which expressly confers power "to mortgage the future calls on the shareholders."

In In re Sankey Brook Coal Co., 18 W. R. 427, L. R. 9 Eq. 721, a charge was given on the proceeds of a call proposed to be, but not actually made. The call was afterwards made, but before the proceeds were got in a winding up commenced. It was held by James, L.J. (then Vice-Chancellor) that the charge was valid, and the liquidators were ordered to apply the proceeds of the call towards payment of the debt secured by the charge. I do not, however, treat this as an authority directly in favour of the mortgagees in this case; for the order made in In re Sankey Brook Coal Co. related to the proceeds, not of a call made by the liquidators, but of one made by the directors, which (as is shown by Stone v. City and County Bank, 3 C. P. D. 282, 26 W. R. Dig. 42), the liquidators had power to enforce. But it may be (and it is suggested in argument), that a directors' call so enforced is subject to charges from which a call made by the liquidator would be free. The cases on which reliance is placed in opposition to the summons are mainly Grissell's case, Black & Co.'s case, and In re Whitehouse & Co., all of which were decided on the terms of the Companies Act, 1862, and particularly on sections 16, 38 (sub-section 4), 75, 98, 101, and 133. [His lordship then read section 16, observing that it related to moneys payable in pursuance of the conditions and regulations of the company. He also read section 38, as to the liability of present and past members of a company in the event of a winding up, and sub-section (4) of that section, that in the case of a company limited by shares no contribution shall be required from any member exceeding the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares in respect of which he is liable as a present or past member. He then read section 75, as to the liability to contribute to the assets of a company in a winding up creating a specialty debt; and sections 98, 101, and 133, sub-section (1). He observed that it was plain from sections 38 and 75 that the liability under section 38 was treated in the Act as a different liability from that which was created by section 16, and that, by the first portion of section 101, contribution under section 38 was excluded from that section. He continued:—] Now, in Grissell's case the company was being wound up under supervision; calls were being made in the winding up, and the question was, What were the rights of a contributory who was also a creditor of the company? It was held that the debt could not be set off against calls, but that the contributory must first pay his calls and then he would be entitled to receive a dividend pari passu with the other creditors. Lord Chelmsford, in delivering the judgment of the court, said:—"The question depends entirely upon the construction of the Companies Act, 1862. . . . In considering the questions involved in these applications the primary intention of the Legislature in the provisions relating to the winding up of companies must be regarded. That intention is expressed in the 133rd section of the Act, as being 'that the property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and subject thereto shall, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, be distributed amongst the members according to their rights and interests in the company.'" Then later on he said:—"It appears to me to be quite clear that the amount of the call not paid cannot be set off against the debt. The Act creates a scheme for the payment of the debts of a company in lieu of the old course of issuing execution against individual members. It removes the rights and liabilities of parties out of the sphere of the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor to which the law of set-off applies. Taking the Act as a whole, the call is to come into the assets of the company, to be applied with the other assets in payment of debts. To allow a set-off against the call would be contrary to the whole scope of the Act. In support of this view it will be sufficient to refer again to the 133rd section, as to the satisfaction of the liabilities of the company pari passu." Then he proceeded to deal with section 101, upon which he relied, but to which I need not refer.

In Black & Co.'s case the company was being wound up by the court. The contributories had entered into an agreement with the company for the supply of locomotive engines, one term of which was that during the continuance of the agreement the contributories might set off against the calls upon all or any of their shares, the amount due to them from the company and for which they held the company's acceptances. It was held that this special contract as to set-off was not available as regards calls made in the winding up. What the Lord Chancellor, Lord Selborne, there said was:—"The point, therefore, which his honour has decided is simply this—that a company may contract with one of its shareholders so as to take him, in case of a winding up, out of the law laid down in Grissell's case, and give him, in substance, a right to be paid out of his own calls in preference to other creditors; which right, but for such special contract, he would not have had. It is probably enough to say that the law generally has been settled by Grissell's case upon the interpretation of the Act of Parliament, and of the rules laid down in that Act of Parliament, as to the mode in which, under a winding up, the money arising from calls is to be applied in payment of the creditors pari passu, and without preference. That case (being decided by an authority which we ought to treat as binding on ourselves, even if we doubted that it was right) has determined that in general such a set-off is not to be allowed. That decision being founded upon the interpretation of the Act of Parliament, it is very difficult to understand how it can be seriously argued that a company and one of its shareholders can, by any agreement they choose to enter into between themselves, override and relieve themselves from the operation of the Act of Parliament. The principle of the winding-up enactments is like that of the Bankruptcy Acts. . . . That being so, it is impossible to entertain the idea that if the law is as laid down in that case (i.e., Grissell's case) any company can, by any private contract, take a particular creditor, who is also a shareholder, out of the operation of that law unless the contract comes within the permissive portion of the 25th section of the Act of 1867. But in this case the course prescribed by that section has not been followed, and I do not propose to say more on the subject, except that I greatly doubt whether that Act does not supply additional reason against holding that the set-off in this case can be allowed." He then proceeded to deal with the case of Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling, 16 W. R. 361, L. R. 3 C. P. 175, decided by the Court of Common Pleas, in which it was held that the decision in Grissell's case did not apply to a company which was being voluntarily wound up, and then, after dealing with the ordinary law of set-off, he continued:—"But here the rights are substantially different. The moment that the winding up takes place, the whole administration is carried on with a view to the payment of the debts of the creditors, and, in the first instance, to payment pari passu. The different sections of the Act—those which define the liability of limited companies, the 7th, 8th, 23rd, and 38th; those which deal with the administration of assets, the 98th, the 101st, and the 133rd; those which give the power to make calls, not in the ordinary way, but specially for the purposes of this Act, the 102nd and 133rd—all have in view the payment pari passu and equally of the debts due to the creditors; and the hand which receives the calls necessarily receives them as a statutory trustee for the equal and rateable payment of all the creditors. The result of this contention, that one particular creditor may pay himself in full by retaining his own calls and not paying them, would, in effect, be to give him a preference, and to exonerate him from his obligation as a shareholder to contribute towards the payment of the debts of the other creditors." James, L.J., simply concurred, but there are a few words in Mellish, L.J.'s judgment which I desire to read. They are these:—"Then the 98th section says that the assets, which clearly include the unpaid portions of all shares, are to be applied in discharge of the liabilities. If the case stood upon that section alone it might be a very considerable question whether the meaning was not that the money was to be called up and applied among all the creditors, so that the shareholder should only receive his share of his debt; but that is, in my judgment, made quite clear by the 101st section. Although that section does not in terms say that there is to be no set-off, yet it shows that the Legislature, in framing that section, thought it had already been enacted that there should be no set-off, because in the 101st section they proceed to say that where there is unlimited liability, then, in the case of any independent contract, there may be a set-off."

In Whitehouse's case the late Master of the Rolls applied the same principles to the case of a purely voluntary winding up, notwithstanding the case in the Common Pleas of Brighton Arcade Co. v. Dowling, which had been already dealt with and doubted in Black's case. The late Master of the Rolls there, after dealing with the common law right of set-off, said:—"Before going into the details of that Act—i.e., the Companies Act, 1862—I may state the scheme of the Act as regards winding up, which was this, that the assets of the company were to be collected by the liquidator and distributed among the creditors; and in the case of an insolvent company it was very like bankruptcy; but if the assets were to be so distributed, of course, if the liquidator sued in his own name, he would not be indebted at all to the man to whom the company was indebted, and there would be no strict right of set-off. Whether that was affected or not by the provisions of the Act that enabled him to sue in the name of the company, I will consider further on. If he comes under those sections—notably, the 138th section—in a voluntary winding up, he comes in his own name as liquidator to enforce a call, and, strictly speaking, there is no actual set-off, because he is not indebted. If, therefore, you want a set-off at all, you must show some provision in the Act itself giving the right of set-off, because, in principle, there is no such right. The debt due to the liquidator is distributable among the creditors, and the debt due to the individual from the company would only rank with the view of obtaining a dividend for the creditor for the amount due." Then, after dealing with sub-section (4) of the 38th section, which I have read, he said:—"Now, first of all, as regards the calls made in the winding up, they being calls for something unpaid on the shares, that is a contribution due by the members under the Act, and is not a debt due to the company. The contribution also under this section applies to the unpaid calls made before the winding up, because, though that is a debt due to the company, it is not the less an amount unpaid on the shares, in respect of which he is liable, and therefore he must be liable to contribute all that is unpaid on his shares. As I have said before, it is as much unpaid if he had not paid the calls made before the winding up, as it is in respect of the amount unpaid on the shares, in respect of which no call has been made before the winding up." So that the Master of the Rolls thought that the principle of Grissell's case extended not merely to calls made in the winding up, but to calls made prior to the winding up.

It therefore appears that in Grissell's case and Whitehouse's case the question related to the ordinary right of set-off, and that Black's case related to a right of set-off conferred by contract. None of those cases dealt in any way with the effect of a charge given for valuable consideration. That subject is alluded to in the argument in Black's case, but not (so far as I have observed) in the judgment; and the terms of the agreement which were relied on by the contributories in that case were not apparently such as could be treated as creating an equitable assignment of the unpaid calls. In all these cases it was held that the right of set-off could not prevail—that is to say, that the liquidator was entitled to receive the calls in full, and undiminished and unaffected by any indebtedness on the part of the company to the person by whom the calls were payable. Here it is admitted that the calls are to be paid in full; the question is, how is the liquidator to apply them when received—whether pari passu among all the creditors, or in satisfaction of the debts of the mortgagees in whose favour charges have been created on the unpaid capital? Now the decisions in the three cases to which I have referred are, therefore, not in point; but reliance is placed on the language made use of in the judgments, and certainly some of the language, if taken literally, appears to be strongly in favour of the contention on the part of the general creditors. It is, however, to be borne in mind that those judgments were given with reference to cases none of which involved the consideration of the effect of a charge upon unpaid capital. Apart from decision, the argument in favour of the mortgagees is thus put:—By section 38 there is imposed the liability to contribute to the "assets of the company" in the event of its being wound up. By section 98 the court is to cause the "assets of the company to be collected and applied in discharge of its liabilities"; and by section 133 "the property of the company" (a term which has been held to have the same meaning as "assets of the company" in section 98) "shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu." The proceeds of the calls made in the winding up therefore become, as was held in Webb v. Whiffin, part of the "assets" or "property" of the company. Now, in dealing with other portions of those "assets" or that "property," the liquidator would be bound to have regard to any equitable charges duly created thereon (including, of course, such charges as were held by the House of Lords to be valid in the cases of Holroyd v. Marshall, 11 W. R. 171, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, and Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. Cas. 523), and to apply the proceeds of the realization of such specific parts of the assets first in payment of the sum due on the charge; and, secondly (and only secondly), in payment of the general creditors pari passu. It is said on behalf of the mortgagees that the like course ought to be followed with respect to the proceeds of calls made in the winding up. On the other hand, it is said on behalf of the general creditors that the language of the Act of 1862 is such as to prohibit any applications of the proceeds of calls made in the winding up in favour of specific mortgagees, and that all such proceeds must be divided pari passu among the creditors of the company. This contention appears to me to be now, for the first time, explicitly raised for judicial decision; and if it had to be decided on the language of the Act alone there might be some difficulty, but in dealing with it a court of first instance is bound, I apprehend, to have regard to the current of decision on the Act of 1862.

Now in the cases relating to set-off the courts which decided them did not place exclusive reliance on sections 38 and 133; each of them attached weight to section 101, which was treated (as is put by Mellish, L.J., in Black & Co.'s case) as showing that "the Legislature thought that it had already been enacted that there should be no set-off."

No section of the Companies Act, 1862, so conclusively negatives the validity of a charge on calls in the winding up as section 101 negatives the right of set-off. Reference was made in argument to sections 25, 26, and 32, which impose on the company the duty of giving information to the public of certain matters, and, amongst others, as to the amount of calls made on each share, the total amount of calls received, and the total amount of calls unpaid; and it was said that a member of the public proposing to deal with the company would be misled if a charge on unpaid capital of which he had no notice or means of obtaining information were held to be valid. The same argument would show that a charge on a call made, but remaining unpaid, ought not to be held valid; yet effect was given to such a charge: In re Sankey Brook Coal Co. I may also add that if the observations of Jessel, M.R., in In re Whitehouse are to be understood as applying to a charge as well as to a right] of set-off, I have difficulty in seeing how those of them which relate to calls made by directors while the company was a going concern, but remaining unpaid at the commencement of the winding up, are to be reconciled with the decision in the case of the Sankey Brook Coal Co. Again, as has been already pointed out, the validity of mortgages of future calls, when apt and proper words are used or a sufficient context is found, is recognized in the judgment delivered by James, L.J., in Bank of South Australia v. Abrahams. In that case the calls sought to be affected by the mortgage had been made in the winding up, and the distinction now sought to be drawn between calls made by directors, and calls made in a winding up cannot, I think, have commended itself to the Lord Justice, or the other eminent judges who took part in the decision. It is difficult to suppose that the Judicial Committee meant to recognize the existence of a power to create a mortgage which would fail at the moment when it was most wanted—viz., when the company had become insolvent and was being wound up—any more than that the Legislature meant to confer such power only on companies governed by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, some of which, it is to be remembered, may be wound up under the Companies Act, 1862. Looking at these circumstances, and finding two decisions in favour of the mortgagees, and having some reason to believe that the earlier cases—viz., that of In re Phœnix Bessemer Steel Co.—has been followed in chambers, and has been to a considerable extent relied on by persons dealing with joint-stock companies during the fifteen years which have elapsed since it was decided, it is enough for me to say that the weight of authority appears to me to be in favour of the contention of the mortgagees, and I therefore propose to follow the decision in the Phœnix Bessemer case. One point more under this head remains to be considered. It appears that some of the mortgagees are themselves shareholders of the company, and it was contended that, even if the mortgages were good as regards calls on the shares of third parties, they were invalid as regards calls on the mortgagees' own shares. If, however, there exists a power of mortgaging future calls, it seems to me that it must extend to calls on the shares of mortgagees as well as of other persons; and that the calls on the shares of mortgagees are as applicable in payment of the mortgagees' debt as are calls on the shares of third parties. I hold, therefore, that the claims of the mortgagees under the mortgages of the 3rd of January, 1882, the 10th of August, 1887, and the 28th of October, 1887, are well founded.

As regards the mortgage of the 3rd of May, 1886, it differs from those other three in this respect, that it is given by way of indemnity and not to secure an advance. It does not, as it appears to me, fall precisely within any of the decisions to which I have referred. I do not at present say that it is invalid, but I think it would be desirable to know something more of the circumstances under which that mortgage was given than is contained in the affidavits now before the court, and I therefore propose to postpone my decision on this part of the case until some further evidence on this point has been brought before me.

Q. B. Div. (Mathew and Wills, JJ.) Nov. 12.

KING v. CHARING CROSS BANK. (a.)

County court—Practice—Prohibition—Application at chambers—Notice of motion—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 127—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 59, r. 8a—Costs—Less than £20 recovered—Discretion of judge—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 4, r. 20—County Courts Act, 1888, ss. 119, 164.

An application for a prohibition to a county court may be made at chambers as well during sittings as in vacation, or it may be made in open court; but if the latter course is adopted notice of motion must be given.

Rule 20 of order 4 of the County Court Rules of 1889, by which a judge is allowed, in his discretion, to give costs on the higher scale on "a claim for more than £20 where less is recovered," is not affected by the 119*th section of the County Courts Act*, 1888, which gives power to a judge to award costs on the higher scale in three classes of actions there specified.

In an action brought in the Clerkenwell County Court for the sum of £29 14s. 3d., judgment was given for the plaintiff for £16 15s., with costs on the scale applicable to cases in which the amount recovered is over £20 and under £50. The county court judge made this order in his discretion, and did not certify in writing or give any specific reasons for making the order in accordance with the provisions of section 119 of 51 & 52 Vict. c. 43. The defendants thereupon applied at chambers, under section 127 of the County Courts Act, 1888, for a prohibition to the county court not to proceed on the said order, upon the ground that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make it.

Wills, J., at chambers, referred the question to the court.

R. V. Williams, Q.C., for the plaintiff, took a preliminary objection that the application at chambers was wrong, and could not be heard.—By the R. S. C., 1883, ord. 59, r. 8a, it is enacted that every application for a prohibition to a county court other than an application made by the Attorney-General shall be brought by notice of motion served on the parties to the proceedings in the county court. In this case the plaintiff has received no notice of motion, and therefore the defendants' application must fail.

Cluer, for the defendants.—The 127th section of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides that it shall be lawful for any judge of the High Court, as well during the sittings as in vacation, to hear and determine applications for writs of prohibition to any court. This section is not overruled by ord. 59, r. 8a. The object of that rule is to carry out the object of abolishing rules nisi, and it only means that if applications are made in court, then they shall be made on notice of motion instead of on application for a rule nisi.

R. V. Williams, Q.C., in reply.

MATHEW, J.—I am of opinion that applications for prohibitions to county courts may still be made in chambers, and I agree that the object of ord. 59, r. 8a, is to provide that if applications are made in court they must be made on notice of motion.

WILLS, J., concurred.

Cluer, for the defendants, on the application for a prohibition.—In this case the county court judge exceeded his jurisdiction, because rule 20 of order 4 of the County Court Rules, 1889, is really ultrâ vires, as it contradicts the 119th section of the County Courts Act, 1888. That section limits the power of the judge to award costs on the higher scale to certain particular cases, and further provides that it shall only be done by the judge certifying in writing that the case dealt with comes within the section. The rule must have been made per incuriam. It is true that by section 164 the judges are empowered to frame scales of costs, but when they have done so they are bound by them, and their powers are exhausted. The object of the section which provides that the old rules are to continue in force is only to keep them until new rules are made. It does not give the rules the force of a statute: Lumb v. Teal, 22 Q. B. D. 675, 37 W. R. Dig. 60.

R. V. Williams, Q.C., for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

MATHEW, J.—It is contended in this case that the language of rule 20 of order 4 of the County Court Rules, 1889, is inconsistent with the 119th section of the County Courts Act, 1888. I cannot assent to that proposition. The two provisions deal with different things. The rule deals with cases where the claim exceeds £20 but less is recovered, whereas the section applies to cases of an entirely different class and allows the judge to award costs on the higher scale in such cases however small the claim may be. To my mind the meaning of the language is clear. Further, the rule is not a new one, and by the 164th section of the County Courts Acts, 1888, the existing rules are to continue until otherwise provided. The argument therefore leads to this, that if the rule had not been re-enacted it would still be valid, but because it is re-enacted it is bad, which is, I think, a reductio ad absurdum.

WILLS, J.—I am unable to see why the judges who have power to frame certain scales of costs may not also say that the judge shall have power to vary the scale in certain cases according to his discretion. As to the 119th section, I do not assent to the argument that where a new statute does not appear to harmonize exactly with the existing state of things, the presumption is that the existing state of things is thereby repealed. When we find that county court judges have for many years been intrusted with the power of using their discretion in the manner provided by this rule we ought to presume that the Legislature did not intend to take away that power by a section which does not in terms repeal the rule. I find it impossible so to read the section because it applies to matters which are not dealt with by the rule. The rule applies to cases where the claim exceeds £20, the section to cases where, for instance, the plaintiff seeks to establish a right and claims it may be, no more than a shilling. To such cases the old rule did not apply, and therefore the section was enacted with the object of enlarging, and not, as the defendants contend, restricting, the power of the county court judge.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

In re SHACKLETON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Condition—Consent to judgment—Principles by which the court ought to be guided in imposing such condition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28.

In 1886 the bankrupt, who had previously been employed as an assistant to a linendraper, took over the business of a chemical manufactory, which he carried on until 1888, when he became bankrupt. On application by the bankrupt for his discharge, the official receiver reported that he had continued to trade after knowing himself to be insolvent, and had brought on his bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculations, and the county court judge granted the discharge only on the condition that the bankrupt should consent to judgment being entered against him for the sum of £4,038, being the amount of the unsecured debts provable under the bankruptcy unsatisfied at the date of the order, with costs, such judgment to remain in force until all the creditors had been paid 5*s. in the pound on their debts. The bankrupt appealed against this order, it being stated that he was a married man with four children, and that his present earnings only amounted to* £150 a year, with no prospect of an increase.

Held, that the order of the county court ought to be varied, and that a proper order under the circumstances would be that the discharge of the bankrupt be suspended for three years.

In imposing as a condition of granting a bankrupt his discharge that he shall consent to judgment being entered against him for the balance of the provable debts under section 28, sub-section (6), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the court ought to have regard to public morality and to the interests of the public generally, and, unless the court finds a man in receipt of an income which is more than sufficient to keep his family in the enjoyment of the ordinary necessities of life according to their station, or unless it is satisfied that he is likely to succeed to property, it is not a wise proceeding to grant an order of discharge subject to such a condition.

Appeal against an order made by his Honour Judge Rogers in the county court at Madeley by which the discharge of the bankrupt was granted only on the condition that he should consent to judgment being entered against him for the sum of £4,038.

The case raised an important question in respect of the principles by which the court ought to be guided in imposing, as a condition of granting a bankrupt his discharge, that he shall consent to judgment being entered against him for the balance of the provable debts, under section 28, sub-section (6), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

In 1886 the bankrupt, who previously had assisted his father as a linendraper at a salary of £3 a week, took over the business of a chemical manufactory, which he carried on until June, 1888, when he became bankrupt; the principal cause of his failure being alleged to be the refusal of the railway companies, owing to an explosion which had taken place during transit, to transport certain chemicals manufactured by him, by which he lost several valuable contracts.

On application by the bankrupt for his discharge the official receiver reported that he had committed two of the offences specified in section 28, sub-section (3), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, since he had continued to trade after knowing himself to be insolvent, and had brought on his bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculations, and the county court judge granted the bankrupt his discharge only on the condition that he should "consent to judgment being entered against him in the county court by the official receiver for the sum of £4,038, being the amount of the unsecured debts provable under the bankruptcy unsatisfied at the date of the order, with costs. Upon such consent being given, judgment to be entered accordingly, such judgment to remain in force until the creditors who have proved, or may hereafter prove, their debts in the bankruptcy shall have been paid 5s. in the pound upon the amount of such debts, together with the unpaid costs. The amount to be paid by annual instalments of £75 until the whole is discharged."

The bankrupt now appealed from that order, it being stated that he was a married man with four children, his present earnings amounting to £150 a year only, with no prospect of any increase.

E. C. Willis, Q.C., and Hextall, for the bankrupt.—The Board of Trade do not intend to support the latter part of the order appealed from, which deals with the instalments, and so the case really turns on whether the county court judge was right in making such an order of discharge, striking out the latter part. I admit that the bankrupt has traded after he knew that he was insolvent, but the fact of his so trading only deserved a nominal penalty. He has not been guilty of rash and hazardous speculations. When the bankrupt took over the chemical manufactory he was told that the business was a good one, and he entered into it fairly and honestly after seeking advice. The unforeseen accident of the explosion was the real cause of the insolvency. Even admitting the offence of trading after knowledge of insolvency, such an order as this, which puts upon the bankrupt a judgment to pay 5s. in the pound and an unlimited amount of costs, ought not to be made. This is not a case in which judgment ought to be entered at all. In Ex parte Arnaud, In re Bullen, 36 W. R. 836, Lindley, L.J., expressed a clear opinion that a bankrupt ought not to be tied up by such a judgment as this unless something is likely to be gained by it by reason of his coming into after-acquired property. Here there is no expectation that the bankrupt will have any property.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The facts of the case warrant the order which was made, as they show a very bad case of trading with knowledge of insolvency. The balance-sheets all along showed a deficiency, and the bankrupt was well aware of his position. The order is not a highly penal one, because the judgment cannot be enforced without leave of the court.

He referred to In re Clarkson, Ex parte Clarkson, 2 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 219.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be modified. It is always a question of difficulty to determine, where a bankrupt is not entitled to an absolute order of discharge, whether the order should be suspended and for how long, or whether it should be granted subject to a condition in respect of after-acquired property. In deciding that question the court ought to have regard to public morality and to the interests of the public generally, and unless the court finds a man in receipt of an income derived from his earnings or otherwise which is more than sufficient to keep his family in the enjoyment of the ordinary necessities of life according to their station, or unless it is satisfied that he is likely to succeed to property, it is not a wise thing to grant an order subject to a condition affecting after-acquired property. The court ought to be careful to see that it does not, by a condition of that sort, do away with the motive which a man has to work in his calling. If such a burden is put on a man that he can have no hope of bettering his position he will not make the effort, and few men are more easily discouraged than that class of men who become bankrupt.

If the condition is imposed on this bankrupt that he shall consent to judgment, the result might be to discourage him from trying to improve his position, and, under the circumstances of the case, I do not think it is one in which such a condition ought to be imposed. I think, however, that the discharge ought certainly to be suspended. The bankrupt has been guilty of continuing to trade after knowing himself to be insolvent and, as I have said more than once, when a man knows he is insolvent, his plain duty is to call his creditors together and leave them to decide whether he shall go on or not. It is impossible, also, to shut one's eyes to the whole circumstances of the case, and to the rash and reckless manner in which this bankrupt entered into this business, of which he knew very little, and on which he bestowed but little care and attention.

I think the order of discharge ought to be suspended, and suspended for a period of three years from the date of the order of the court below.

Charles, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have nothing to add.

Order accordingly.

Colquhoun v. Brooks. (a.)

Revenue—Income tax—Trade carried on abroad—Profits not remitted to the United Kingdom—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 39, 100, 106, 108—16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, schedule D.

A merchant residing and carrying on business in the United Kingdom, and, who, at the same time, is a partner in a totally separate business carried on in Australia, is not liable to income tax in respect of the profits of the trade in Australia which are not brought to this country.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 657, 21 Q. B. D. 52) affirmed, but for different reasons.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J., Fry, L.J., dissenting), reported in 36 W. R. 657, 21 Q. B. D. 52.

The case was stated under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, by the Income Tax Commissioners for the City of London, and the assessment was for the year ending the 5th of April, 1885.

The facts sufficiently appear in the judgments of Lords Fitzgerald and Herschell.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir E. Clarke, S.G. (A. V. Dicey with them), for the appellant.—Mr. Brooks comes within the very words of the Act, being a person residing within the United Kingdom to whom profits and gains accrue from a trade carried on elsewhere than in the United Kingdom. The whole scheme is to tax a person according to his capacity. As soon as you have got the foreigner resident here he (subject to section 39) becomes subject to this tax: Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson and Calcutta Jute Mills Co. v. Nicholson, 25 W. R. 71, 1 Ex. D. 428; Sulley v. Attorney-General, 8 W. R. 472, 5 H. & N. 711; Lloyd v. Inland Revenue, 21 Sc. L. R. 482; Attorney-General v. Coote, 4 Price, 183.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the respondent.—The contention of the appellant is against international comity, and there are insurmountable difficulties in the way. The Legislature could not have intended to exceed its jurisdiction: Maxwell on Statutes, p. 169; Cases under the Legacy and Succession Duty Acts; Attorney-General v. Cockerell, 1 Price, 165; In re Bruce, 2 Cr. & J. 436; Attorney-General v. Campbell, 21 W. R. 34n., L. R. 5 H. L. 524.

Dicey replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Aug. 9.—Lord Halsbury, C.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment prepared by Lord Herschell, and, although the question is a very difficult one, I am of opinion that the conclusion at which he has arrived is the true conclusion, and therefore I am prepared to assent to the judgment which he is about to deliver.

Lord Fitzgerald.—The defendant resides solely in England, where he is a partner in an English firm, and we may assume him to be a domiciled British subject. No question arises on his income out of his English business. He is also a partner in an Australian firm carrying on business at Melbourne, in which he has a large capital invested, and he has actually received from it in this country the sum of £3,000 on account of profits for the financial year ending the 5th of April, 1885, and on that he has paid income tax.

The case stated further finds "the amount standing to the credit of Mr. Henry Brooks in the books of the Australian firm as representing the estimated profits due to him for the year ending the 5th of April, 1885, would, if realized, amount to the sum of £9,219 in addition to the said sum of £3,000. This sum of £9,219 was arrived at by an estimate and valuation on taking of stock on a certain fixed day after deducting therefrom the estimate and valuation of the preceding year, but as a matter of fact only a portion of the amount had been actually realized. No portion of the sum of £9,219 had been received in England, or had at any time formed part of the income" of Mr. Brooks in this country.

At first sight it struck me very strongly that the defendant was chargeable here for income tax in respect of this sum of £9,219 though not actually received in this country, but as being income arising out of trade carried on in Melbourne, his share of the profits having been actually ascertained and fixed and accruing to him in this sense, that it was so completely under his control that by an act of his will he could have it actually transferred to his bankers here. There would be no hardship, and nothing dangerous or to be deprecated, in charging the defendant on his share of profits so ascertained, but the facts of the case do not warrant us doing so. On looking critically at the findings in the case it will be perceived that there is no sufficient finding to warrant us in coming to the conclusion that the profits of the Australian firm have been so ascertained for the year 1885 as to be legitimately the subject of taxation here. It is only put that the profits due to him would, if realized, amount to £9,219, a sum "arrived at by an estimate and valuation" on stock-taking, on some particular day (not stated), and "deducting therefrom the estimate and valuation of the preceding year,' also made on a day not stated, "but as a matter of fact only a portion of the amount had been actually realized." What the meaning of the word "realized" there is, I do not know. The Australian firm does not appear to carry on any portion of their business in this country. The defendant does not appear to have taken, or to take, any active part in the conduct of its business, nor are its funds remitted to him save so far as they may represent his actual, ascertained profits not required for the purposes of the business of the firm and remitted to him in this country so as to be at his disposal here as income. We are therefore remitted to and called on to decide whether the contention of the surveyor of taxes was right, that the defendant was liable to be assessed on this sum of £9,219, though he had not actually received it, nor had it actually come within the United Kingdom.

The language of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 2, schedule D, is so comprehensive that I doubt whether a net of language could be devised stronger and more apt to include the profits arising or accruing to the defendant from a business carried on elsewhere than in the United Kingdom, and must and ought to have full effect, unless we can infer from the other provisions of the particular Act, or of the code, that it was not the intention of the Legislature to tax income from trade carried on wholly and solely elsewhere than in the United Kingdom, unless and until it has actually come to the United Kingdom as the income of some person residing in the United Kingdom.

I have not only conferred with my noble and learned friends on the construction of the Income Tax Acts in reference to this special and difficult question, but I have had the great advantage also of reading and carefully considering an elaborate review of the Income Tax Acts, which is about to be delivered by Lord Macnaghten. I concur in the conclusion at which both my noble and learned friends have arrived, and I therefore confine myself to expressing concurrence in their conclusions.

There are, no doubt, insuperable difficulties in giving full effect to the universal language of the 2nd section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, and schedule D of that Act, and I am of opinion the enactment must be controlled in the manner and to the extent, which will be described by my noble and learned friends who are about to address the House — viz., that such profits derived from trade carried on entirely elsewhere than in the United Kingdom are not accessible for income tax until received here by the person entitled to them, being a resident in the United Kingdom.

Lord HERSCHELL.—This appeal arises upon a case stated by the Income Tax Commissioners. The respondent is a merchant residing in England and carrying on business there, and in respect of the profits or gains of this business he was duly assessed, and has paid the tax. He paid the tax in addition on a sum of £3,000 received by him in respect of a remittance from Australia. This sum formed part of the profits of a business carried on at Melbourne in which the respondent was a partner and had a large capital invested. The estimated profits due to him for the year in question in respect of his share of the business amounted to £9,219 in addition to the sum of £3,000 already mentioned. The surveyor of taxes contended before the commissioners that the respondent ought to be assessed, not only upon the £3,000 received in this country, but upon his entire share of the profits which accrued during the year of assessment. The commissioners rejected this contention, but stated a case for the opinion of the court. Upon the argument of this case before two learned judges of the Queen's Bench Division they were divided in opinion, but the junior judge having withdrawn his judgment to allow of an appeal, the Court of Appeal gave judgment in favour of the respondent, adopting the view of the commissioners. The solution of the question raised by the case depends entirely upon the construction to be put upon the provisions of the Income Tax Acts. The claim of the Crown is based upon the terms of schedule D, which impose the tax upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any trade, whether carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. The respondent does reside in the United Kingdom, profits did arise or accrue to him from a business carried on elsewhere than in the United Kingdom; therefore, say the learned counsel for the Crown, the case is within the very terms of the Act, and he must be held liable to assessment. I think it must be admitted that the words of the statute do, primâ facie, support this contention; for, notwithstanding the ingenious criticism to which they have been subjected by the learned counsel for the respondent in their able argument, I think that, giving to the language of the enactment its natural meaning, the facts stated do apparently bring this case within it.

It is urged, however, on behalf of the respondent, that if this construction be adopted a foreigner residing for a short time only in this country would be subjected to taxation here in respect of the whole of his business earnings in his own country or elsewhere; that so to tax him would be opposed to international comity; and that a construction which would involve such a consequence cannot be correct. I think the learned counsel for the respondent are right in saying that the result which they point out would follow in the case of a foreigner, but I do not feel satisfied that it would involve a violation of international law, and that the construction contended for by the Crown ought, on that ground, to be summarily rejected. Reliance was placed upon the decisions under the Legacy and Succession Duty Acts, which have imposed a limit upon the broad language of the enactments subjecting legacies and successions to taxation. But it must be remembered that it was necessary to put some limit upon these general terms in order to bring the matters dealt with within our territorial jurisdiction. Without such a limitation the Legacy Duty Act, for example, would have been applicable, although neither the testator nor the legatee, nor the property devised or bequeathed, was within, or had any relation to, the British dominions. A construction leading to this result was obviously inadmissible. The Income Tax Acts, however, themselves impose a territorial limit, either that the source from which the taxable income is derived must be situate in the United Kingdom, or the person whose income is to be taxed must be resident there. If the latter condition be fulfilled, I think it is competent for the Legislature to determine the measure of taxation to be applied in the case of a person so resident. At the same time I am far from denying that if it can be shewn that a particular interpretation of a taxing statute would operate unreasonably in the case of a foreigner sojourning in this country, it would afford a reason for adopting some other interpretation, if it were possible, consistently with the ordinary canons of construction.

I think it cannot be denied that, if the view put forward on the part of the Crown be correct, the incidence of the tax will be strangely anomalous. Schedule D imposes the tax upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatsoever, whether situated in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. This in terms would apply to all such profits and gains, whether they found their way to this country or not. But by section 100 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35 the duties thus imposed are to be charged according to certain rules. One of these relates to the duty to be charged in respect of interest arising from securities in the British plantations in America or many other of her Majesty's dominions outside Great Britain (for which may now be read the United Kingdom) and foreign securities. The duty to be charged in respect of these is directed to be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums which have been or will be received in the United Kingdom in the current year. Another of these rules, styled the 5th case, prescribes the duty to be charged in respect of poscessions in the British plantations of America or in any other of her Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom and foreign possessions. The duty in respect of these is to be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom, computing them on an average of the three preceding years. It is clear, therefore, that, as regards income arising from investments or from possessions outside the United Kingdom, the tax is only to fall upon so much of the income as is received in this country. I reserve what I have to say about the word "possessions," but I desire to point out that if the contention of the Crown be well founded, whilst the taxation of what I will term foreign income arising from the sources mentioned, is limited to the amount which finds its way here, there is no such limit in the case of foreign income arising from a trade or profession or employment carried on abroad, the whole of which is subject to taxation, though no part of it ever reaches this country. No reason has, or can be, suggested for so startling a difference. The distinction between the income from property such as a sugar plantation in the West Indies and from a business carried on there would often be a very fine one; and why a person interested in the latter should be burdened with taxation, of which a person interested in the former is free, was beyond the ingenuity of the learned counsel for the Crown to explain. Indeed, in this very case, if the business in which the respondent is a partner were disposed of to a joint-stock company, and he retained his interest in the form of shares in that company, though the annual return to him might be precisely the same, he would, I take it, be clearly free from the taxation it is now sought to impose. I am quite aware that there are inequalities in the incidence of the income tax, and that the anomalies I have pointed out, glaring though they be, will not avail the respondent if the taxation be imposed by the clear language of the statute. But Lord Blackburn, who pointedly dwelt upon this in the case of Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 29 W. R. 717, 6 App. Cas. 315, said:—"The object of thus framing a Taxing Act is to grant to her Majesty a revenue. No doubt they would prefer, if it were possible, to raise the revenue equally from all, and, as that cannot be done, to raise it from those on whom the tax falls with as little trouble and annoyance and as equally as can be contrived, and when any enactments for the purpose can bear two interpretations, it is reasonable to put that construction upon them which will produce these effects."

It is beyond dispute too, that we are entitled, and indeed bound, when construing the terms of any provision found in a statute, to consider any other parts of the Act which throw light upon the intention of the Legislature, and may serve to show that the particular provision ought not to be construed as it would be if considered alone and apart from the rest of the Act. It is contended by the respondent that if we thus seek the aid to be derived from other provisions of the Income Tax Acts we shall be led to the conclusion that the view presented by the appellant is erroneous.

In the first place it is said that, although elaborate machinery is provided for carrying out the taxing purposes of the Act, none of it is applicable to the assessment of the profits of a trade carried on entirely outside the United Kingdom, no part of which is received here. If this be correct, it certainly goes far to show that the Legislature cannot have intended to tax such profits. The 106th section of the Act provides, first, for the assessment of "every householder, except persons engaged in any trade, manufacture, profession, or employment." It next deals with the case of "every person" so engaged, and enacts that he is to be chargeable by the commissioners acting for the parish or place where such trade, manufacture, profession, or employment is carried on or exercised, whether it be carried on or exercised wholly or in part in Great Britain. It next provides that every person not being a householder nor engaged in any trade or profession, who shall have a place of ordinary residence shall be charged by the commissioners acting for the place where he shall ordinarily reside. Lastly, it deals with every person "not hereinbefore described." He is to be charged in the place where he resides at the time of beginning to execute the Act in each year. The counsel for the Crown argued that the respondent fell within this last category. But I think this argument cannot be sustained. He certainly is a person engaged in a trade within the earlier description, and therefore cannot be included in a class not thereinbefore described. And there is no other provision to be found in the statute which seems to apply to the case of profits derived from a trade carried on entirely outside the United Kingdom. The 108th section enacts that the duty to be assessed in respect of the profits or gains arising from foreign possessions or foreign securities, "or in the British plantations in America or in any other of her Majesty's dominions," may be assessed by the commissioners acting for London, Bristol, Liverpool, and Glasgow according to the regulations mentioned "as if such duty had been assessed upon the profits or gains arising from trade or manufacture carried on in such places respectively." It further provides that the assessment is to be made by the commissioners acting for such of the said places at or nearest to which the property shall have been first imported into Great Britain, or at or nearest to which the person who shall have received remittances or money arising from property not imported resides. I think that in this section, if anywhere, one would have expected to find a provision dealing with the profits of a business carried on outside the United Kingdom, the more so as the assessment referred to in the section is to be made by the commissioners as if it had been upon the profits of "a trade or manufacture" carried on in London and the other places named. But it is admitted that this section is confined to property or money brought to this country; it affords no aid therefore to the present appellant, though I shall have to ask your lordships to consider presently whether, upon the true construction of the statute, it does not cover the case with which we have to deal.

For the reasons I have given I think the respondent has successfully shown that the Act has not provided the requisite machinery for assessing the duty on trade profits arising and remaining abroad, which is strong to show that it was not intended to tax them. But the difficulty of the appellant does not end here. The Act prescribes certain rules for ascertaining the duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade. One of these rules provides that the computation of duty arising in respect of any trade carried on by two or more persons jointly shall be made and stated jointly and in one sum, and it designates the partner who is to make the return on behalf of himself and the other partner or partners, which is to be sufficient to charge the partners jointly. It further provides that no separate statement shall be made "in the case of any partnership," except for the partners separately claiming an exemption or accounting for separate concerns, and that if no such claim is made then such assessment shall be made jointly according to the amount of the profits and gains of the partnership. Now it is not pretended that the whole of the profits of the Australian firm are assessable. The shares of the Australian partners clearly cannot be taxed. Yet where is there any provision for a separate statement and assessment such as the Crown contend for here? If the result of rejecting the argument presented on behalf of the Crown were to land your lordship in the conclusion that profits arising from a business carried on abroad, even though received here, were not subject to the tax it would present a formidable obstacle to yielding to the argument of the respondent, though I am not sure that the difficulties you would have to encounter in refusing your assent to it would not even then be greater. But I do not think your lordships are driven to this conclusion. The rule, styled the fifth case, which I have already referred to, deals with the duty to be charged in respect of possessions in any of her Majesty's dominions out of Great Britain and foreign possessions. Now the word "possessions" is not used in the part of the schedule D which describes the subjects of the tax. Speaking generally, they are defined to be the profits arising from property and those arising from trades and professions. When therefore the term "possessions" is employed it seems to indicate an intention to cover by it something more than "property." And it is difficult to see why, unless the intention were to embrace something more, the latter word was not used. "Possessions" is a wide expression; it is not a word with any technical meaning; the Act supplies no interpretation of it. And I cannot see why it may not fitly be interpreted as relating to all that is possessed in her Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom, or in foreign countries. And if so I do not think any violence would be done to the language if it were held to include the interest which a person in this country possesses in a business carried on elsewhere. So to construe the Act would have the advantage of removing the glaring anomaly to which I have referred, as inevitably flowing from the rival construction, and of taxing alike such portion only of the profits arising abroad, whether from property or trade, as is received in the United Kingdom.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is greatly fortified by a consideration of the 39th section of the Act, which provides that no person who shall actually be in Great Britain for some temporary purpose only, and not with any view or intent of establishing his residence therein, and shall not actually have resided in Great Britain for six months in one year, shall be charged with the duties mentioned in schedule D as a person residing in Great Britain in respect of the profits or gains received from or out of any possessions in any of her Majesty's dominions, or any foreign possessions, or from securities in any of her Majesty's dominions or foreign securities, but that every such person shall after such residence for such space of time be chargeable to such duties. The object of this enactment is plain. The Act contains no definition of the words "a person residing," and it was therefore apprehended that they might be held to embrace a foreigner sojourning in this country for a brief time, and for a temporary purpose only. It accordingly exempts such a person from taxation; the duties are only to be chargeable after a residence of six months. But from what does it exempt him? Only from moneys received here from foreign or colonial possessions. If the construction we are asked by the appellant to put on the statute be correct, a foreigner temporarily sojourning here for less than six months, though not liable to taxation even on the moneys transmitted to this country arising from his foreign possessions, is not exempted from liability in respect of the entire profits arising from a business carried on abroad, though not a penny of it be received here. That a foreigner in such circumstances should be bound to make a statement of these trade profits and be assessed upon them would be so unreasonable that I think a construction of the statute leading to such a result should be rejected unless no other be possible. It was indeed said by the appellant that a foreigner so situated would not be within the description of a person "residing" in this country. But if so, there was no need for the exemption which assumes that the person dealt with would otherwise be chargeable, and it would be difficult to resist the argument that except so far as he was exempted he was intended to be charged with the duties imposed by the Act. The whole section points, to my mind, strongly to the conclusion that moneys received in this country arising from possessions or securities outside its limits were supposed to be the only portion of what I have termed foreign income which was taxable.

I do not think it necessary to dwell on the case of the Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson, on which much reliance was placed in support of this appeal. The head office, and therefore the principal place of business, of the companies whose income was under consideration was in England, and the argument turned principally upon where those companies resided. I need not stop to inquire whether the facts raised the same question as your lordships have to determine. It is quite certain that the important considerations which have been pressed in argument upon this House were not present to the minds of the learned judges who took part in these decisions, and they cannot, therefore, be regarded as authorities determining the question.

I do not pretend to say that any construction of the Act is free from difficulty, or to deny that some anomalies may possibly result from that which I advise your lordships to adopt, but it appears to me to be the one least open to objection and which is most in accordance with the intention of the Legislature so far as I can gather it from the provisions of the Acts taken as a whole. For these reasons I think the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This is a case of great importance and no little difficulty, but after the assistance afforded by the very able and elaborate arguments of counsel, I cannot say that I have any doubt as to what the decision ought to be.

The case raises the question whether a person resident in the United Kingdom and engaged in a trade carried on entirely abroad, is liable to income tax in respect of all the profits of that trade, or only in respect of so much of those profits as may be brought to this country, either in kind or money. The trading in the present case was carried on at Melbourne, in Australia. The business was a partnership business, but I apprehend the question would have been the same if no one but the respondent had been interested in the concern.

Many topics which were discussed, and properly discussed, at considerable length during the argument may, I think, be laid aside. It does not appear to me that any light is thrown upon the question by considering the Legacy Duty Acts or the Succession Duty Act, or the decisions on those statutes. Nor do I think that any assistance can be gained by referring to one or two cases in which, perhaps, the question was involved or suggested, but did not receive much attention. Nor is there, I think, any room for the argument that the expression "arising or accruing to any person" in the first sentence of schedule D. means "received by any person in the United Kingdom." Moreover, although the contention on the part of the Crown, if carried to its legitimate conclusion, would certainly lead to startling results in the case of a foreigner temporarily resident in this kingdom, I do not think that even those results are so plainly at variance with what is due to the comity of nations as to compel your lordships summarily to reject that contention without considering carefully what the Legislature has actually said. And, certainly, however unreasonable the consequences in other cases may be, there is nothing, I think, so very unreasonable in taxing a British subject who resides permanently in this country on the whole of his income, whether he chooses to bring it home or not.

It seems to me that the question must be determined on a consideration of the language of the Income Tax Acts, under which the claim is made, with such assistance as may properly be derived from a reference to Acts in pari materia. And I think that the question after all really lies in a narrow compass. Does the case fall within the "first case" of schedule D. in the Income Tax Act of 1842, and under the head of "Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade, not contained in any other schedule of this Act"; or does it fall within the "fifth case" under the head of "The duty to be charged in respect of possessions in Ireland, or in the British plantations in America, or in any other of her Majesty's dominions out of Great Britain and foreign possessions"? Or, to put the question more shortly still, what is the meaning of the term "possessions" in the "fifth case" of schedule D. and in other places in the Act where it is used in the same connection?

In order to determine this question it is not, I think, immaterial to refer to the earlier Income Tax Acts, from which the existing Acts are more or less copied.

The Income Tax Acts of 1806 and 1803, in regard to the question before your lordships, differ so little, if they differ at all, from the Acts now in force, that I may pass them by and turn at once to the original Act, the Act of 1799 (39 Geo. 3, c. 13).

By that Act certain rates and duties therein specified were to be raised "throughout the kingdom of Great Britain upon all income arising from property in Great Britain belonging to any of his Majesty's subjects, although not resident in Great Britain; and upon all incomes of every person residing in Great Britain, and of every body politic or corporate, or company, fraternity, or society of persons (whether corporate or not corporate) in Great Britain, whether any such income as aforesaid shall arise from lands, tenements, or hereditaments, wheresoever the same shall be situate in Great Britain or elsewhere, or from any kind of personal property or other property whatever, or from any profession, office, stipend, pension, employment, trade, or vocation."

Section 77 enacted, in order that the estimates of annual income chargeable by virtue of the Act might be made according to known rules, and with as much uniformity as the respective cases would admit, that in all cases the income chargeable by virtue of that Act should be estimated according to the rules and directions prescribed by that Act and the schedule thereunto annexed as far as the same respectively were applicable to such income, and in all cases where the same were not applicable, then according to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person making the return.

Commissioners, to be styled commercial commissioners, "to ascertain the income of persons engaged in trade and manufacture" were to be appointed for certain districts, and it was enacted (section 102) that income from property in the American plantations, and imported into Great Britain, might be ascertained by the commercial commissioners for London, Bristol, Liverpool, and Glasgow in the same manner as if such income had arisen from trade or manufactures carried on in such places respectively; and (section 103) that incomes received in Great Britain arising from property of persons in such plantations not imported into Great Britain might be also ascertained in like manner.

The schedule to the Act, in accordance with which the income chargeable by virtue of the Act was to be estimated, contains a collection of "cases" and "rules" not differing much from the "cases" and "rules" in the schedules to the present Income Tax Acts. It is headed "Rules for Estimating the Income to arise within the Current Year of Persons to be Assessed under the Act of the 39th Year of his present Majesty." These cases and rules are arranged under four divisions, which are as follows:—"I. Income arising from lands, tenements, and hereditaments. II. Income arising from personal property and from trades, professions, offices, pensions, stipends, employments, and vocations. III. Income arising out of Great Britain. IV. Income not falling under any of the foregoing rules."

Division III. is divided into two headings. "Seventeenth Case. 1st. From foreign possessions," where "the full amount of the actual net income received in Great Britain" was to be estimated according to the year immediately preceding, or the average of the three preceding years. "Eighteenth Case." "2nd. Money arising from foreign securities," where the annual income was to be estimated according to the produce of the preceding year, or the expected produce of the current year.

It cannot, I think, be doubted that "foreign securities" are a class of foreign possessions, and that "money arising from foreign securities" was included in a separate sub-division merely because the income chargeable was to be estimated on a slightly different basis. It is obvious that the subjects comprised in the two sub-divisions, whether the second is properly a separate sub-division or not, were meant to exhaust the whole category described in Division III.—"income arising out of Great Britain." Now it can hardly be supposed that the framers of the Act could have overlooked the possibility that "income arising out of Great Britain" might include income arising from trade carried on abroad. Indeed, in the very case mentioned in sections 102 and 103, the case of income arising from property in British plantations in America, the income in produce or money would certainly, for the most part, be income arising from concerns in the nature of trade; and those sections show that that income was to be estimated in the manner in which "income from foreign possessions" was by the schedule directed to be estimated. I am therefore forced to the conclusion that in the expression "foreign possessions," as used in the Act of 1799, the word "possessions" is to be taken in the widest sense possible, as denoting everything that a person has as a source of income.

I now come to the Act of 1842, and I think it is only necessary to refer to a very few sections of that Act. For convenience sake, I will take the Act of 1842 as it stood before the passing of the Act of 1853, which substituted "the United Kingdom" for "Great Britain," and I will treat the case as if the Income Tax Acts had not been extended to Ireland.

The income of the respondent from his business in Melbourne, whether he is to be charged in accordance with the contention of the Attorney-General or not, undoubtedly comes under schedule D, and undoubtedly the portion of schedule D which is contained in schedule 2 of the Act of 1842 is expressed in the most comprehensive terms possible; and, if not restrained or limited by what follows, would operate to charge the respondent in respect of the whole of his Melbourne income. I do not, however, agree with the argument urged at the bar, that the rest of schedule D which is found in section 100 is mere machinery, or a mere collection of examples, not diminishing the generality of the earlier part of the schedule, but intended only to furnish a guide where the particular rule applies.

The whole schedule must be read together. Every case that can possibly happen under schedule D is enumerated in section 100. For every case which cannot be brought under one or other of the first five cases must fall under the "sixth case." Unquestionably the rules applicable to a particular "case" may cut down, and cut down very materially, the charging words in the earlier part of schedule D. For instance, it cannot I suppose be denied that foreign securities are a "kind of property situate elsewhere than in Great Britain." By the earlier part of schedule D the rates and duties chargeable in respect thereof would be so much for every 20s. of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing therefrom. But the rules under the "fourth case" limit the charge to the amount received in Great Britain.

It seems to me that the profits or gains from the respondent's Melbourne business might be held to fall either under the "first case" or under the "fifth case" if one looked to nothing more than the language of those two "cases." The "first case" deals with "duties to be charged in respect of any trade . . . not contained in any other schedule." In its terms no doubt that would include the respondent's business at Melbourne as well as his business in London. The second rule of the "first case" declares that "the said duty is to extend to every person, body politic or corporate, . . . or society, and to every . . . concern carried on by them respectively in Great Britain or elsewhere, except such concerns as are mentioned in schedule A." Again in its terms this rule points to a business carried on out of Great Britain, as well as to one carried on in Great Britain. But then when one tries to apply the rules and provisions of the Act relating to profits and gains from trades to a trade carried on exclusively abroad one gets into hopeless difficulties. If it is a partnership business, as this is, the return is to be made by the senior partner resident in Great Britain. But then the partner is to make the return "on behalf of himself and the other partner or partners," and his return is "sufficient authority to charge such partners jointly" and "no separate statement" is to be allowed in any case of partnership except for "the purpose of the partners separately claiming an exemption" or "of accounting for separate concerns."

Then, again, the computation of the duty to be charged in respect of any concern in the nature of trade is to be made exclusive of the profits or gains arising from lands occupied for the purpose of such concern. That rule hardly seems applicable to a foreign mine or a sugar plantation in the West Indies.

Then, again, by section 106, every person engaged in any trade is to be chargeable by the commissioners acting for the parish or place where the trade is carried on, whether such trade is exercised wholly or in part only in Great Britain. And there are other provisions which it is not necessary to go through, which seem to show that the "first case," though clearly applying to a trade carried on partly abroad and partly in Great Britain, was not intended to apply to a trade carried on exclusively abroad.

Turning now to the "fifth case," I ask, why are not the respondent's profits and gains from his Melbourne business within the "fifth case"? What is the meaning of the term "possessions" in that "case"? The word "possessions" is not a technical word. It seems to me that it is the widest and most comprehensive word that could be used. Why, for instance, should not "possessions in Ireland" mean everything, every source of income that the person chargeable has in Ireland, whatever it may be? Why should not "profits from possessions out of Great Britain," which is to be found in schedule G., No. XI., and recalls the expression "income out of Great Britain" in the Act of 1799, mean profits from every source of income abroad? I use the expression "source of income" because it is as a source of income that the Act contemplates and deals with property and everything else that a person chargeable under the Act may have, and the Act itself, in section 52, uses the expressions, "sources chargeable under the Act," and "all the sources contained in the said several schedules," as describing everything in respect of which the tax is imposed.

There are two sections in the Act to which I will refer as showing that the word "possessions" must have this meaning.

Take the 39th section. Under that section an Irishman who happened to be in Great Britain for some temporary purpose only, and not with any intent of establishing his residence there, and whose actual residence in Great Britain did not amount to a period of six months in any one year, was "not to be charged with the said duties mentioned in schedule D. as a person residing in Great Britain in respect of the profits or gains received from or out of any possessions in Ireland," or "from securities in Ireland." He was not even to be charged in respect of his receipts in Great Britain from those sources. It could not be suggested that, as a temporary resident for less than six months, he was to be charged in respect of any gains or profits from an Irish source which were not received in Great Britain. But there the section goes on to say that after six months' residence "such person is to be chargeable to the said duties," that is, to the duties "in respect of the profits or gains received from or out of any possessions in Ireland," or "from securities in Ireland." Now if profits and gains from an Irish business be not included in profits and gains from possessions in Ireland, it is certainly very singular that no mention of them is to be found in section 39. It cannot be supposed that the presence in England of an Irishman engaged in business in Ireland was so rare a thing that it escaped the attention of the framers of the Act. Nor can it, I think, be supposed that a person made liable as a temporary resident in Great Britain by reason of six months' residence there was intended to escape altogether from the payment of income tax upon receipts of his Irish business. Yet what would there be to charge him if the appellant is right? The only way to give a rational meaning to section 39 is to construe the expression "possessions in Ireland" as including every source of Irish income other than Irish securities which the person made chargeable by the section may happen to possess.

Section 106 seems to me to point clearly in the same direction. It explains in what districts the duties contained in schedule D are to be charged. After dealing minutely with the case of persons carrying on business either wholly or partly in Great Britain, it provides for the duty to be assessed in respect of the profits or gains arising from possessions or securities in Ireland, and there again there is no mention of profits or gains arising from trade or business in Ireland, and no provision for the place where such profits or gains are to be assessed, unless they are to be taken to be included in the expression "possessions in Ireland." If not so included, the omission to mention them in that section is the more extraordinary because the greater part of the section is occupied with the subject of profits and gains from trade.

It is obvious, too, I think, that if the expression "possessions in Ireland" be given a narrower meaning than that I have suggested as its proper meaning endless difficulties would arise. However much you narrow the meaning of the word "possessions," you cannot narrow it so far as to exclude all trades or concerns in the nature of trade.

Even in the rule applicable to the "fifth case" there is, I think, an indication that the case covers profits from foreign trades. It will be observed that the only deduction or abatement allowed is that allowed in the "first case." On referring to the first case it will be found that that deduction or abatement is one applicable, and only applicable, I think, to the case of a trade.

Upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that the profits and gains arising from the respondent's Melbourne business fall under the "fifth case" of schedule D, and are chargeable accordingly on the actual sums received in the United Kingdom; and consequently I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 851, 21 Q. B. D. 276) affirmed, but on different grounds.

These appeals, which were heard together, depended upon the construction of sections 34 and 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), which are as follows:—

Section 34.—"Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise; provided that an order of removal in respect of a settlement acquired under this section shall not be made upon the evidence of the person to be removed, without such corroboration as the justices or court think sufficient."

Section 35.—"No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another.

"An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement.

"If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born."

In the first appeal—Reigate Union v. Croydon Union, 35 W. R. 824, 19 Q. B. D. 385—a special case had been stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, on appeal against an order of two justices of the county of Surrey, made under section 97 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, adjudging the place of the last legal settlement of Edith Scully, a pauper, to be in the hamlet of Penge in the Croydon Union. This order was made on the 8th of May, 1886, upon the application of the Reigate Union. Edith Scully, the pauper (who was a lunatic), was born in 1875, and was under sixteen when the order was made. She was the daughter of Richard Scully and Emma his wife. Emma Scully was born in the parish of Reigate in the Reigate Union, which was her maiden settlement, and she never acquired any subsequent settlement in her own right. Her husband, Richard Scully, whilst resident with her, acquired in 1878 a settlement in the hamlet of Penge in the Croydon Union, and Emma Scully and Edith took the settlement of Richard Scully. None of them ever acquired any subsequent settlement. Richard Scully went to Gibraltar in 1881, where he was joined by his wife in 1881, and she resided there ever since. Richard Scully died at Gibraltar in 1881.

The Queen's Bench Division quashed the order of the justices, and this was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The Reigate Union appealed.

In the second appeal—Highworth and Swindon Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union—the facts will be found stated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, reported 36 W. R. 422, and in the judgment of Lord Watson.

The pauper became chargeable to the Westbury-on-Severn Union in September, 1886, and an order was obtained for her removal to the Highworth and Swindon Union, the birthplace and last legal settlement of her father and the pauper. The Queen's Bench Division (Stephen and Charles, JJ.) quashed the order of removal. This was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The Highworth and Swindon Union appealed.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellants.—The residence of a child with its parents is sufficient for the acquisition of a settlement under section 34: Reg. v. Elvet, 7 W. In the third appeal—Medway Union v. Bedminster Union, 36 W. R. 851, 21 Q. B. D. 278—an order of justices had been made for the removal of Caroline Baker with her three children (all under six) from the Bedminster Union to the Medway Union as the place of their last legal settlement. Caroline Baker had resided in the parish of Gillingham, in the Medway Union, continuously, together with her husband, for upwards of three years immediately before his death, in 1886, and she continued to reside there as a widow for three months after. Subsequently the widow and children became chargeable to the Bedminster Union.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Lopes, L.JJ.) had affirmed the decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.), which affirmed the order of removal.

The Medway Union appealed.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and R. B. Kinglake, for the appellants.—The question arises under section 34. A wife cannot acquire a settlement for herself. Wife in section 35 does not include widow: Reg. v. Overseers of Manchester, 30 W. R. 247, 8 Q. B. D. 50; Giles v. Eversley Blackwater, 1 Stra. 580.

Sir E. Clarke, in reply.

The House took time for consideration in the three appeals.

Aug. 8.—Lord Halsbury, C.—In the case of the Reigate Union v. The Croydon Union an order has been made by the justices of Surrey adjudging the settlement of a lunatic pauper in the respondent union. The lunatic was, at the time of the order, under sixteen years of age, and was the daughter of a father who was settled in the respondent union. The mother's maiden settlement was in the appellant union, and was a settlement by birth, and since her husband's death five years before the order appealed against, she had acquired no settlement in her own right.

Under these circumstances no question could have arisen under the law as it stood before the passing of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61. But it is said that section 35 of that Act has altered the law in respect of the wife's retaining the settlement with which, by marriage, she has become invested.

At first sight it seems strange that when the express language of the section, relied upon to effect this change, excepts from its operation the case of a wife's settlement derived from her husband, it should be supposed that these words have been construed to make the very change which the ordinary meaning of those words would seem to be expressly intended to prevent. But the reasoning appears to be this—that the word "wife" imports a living husband, because the appropriate word for a woman whose husband is dead is "widow," and the same section speaks of a "widowed mother."

Whether the words "derived from the husband" is the most strictly accurate language to describe the status which the wife acquires upon marriage I will not stay to inquire, since, whatever be the true construction of the section, it is obvious that the Legislature has used the phrase in relation to that subject; but, assuming it to be accurate, one cannot but inquire in what other way could the exception be worded so as to preserve to the widow the rights which she had acquired as a wife.

Neither in this nor in any other branch of the law does the status acquired by the wife in marriage terminate with the death of the husband, though it is by being a wife she acquires it, and certainly not as a widow.

If the Legislature was pointing to the rights acquired by marriage it must use the word "wife," since it was only as a wife that those rights could be acquired. The reason for the use of the words "widowed mother" in the same section was obvious enough. If the child's father was alive it would take its father's settlement; but if the father were dead, then its mother's, who in that case would be a "widowed mother."

I am therefore very clearly of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal was wrong, and that the appellants are entitled to succeed. I move your lordships accordingly.

For the same reasons I think that in the third case—viz., the Medway Union v. Bedminster Union—the order appealed from ought to be affirmed.

In that case the husband of the pauper—the father of the children—was settled in the parish of Gillingham, it is immaterial to inquire how. Upon his death the wife retained his settlement, and with her children subsequently became chargeable to the Bedminster Union, never having herself any other settlement than that in the parish of Gillingham. I think they were therefore properly removed to that parish, and I move your lordships that the appeal from the judgment affirming the propriety of that removal be dismissed with costs.

The second case, that of the Highworth and Swindon Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union, I think is concluded by the authority of Lord Campbell, C.J., and Erle and Wightman, JJ., which I should be very sorry to see disturbed. I agree with Stephen and Charles, JJ., that the case of Reg. v. Elvet determines, and rightly determines, the question in debate.

The pauper had, for more than the necessary period of residence, acquired a status of irremovability, and so was "settled" in the parish of Rhydgwern. It is true that during a part of that period she was under sixteen years of age, and it is true that if it be assumed, as it was by the Court of Appeal, that unemancipated residence will not suffice, then she had not accomplished the necessary period of emancipated residence. The statute knows no such distinction. It makes the emancipated and unemancipated equally irremovable, and, if so, the periods of emancipated and unemancipated residence may be put together.

It is clear, therefore, that in this case there was for more than three years a status of irremovability in each of the three years, and therefore the pauper acquired a settlement, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division is right.

I accordingly move your lordships to reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division; that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division be restored; and that the respondents do pay to the appellants the costs both here and below.

Lord WATSON.—These appeals, which were heard together, all depend upon the construction of the leading clauses of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), relating to the settlement of paupers. I think it will be convenient, first of all, to indicate my own views with regard to the meaning and effect of the 34th and 35th sections of the statute, and then to deal with their application to the particular facts of each case.

The interpretation of section 34 is not attended with difficulty, and has not given rise to any serious difference of opinion in the Courts below. The Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, provided that (subject to certain conditions as to quality of residence, &c.) no person should be removable from a parish in which he had resided for the five years immediately preceding the application for a warrant of removal. The period of three years was substituted for that of five by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, s. 1, which also enacted that residence for the requisite period in any part of a union should have the same effect as residence in a single parish within it. The length of residence necessary to confer the privilege of irremovability was, by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8, reduced to one year. Such was the statutory rule with respect to irremovability at the time when the Act of 1876 was passed. Section 34 does not trench upon the previous law regarding irremovability, but creates a new species of settlement by residence. It enacts that a person who resides in a "parish" for three consecutive years shall, if his residence during each of these years has been such as would, in accordance with the statutes already referred to, render him irremovable, be "deemed to be settled therein" until he acquires a new settlement in another parish by a like residence or otherwise.

Section 35 contains three separate clauses, the first of which abolishes derivative settlement, subject to certain exceptions in the cases of married women and legitimate children; the second gives to illegitimate children the right to retain their mother's settlement until they acquire another; and the third imposes a limitation upon the provisions of the two preceding clauses in favour of children by enacting that, in certain events, the child, whether legitimate or illegitimate, is not to have the benefit of its parent's settlement when that settlement is itself derivative.

The provisions made by way of exception in the first of these clauses, with respect to the derivative settlements of married women and legitimate issue, have occasioned much difference of opinion. Since the passing of the Act there have been numerous decisions upon the import of the exceptions by divisional courts and in the Court of Appeal; but these authorities are marked by such a degree of fluctuation and inconsistency that I do not think any advantage can be gained by referring to them. I may observe, however, that the structure of the clause, which begins with the sweeping declaration that "no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise," has induced many of the learned judges to favour a construction of the excepted cases, which appears to me to be unduly severe. The language used by the Legislature to describe the exceptions is not per se definitive, and is only intelligible by reference to the pre-existing law applicable to settlements by marriage or parentage. The fact that the Legislature has resorted to the convenient form of first abolishing the whole, and then excluding what it was intended to retain, does not necessitate a narrow reading of the exceptions. These ought, in my opinion, to be construed according to their ordinary and natural meaning, just as if they had stood alone or had been positive enactments.

The words of exception are:—"Except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father, or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it acquires another."

The settlement which "a wife" derives "from her husband" is expressly saved, and that in terms which aptly describe a woman's settlement by marriage according to the previous law, one quality of which was that it adhered to her after her husband's death until she acquired a new settlement. But it has been held in some of the decided cases that the use of the word "wife" implies that a "widow" is no longer to take a settlement from her husband, but loses it immediately on his decease, a view which is said to be confirmed by contrasting "wife" with "widowed mother" as used in relation to the settlement of children under the age of sixteen. The result of that construction is, that on the father's death the widowed mother at once reverts to her maiden settlement, to which the children in nonage also become chargeable. I can find nothing in the language of the clause to warrant the inference that it was intended to deprive a widow of the benefit of her husband's settlement, and to throw the burden of supporting her and their family upon the parish of her birth until she acquires a new settlement. The marriage settlement of a widow was that which she took, not as a widow from a dead husband, but as a wife from her living husband—in other words, the settlement which she retained after his death was one derived by a wife from a husband, and is, therefore, within the precise words of the exception.

So far as it concerns the settlement of lawful children, the clause introduces a very important alteration of the law. It puts an end to all nice questions as to emancipation or non-emancipation by enacting that, on attaining the age of sixteen, every child shall, without regard to its physical or mental capacity, cease to follow its parent's settlement and become capable of acquiring a settlement in its own right. The clause leaves the old law applicable to parentage settlements unchanged in all other respects. The words, "or of its widowed mother, as the case may be," do not, in my opinion, amount to a declaration that the child must, on its father's death, at once shift to the maiden settlement of its mother. They obviously refer to the existing law, and are perfectly intelligible as referring to the well-known rule that, after the death of the father, unemancipated children take the benefit of any primary settlement which their widowed mother may acquire for herself.

The 2nd clause of section 35 enacts that "an illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement." It had already been enacted by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71, that such a child shall have and follow the settlement of its mother until it attains the age of sixteen or acquires a settlement in its own right; and it had been decided in Bodenham v. St. Andrew, Worcester, that, by virtue of that enactment, a bastard only retained its mother's settlement until sixteen, and after that age was removable to the parish of its birth. It was also decided in Reg. v. St. Mary, Newington, that, under the Act of William, a bastard under sixteen took, not only such settlements as its mother might acquire in her own right, but also (in that respect differing from a lawful child) the settlement of any husband whom she might marry. Making due allowance for the differences arising from the circumstance that in law a bastard has no father, the practical effect of the second clause of section 35 is to place illegitimate, as nearly as may be, on the same footing with legitimate children.

The third clause applies to children of both classes. It enacts that:—"If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or, being a female, shall not have acquired a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born." The object of the enactment is to impose a limit upon parentage settlements by double derivation, by providing that children emancipated shall not retain their derivative parentage settlement where the settlement of their parent is also derivative, but shall, in the event of their becoming paupers without having acquired a new settlement, be chargeable to the parish of their birth. The provisions of the clause have, in my opinion, no application to children under the age of sixteen, and do not qualify the preceding enactment of section 35 to the effect that a legitimate, or that of the 4 & 5 Will. 4 to the effect that an illegitimate, child shall continue to retain its parentage settlement until it has reached that age. The clause assumes that the children whose settlements are the subjects of inquiry are not unemancipated, but are paupers in their own right, and capable of acquiring a settlement for themselves.

The views which I have thus expressed with reference to the construction of section 35 are not exhaustive, but they are sufficient to dispose of all the questions of law arising in these appeals. Shortly stated, my opinion comes to this, that the effect of section 35 is (1) to reserve to married women, whether during marriage or in viduity, the same right to their husband's settlement which they had under the law existing at the time when the Act was passed; (2) to fix absolutely the age of sixteen as the period of emancipation in all questions regarding the settlement of legitimate children, as had already been done in the case of illegitimates; (3) to give to bastards the privilege enjoyed by lawful children of retaining their parentage settlement after emancipation until the acquisition of a new settlement; (4) in all cases where the parents' settlement was itself derivative, to throw children of either class, as soon as they attain the age of sixteen, upon their own birth settlement until they acquire another; (5) subject to these provisions and limitations, to reserve to children the same rights in relation to parentage settlement which they possessed under the then existing law; and (6) to abolish all other kinds and forms of derivative settlement.

I shall now proceed to deal separately with these appeals, and with the facts presented for judgment in each of them.

In the first of them the pauper, the liability for whose maintenance is the subject of controversy, is a lunatic girl whose father died in 1881, having in the year 1878 acquired a settlement in the respondent union, which he never lost, by renting a tenement and being charged with and paying rates and taxes. Her mother, who is still alive, had her maiden settlement by birth in the appellant union, and she has not acquired any settlement since her husband's death. On the 8th of May, 1866, an order was made by two justices of the county of Surrey adjudging the settlement of the pauper, who was at that time under the age of sixteen, to be in the appellant union. Their adjudication has been confirmed by a divisional court and by the Court of Appeal, upon the ground that the pauper on her father's death took the maiden settlement of her widowed mother. For the reasons already explained, I am of opinion that the pauper after her father's death retained her parentage settlement in the respondent union, and that the judgment appealed from ought, therefore, to be reversed.

In the second appeal the facts are as follows:—The pauper was born on the 27th of October, 1861, in Wanborough, her father's birth parish, which is within the appellant union. In 1862 she removed with her father to the parish of Rhydgwern in Newport Union, where she resided with him until his death in August, 1868. Her mother married in 1871 one John Gibbs or Gibson, who died in 1884; and in November, 1885, she was again married to her present husband. From the time of her father's death until her mother's third marriage the pauper, who is physically incapable of work, continued to reside with her mother in the parish of Rhydgwern, and from the 5th of June, 1880, she was in receipt of relief from Newport Union until the 9th of November, 1885, when she went with her mother to the parish of Adsett, in the respondent union, to which she became chargeable in September, 1886. On the 18th of March, 1887, the guardians of the respondent union obtained an order for her removal to the appellant union, on the ground that the parish of Wanborough was the birthplace and last legal settlement both of the pauper and of her father, seeing that the residence of the latter in Rhydgwern was prior to the Act of 1876. It was, therefore, unnecessary to determine whether the pauper took her own or her father's birth settlement if she had not acquired a new settlement of her own after emancipation.

The pauper attained the age of sixteen on the 27th of October, 1877. When she became chargeable to the union in June, 1880, she had resided in Rhydgwern for nearly four years without ever having received relief, and for two years and ten months of that period she was above sixteen years of age. In these circumstances a divisional court, consisting of Stephen and Charles, JJ., quashed the order of removal, holding, on the authority of Reg. v. Elvet, that the pauper had in each of the three years preceding the 5th day of June, 1880, acquired by residence a status of irremovability, and that she had consequently at that date acquired a settlement in her own right in Newport Union under the provisions of section 34. Their judgment has been reversed, and the order of removal affirmed by the Court of Appeal, who were of opinion (1) that the pauper retained her birth settlement in the parish of Wanborough until she acquired another; and (2) that she had not acquired a settlement in Rhydgwern because unemancipated residence cannot be taken into account in ascertaining the period of previous residence necessary to entitle an emancipated child to a settlement in terms of section 34.

I have been unable to find in section 34 any provision, express or implied, to the effect that an emancipated child claiming a settlement under its provisions is not to have the benefit of residence whilst it was under the age of sixteen. The only provision having a bearing upon the point is to be found in section 35, which enacts that until emancipation the child "shall retain" the settlement of its father or widowed mother. That provision does not necessarily imply that on attaining sixteen the child is not to have the benefit of previous residence; but, even if it pointed to that result, I do not think that any mere implication derivable from it can be permitted to override the express enactments of section 34. The only test of residence sufficient to give "any person" a settlement under that section is that it shall be such as would, "in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render him irremovable"; and the case of Reg. v. Elvet is a clear authority to the effect that the pauper's residence under sixteen, coupled with her residence after she attained that age, did render her irremovable in accordance with the statutes. The pauper, having admittedly acquired no settlement after June, 1880, must, at the date of the order of removal, have retained the statutory settlement which she had gained by residence in Rhydgwern, and I am, therefore of opinion that in this case the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and that of the Queen's Bench Division restored.

The facts of the third appeal appear to me to raise an issue which may be very easily disposed of. Frederick William Baker died on the 25th of March, 1886, in the parish of Gillingham, in the appellant union, having resided there continuously with his wife and family for more than three years before his death, after which event his widow continued to reside with her children in the same parish for three months. She and three children, all under six years of age, subsequently became chargeable to the respondents, who obtained an order for their removal to the appellant union on the ground that the widow had, in the circumstances, acquired a settlement in her own right in the parish of Gillingham by virtue of section 34, and that order has been affirmed on the same ground in both courts below. I concur in their conclusion but I cannot assent to the reasons assigned for it. I am of opinion with Lopes, L.J., that the father, having at the time of his death acquired a settlement in Gillingham under section 34, his widow and children took his settlement under the provisions of section 35. During the subsistence of her derivative settlement I do not think that the widow had the capacity to acquire by residence another settlement of the same quality and in the same parish.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I have had an opportunity of reading and considering the excellent judgment which has just been delivered by Lord Watson, and I concur in the interpretation which he has put upon sections 34 and 35. I also concur in the conclusions at which he has arrived upon the three appeals before us.

Lord Macnaghten.—The question in these cases depends upon the true construction of sections 34 and 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876. The latter section has led to great divergence of opinion, and has provoked much unfavourable criticism.

Patchwork legislation is never quite satisfactory. But I rather doubt whether the enactment under consideration deserves all the hard things that have been said of it. I cannot help thinking that no small part of the difficulty which seems to surround section 35 is due to the gloss which was put upon it in the Bridgnorth case.

The section begins by stating that "no person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person" with two exceptions. For some reason or other the learned judges in the Bridgnorth case appear to have thought that the section began too abruptly, and that it would be the better for something in the way of introduction. Accordingly, they held that it was to be construed as if it were prefaced by the words, "In any question of the removal of a pauper." They then determined that "the moment of time which governs the question of settlement is the time when the proper persons have to make up their minds as to the removal—in other words, the moment of adjudication," and that the expression "no person" means "the person whose case is under discussion, and who is to be removed": see Reg. v. Guardians of Bridgnorth, Guardians of Croydon v. Guardians of Reigate.

I must say that I can find nothing in the Act which suggests or justifies this construction. It has, I think, given rise to great difficulty and confusion in dealing with the two exceptions to the general rule abolishing derivative settlements.

The first exception is "in the case of a wife from her husband." Those words seem plain enough. The wife is deemed to take her settlement from her husband. What happens if the husband dies in the lifetime of the wife? There is nothing in the Act, nothing in the general law before the Act was passed, nothing, I think, in the reason of the thing, to deprive her of her settlement. But, in obedience to the rule laid down in the Bridgnorth case, it has been held that if a question of settlement arises in the case of a widow, the court is bound to regard her position at the moment of adjudication, and then it is said at that moment she is no longer a wife, and therefore not within the first exception.

The second exception is "in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child," the enactment declares, "shall take the settlement of its father, or of its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another." Again, apart from the rule laid down in the Bridgnorth case, those words are reasonably plain; and, notwithstanding that rule, and the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in the Croydon case, I think they were rightly construed by Lopes, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, in the Highworth and Swindon case, 36 W. R. 423, 20 Q. B. D. 597. Every child up to the age of sixteen takes the settlement of its father, but if the father dies while the child is under sixteen, and the mother, being a widow, acquires a settlement in her own right before the child attains that age, or, I suppose, if the deceased father had no settlement, the child takes the settlement of its widowed mother up to the age of sixteen. In either case, whether it takes the settlement of the father or of the mother, it retains the settlement so taken until it acquires another.

So far I can see no difficulty in the section.

Up to this point the section deals with the case of legitimate children only. It then proceeds to deal with the case of illegitimate children. The only obscurity in that part of the section lies in its brevity. "An illegitimate child," it says, "shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement." And it says nothing more.

But then it must be remembered that it had been already enacted that an illegitimate child should "have and follow" the settlement of its mother until it attained the age of sixteen or acquired a settlement in its own right (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71); and it had been decided by the Queen's Bench in Bedenham v. St. Andrews, that when an illegitimate child attained sixteen without having acquired a settlement in its own right its birth settlement revived. The object of this part of section 35 seems to be to get rid of that decision and to place illegitimate children, as far as possible, in the same position as legitimate children.

I now come to the third part of the section, which certainly is not free from difficulty. It declares that "if any child in this section mentioned" (that is, as I understand it, if any child, whether legitimate or illegitimate, who has derived a settlement from a parent) "shall not have acquired a settlement for itself or, being a female, shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born."

This part of the section is, I think, plainly directed to a case where it is necessary to show, and to show by inquiry, what the settlement of the child is, and I think it only applies where such an inquiry is undertaken. If the child becomes chargeable and is removable with its parent or parents, there is no need for any inquiry into the settlement of the child. There is an inquiry into the settlement of the parent, but when that is ascertained there is an end of the matter. I think that this part of the section only applies where there is an independent inquiry into the settlement of the child. In that case the section says, if you find that the settlement of the parent of the child was a derivative settlement, you are not to pursue the inquiry any further. The child is to be deemed to be settled in the place of its birth. I agree with what was said on this point by Mathew, J., in Guardians of Hollingbourn v. Guardians of West Ham, 29 W. R. 629, 6 Q. B. D. 580.

It only remains to apply the provisions of the Act, as I think it ought to be construed, to the three cases under consideration.

As regards the case of the Guardians of Reigate v. Guardians of Croydon, it seems to me clear that the pauper there took the settlement of her father, who acquired a settlement in the Croydon Union, and that, inasmuch as the pauper's widowed mother never acquired a settlement for herself, the pauper retained her father's settlement in Croydon, and therefore I think the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case must be reversed.

In the case of The Highworth and Swindon Union v. The Guardians of Westbury-on-Severn, I agree with what was said in the judgment of the Court of Appeal as to section 35; but I am unable to agree in their opinion that the residence of a child after sixteen cannot coalesce with its residence under sixteen so as to complete the period required for gaining a settlement. The older authorities, of which it is only necessary to mention Reg. v. Elvet, are, I think, decisive upon the point. It appears to me, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

In the case of the Guardians of Medway Union v. Guardians of Bedminster Union, I think the appeal must be dismissed. But I prefer the reasons given by Lopes, L.J. I think that in that case the wife took a derivative settlement from her husband, and that it is not necessary, though if it had been necessary it would have been competent, to tack the three months during which she resided in the parish of Gillingham after she became a widow to the period of two years and nine months during which she resided there immediately before the death of her husband.

WARD v. LAWSON.
LAWSON v. WARD. (a.)

Solicitor—Country solicitor and London agent—Agreement on the "usual agency terms"—Stipulation that the London agent is not to be paid till the country solicitor is paid—Right of London agent to a share of money recovered as interest on costs.

An agreement between a country solicitor and a London solicitor that the latter should act as the London agent of the former, "upon the usual agency terms," entitles the London agent to his disbursements out of pocket, and to half the "profit charges," whether the country solicitor is paid them by his client or not, but does not entitle the London agent to any share whatever in any other profit made by the country solicitor out of the business.

W., a country solicitor, entered into an agreement with L., a London solicitor, that the latter should act as W.'s London agent on the usual agency terms, and subsequently a further agreement was made that all the business in connection with a particular company, who were clients of W., and the bills of costs in respect of such business, were to be kept separate from the other agency business and bills of costs, and that L. was not to call upon W., to pay him until W., had himself been paid by the company. The company having failed to pay for many years, W., sued them and recovered payment of his costs, with interest. L. claimed to be entitled to a share in this interest under his agreements with W.

Held (reversing the decision of Chitty, J.), that, upon the true construction of the agreements, the usual agency terms applied except so far as expressly varied, and that therefore, in the absence of any express stipulation as to interest, L.'s claim to share in it could not be sustained.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The plaintiff Ward was a solicitor at Sheerness, and in the year 1856 was appointed solicitor to a company formed for the purpose of constructing a railway between Sittingbourne and Sheerness, and known as the Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Co.

In the year 1859 he entered into an agreement with Messrs. Eyre & Lawson, a firm of London solicitors, that they should act as his London agents on the usual agency terms. By a further agreement, made in 1860, the bills of costs for business transacted by Eyre & Lawson as the plaintiff's agents in respect of the said railway company were to be kept separate from the bills in respect of other business so transacted, and the London agents were not to call upon Ward to pay them until he had himself been paid by the company.

In 1867 the firm of Eyre & Lawson dissolved partnership, and from that time the defendant, Mr. A. Scott Lawson, acted as the plaintiff's agent in respect of all business connected with the company till the plaintiff ceased to be the company's solicitor.

The present action of Ward v. Lawson—reported on demurrer, 21 W. R. 88, L. R. 8 Ch. 65—and the similar one of Ward v. Eyre (and Lawson) 28 W. R. 712, 15 Ch. D. 130, were commenced in 1872 for accounts and other relief. By the decree (dated June 26, 1874) in Ward v. Lawson there was ordered (1) an account of all money paid or advanced by the defendant to or for the use of the plaintiff in relation to matters of business transacted by the defendant for or on behalf of the Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Co; (2) an account of all money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff in relation to the matters aforesaid; (3) an account of all dealings and transactions between the parties in relation to the matters aforesaid. The company had failed to pay their costs for many years, but eventually Ward had taken proceedings against them and obtained judgment for the amount due, with interest at four per cent., which he had since been paid. The plaintiff Ward had subsequently died, but the action (Ward v, Lawson) had since been revived, Ward's representatives being substituted as parties, and the revived action was set down as Lawson v. Ward, Lawson being made plaintiff on account of the refusal of Ward's representatives to proceed. Lawson claimed that in taking the accounts credit should be given by Ward's representatives in respect of the sum paid to Ward for interest. The present question, which arose upon the taking of the accounts in chambers, was whether the claim of the London agent to a share in this interest could be maintained or not.

Chitty, J., held that the London agents were entitled to share in the interest, and he accordingly ordered the personal representatives of the late plaintiff Ward to give credit for it in the taking of the accounts.

The personal representatives of Ward appealed.

Byrne, Q.C., and Chadwyck-Healey, for the appellants.—The question is whether or not, as between the country solicitor and his London agents, the latter are entitled to participate in the interest on costs. In the absence of special agreement there is never any question of interest between solicitors and their London agents. [LINDLEY, L.J.—No; but if interest is received, ought it not to be shared? LOPES, L.J.—I suppose this case turns on a special agreement?] It was so dealt with by the judge. He thought the agents would not be entitled to share in the interest except under a special agreement. The agreement here says nothing expressly or by implication about interest. [LINDLEY, L.J.—The interest is received in respect of the whole of the costs—Lawson's share as well as Ward's.] The other side claim that the interest is, in fact, part of the profits; but where is the agreement for that? [LINDLEY, L.J.—Is any agreement necessary? Is not the interest accessory to the principal? Is not half of it Lawson's?] They were not partners. Why should he have a share of the interest without an express agreement for it?

They referred to Ward v. Lawson and Ward v. Eyre.

Romer, Q.C., and Eyre, for the respondent.—We transacted some of the business for the company direct, and received money which we brought into account. The company passed a resolution appointing Lawson their solicitor. He could have sued them. He was their solicitor as well as Ward. This interest is money which Ward received in respect of the costs. Why should there be any difference between interest and principal in this case? [COTTON, L.J.—The point seems to be whether the agent is entitled to share the profit made out of the business, or merely to share the profit charges.] No express agreement is necessary here. The interest was a sum payable by the clients in respect of the bills of costs. [The COURT here took the opinion of Mr. Ryland, one of the taxing masters, as to what was the practice between country solicitors and their London agents with regard to sharing costs when the terms were the "usual agency terms"? COTTON, L.J.—Mr. Ryland says the London agent is entitled only to his expenses out of pocket, and to a share (half or a third, as may have been agreed) of the "profit charges," and that he has no claim to share in any other profit the country solicitor may make out of the business.] It would be putting a very strained construction on the decree to say that this recovering of the interest from the company is not, within the meaning of the decree, a transaction between the parties.

They referred to Rhodes v. Sugden, 35 W. R. 75, 34 Ch. D. 155, and De Havilland v. Bowerbank, 1 Campb. 50.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Chitty, J., made on a matter which has arisen in taking the accounts between these parties, and though it does not in terms state that the plaintiff is to pay to the defendant (the plaintiff being now dead), yet I think it does imply not only that he is to account, in the sense of saying what interest he has received, but that the defendant is entitled, under the arrangement between the parties, to half of that interest. To my mind it turns on what were the real terms of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant—that is to say, between Ward, the plaintiff, who is dead, and the defendant Lawson. The original plaintiff, Ward, was a country solicitor, and the defendant, who was in partnership with another gentleman, was a London solicitor. No doubt Ward was originally the solicitor of the railway company, and then he applied to the defendant, or his then firm, in order that his then firm might transact some business for this railway company. I think it is hardly to be doubted that in its origin the position was that of country solicitor and London agent. But then there was an agreement made between them, and it is said that afterwards, at a later period, Ward ceased to be the solicitor of the company, and that then the defendant became himself the solicitor of the company, and that, therefore, it was not a case as between the plaintiff as country solicitor and the defendant as London agent. In my opinion it is not shown that there was any putting an end to the agreement which I have referred to, and, in my opinion, if that was the real position of the parties at one period, yet the agreement is binding, and still regulates, so far as it applies, and can regulate it, the question in dispute between these parties. It is this: The plaintiff made an arrangement with the firm of Eyre & Lawson that the firm should act for the plaintiff as his agents in London, and it was agreed between the plaintiff and the firm that all business introduced by the plaintiff to the firm and transacted by them should be so transacted as agents for the plaintiff on the usual agency terms. So that, so long as the plaintiff was really in the position of solicitor, and the defendants were really in the position of London agents, the usual agency terms were to regulate their dealings and transactions, and that, as regards all business which was introduced by the plaintiff, the defendants were to act as agents for the plaintiff on the usual agency terms—that is to say, that, so long as the business is introduced, and as regards all business introduced by the plaintiff to the defendants, they should act on the usual agency terms. To my mind that means that any moneys received in respect of the business so introduced, even though, at the time, the defendants were not really in the position of London agents for the country solicitor, should be dealt with on the usual agency terms; and there is this, that, in the usual case, the London agent has no claim at all against the client, but he can sue the country solicitor for what is due to him on the arrangement usually regulating the distribution of moneys, received or charged for, in respect of bills of costs.

Now there was a considerable question as to what was the position and claim of the London agent as against the country solicitor. Of course the London agent is entitled to all charges which are made for sums paid by him out of pocket, but there may be and are many other charges in solicitors' bills, where there is no actual expenditure by the London agent. He makes charges for professional services and attending on the client or rendering advice, and many other matters. Those, I think, are called "profit charges"; and the conflict as to what the right of the London agent is was this: Was he entitled to half the profit made on the bill of costs in respect of the transactions in which he was engaged? or was he entitled to half the amount of the profit charges—that is to say, of those charges to which I have referred? We did not feel quite justified in deciding that point without getting the opinion of one who would know very well, from his position as taxing master, and his former position as solicitor, what was the arrangement; and we learn from Mr. Ryland what I have said, that the London agent is entitled only—not regarding the charges which he has paid out of pocket—to half the amount of those which are called profit charges—that is, those charges which do not involve any expenditure of money by him. It is upon the use of the term "profit charges" that this difficulty has really arisen. Now the contention raised here on behalf of the defendant is that he is entitled to half the profit. We are told by Mr. Ryland, "Not at all—the London agent has nothing to do with the profit made by the solicitor; nor is he in any way, unless there is some special arrangement, implicated in any loss which the country solicitor, the solicitor in the case, may suffer in respect of the client not being able to pay him." Now, is there any arrangement here which alters that—which gives the defendant here a claim to half the profit? It is said that there is, because this was not on the usual agency terms, and, in my opinion, it was not. There was no distinction or difference as regards the distribution of the money which he received—that is to say, as regards the charges which the London agent is able to make; but there was this, that he was not to sue the plaintiff until the plaintiff had obtained payment of his bills of costs from the company. The words are that they shall not call upon the plaintiff to pay any of their agency bills until the plaintiff has obtained payment of the bills of costs from the company. That does not, to my mind, say what amount is to be claimed by the defendant, or what sums he is entitled to charge as against the plaintiff, his principal—what in his agency charges he can claim—but only limits the time. It says that he shall not make any claim in respect of what he is entitled to as agency charges unless and until the plaintiff obtains payment of the bill of costs from the company. In my opinion there is nothing in that which gives the London agent, the defendant here, any right to anything more than he would get according to the usual agency terms. It prevents him undoubtedly from suing for those, or from making any claim against the solicitor, until the solicitor is paid, but the saying that he shall not do so for a certain time does not alter in any way the amount which he can claim when that time arrives.

Then it is said that natural justice gives him a claim as against the solicitor for any interest he may obtain in addition to the amount of the profit charges—charges in respect of which the London agent has made no expenditure. That might have been very reasonable if there had been any such clause here; but there is not; and, in my opinion, it would be wrong, simply because the London agent has agreed not to sue the solicitor until certain events occur, to import into that this condition, that if, in consequence of the delay, you get any interest paid to you, then there is an implied contract or agreement that I shall have half that interest. In my opinion, the view of Chitty, J., was wrong, and I cannot agree with it. I think the appeal must be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The difficulty of this question arises from misunderstanding the exact meaning of the real agreement entered into between the parties, because the decree upon which the respondent relies is based upon that agreement, and it is so carefully worded and expressed as to give effect to it. Now there is nothing in the decree which settles this point one way or the other. I am quite aware that there is the 3rd clause about "dealings and transactions," but there is nothing which says what is to be done with the interest when it is recovered—whether it is to be shared between the parties, or to whom it is to belong. To decide that we must look at the agreement itself. Now the agreement was entered into at two different times. It is set out in paragraph 4 of the bill in Ward v. Lawson. The first agreement was in January, 1859, when it was arranged that the business, which I will shortly allude to by calling it "the business," should be transacted by Eyre & Lawson as agents of the plaintiff on the usual agency terms. I pass that over for the moment. Then, after that, in 1860, there was a further agreement embodying this important stipulation, that the defendants, the town agents, Eyre & Lawson, should not call upon the plaintiff to pay any of their agency bills until the plaintiff had obtained payment of the bills of costs from the company, and that those bills should be kept separate. Now the first question and the main question is, what is meant by the expression "on the usual agency terms"? I confess I thought at one time, until Mr. Ryland made it plain that I was wrong, that the town agent shared the profits up to a certain point made by the country solicitor. But that is not so at all. Mr. Ryland tells us that what is meant by "the usual agency terms" is this: that the town agent has nothing on earth to do with the profits; and he gave us a very remarkable case in which a country solicitor got from a grateful client £500 in a case in which Mr. Ryland was the town agent, and the town agent did not get a farthing of that. The town agent does not share the profits, and has nothing to do with the profits, but what he does is this: he gets his disbursements, and then he has half of certain charges which are called "profit charges," to distinguish them from disbursements. When once one sees it, and gets clearly into one's head that the usual agency terms have nothing to do with sharing profits at all, then this case becomes one very easy of solution.

Now there is nothing in the agreement, and there is nothing which, when the expression is understood, can be interpreted so as to involve as a consequence the right of the town agent to share any profits, whether they come in the shape of interest, or whether they come in the shape of gift, or otherwise, to the country solicitor. The sum which the town agent is to be entitled to is to be ascertained upon a different footing altogether, and there is nothing in the decree which in any way varies that; but in consequence of the difficulties which have arisen from the contentions of Mr. Lawson, and from his conduct—I do not say that he was wrong or right in the matter—he may have been partly right and partly wrong—but in consequence of the fact that he had apparently worked, or assumed to work, for the company as principal, and not merely as an agent, it became necessary, in pronouncing the decree, to introduce some words which would define the position of the two parties, and there is an account therefore. First of all there is a declaration as to his position—that he is an agent, and what he is to do; then there is the third clause about "all dealings and transactions," which was naturally relied on by the respondent. Then there are certain clauses carefully worded with reference to getting in what is due from the company, and they are both to get in as best they can what may be payable from the company to them or either of them; but there is not a word that I can see in this decree which entitles the town agent to more than the agreement gives him; and it appears to me that that is where Chitty, J., has gone wrong, because he seems to have attributed to this decree a force and effect which I do not think it bears. He says: "It is clear in this case, from the terms of the agreement which I have read, that if Mr. Lawson had received the amount of the bills from the railway company, he must have allowed, as between himself and Mr. Ward in account, the sum he actually received"—he certainly must—"and if that sum had included the original principal of the demand and interest for forbearance, then he would be chargeable with interest, and the interest would then go as part of the profit to be divided between these two persons." There, I think, is a mistake; he would have had to hand over the amount of that interest to the person to whom it belonged, and that is the country solicitor. I cannot, now that I understand the meaning of the agreement, spell out of this anything to the effect which would entitle Mr. Lawson to interest on these bills. He has stipulated that he will not demand payment for a time, which is unfortunately very long—until the railway company pays. That delay has been very considerable, and nothing would have been more reasonable than for him to have stipulated that he should have interest if the railway company paid interest. He has not done anything of the kind; and now that the terms of it are understood, I do think that it is incumbent upon him to show some agreement entitling him to interest. At first I thought it was the other way. I thought it would require an agreement to disentitle him, but that is entirely changed, I think, when one understands the full and accurate meaning of the phrase "usual agency terms."

That Mr. Ryland has explained to us; and in face of his explanation this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—In the judgment which has been referred to, Lord Selborne says that the account in question is an agency account between a London agent and a country solicitor. The relation, therefore, between the plaintiff and the defendant in this case is the relationship of a country solicitor and a London agent. What, then, is an agency account? Or, in other words, what is a London solicitor entitled to receive in respect of agency charges from the country solicitor? He is entitled to receive all out-of-pocket expenses, and he is entitled to receive a share of the profits, be it a half or a third, what I call a share of the profit charges, whichever may be the arrangement between them. Now this, to my mind, is, when it is considered for a moment, a very reasonable arrangement in respect of these charges. The country solicitor does nothing whatever, but, on the other hand, he has introduced the business to the London solicitor, and, moreover, the country solicitor remains immediately responsible to the client. Therefore it seems to me fair that he should be remunerated, although the work is done by the London agent. Now, when it is clearly understood what the agency bill is, or what the agency charges are, it appears to me not very difficult to interpret this agreement. To my mind, it means this: the country solicitor is speaking, and says, "You, the London agent, are to have your share of the agency charges, but subject to this, that you are not to be entitled to have those charges paid to you by me, the country solicitor, until I, the country solicitor, have received them in the bill of costs which I shall send in and shall recover from the company, or, in other words, until the company has paid them to me." That being so, I am of opinion that Mr. Lawson, the London agent, is not entitled to recover the interest which he seeks to recover in this case. The country solicitor is entitled to recover the amount of his bill of costs, subject to the proper proportion in respect of agency charges being paid to the London agent. I think, therefore, that the judgment of Chitty, J., was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

LEESON v. GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL. (a.)

Medical practitioner—General Medical Council—Charge of infamous conduct in a professional respect—Domestic forum—Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court—Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), s. 29—Constitution of tribunal—Members of an association which acted as accuser sitting as judges—Competency of tribunal.

The defendants, the General Medical Council, had held an inquiry into a charge preferred against the plaintiff, a registered medical practitioner, of "infamous conduct in a professional respect," the particulars of which charge were, that the plaintiff, being a registered medical practitioner, did act as "cover of," or by his presence, advice, and assistance, did enable H., an unqualified person, "to carry on the business or profession of a medical electrician, and to practise as if he were duly qualified, under the style of the Medical Battery Co." The inquiry resulted in the defendants finding that the plaintiff had been guilty of the acts charged against him, and the defendants ordered the name of the plaintiff to be erased from the register of medical practitioners.

Held (affirming North, J.), that the charge in question, on the true construction of its terms, amounted to a charge that the plaintiff had assisted an unqualified person to practise as if he were a medical practitioner duly qualified to practise as such; that the charge was therefore one which the defendants had power to deal with, and did in fact deal with, under section 29 of the Medical Act, 1858; and that, as the defendants, acting bonâ fide and after due inquiry, had adjudged the plaintiff guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, the courts of law had no jurisdiction to review their decision.

The above-mentioned charge against the plaintiff had been preferred in the name of and by the Medical Defence Union, which was an association incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, as a company limited by guarantee, having for its objects the protection of the interests of medical practitioners, the promotion of honourable practice, the prosecution of unauthorized practitioners, and the defence of members of the association where proceedings involving questions of professional principle were brought against them. By the articles of association, the management of the business and the control of the Medical Defence Union was vested in a council, which was thereby authorized to exercise all powers and do all acts which might be exer- cised or done by the Medical Defence Union in general meeting. Two persons who were members of the Medical Defence Union and subscribers to its funds, were also members of the General Medical Council, and, as members of the General Medical Council, were present at the inquiry into, and adjudicated upon, the charge against the plaintiff. These persons were not, however, members of the council of the Medical Defence Union, and had no pecuniary interest in the success of the accusation brought against the plaintiff.

Held, per Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ. (Fry, L.J., dissenting), that these two persons were not in fact, either actually or constructively, accusers or quasi-prosecutors in the charge preferred against the plaintiff, and therefore that the tribunal which adjudicated on the charge preferred against the plaintiff was a tribunal competent to do so.

Reg. v. Allan (or Hodgson), 12 W. R. 423, 4 B. & S. 915, distinguished.

Per Fry, L.J., that the fact that these two persons were subscribers to and members of an association having for one of its objects the carrying on of prosecutions of this nature, and which association was the accuser in the present case, constituted these two person virtually prosecutors themselves, and therefore, that, on the ground of public policy, the tribunal which adjudicated on the charge preferred against the plaintiff was not competent to do so, and that its decision was invalid.

Appeal from North, J.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, a registered medical practitioner, from a refusal of North, J., to restrain the defendants, the General Medical Council, from removing his name from their register of medical practitioners, and from publishing certain resolutions passed by them to the effect that the plaintiff had been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect.

The General Medical Council is a Body composed of medical men, some of whom are nominated by certain Bodies, others of whom are chosen by the general body of medical men in the United Kingdom, and some of whom are nominated by the Queen. This Body was first constituted by the Medical Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), which was passed for the purpose of enabling persons requiring medical aid to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners. The Act requires, for the first time, that a register of qualified medical practitioners should be kept, and provides that only those whose names are entered on the register can sue for and obtain payment of money payable to them for medical fees.

Section 29 of the Act provides that, "If any registered medical practitioner shall be convicted in England or Ireland of any felony or misdemeanour, or in Scotland of any crime of offence, or shall, after due inquiry, be judged by the general council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the general council may, if they see fit, direct the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register."

Section 40 provides that, "Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be, or take or use the name or title of, a physician, . . . surgeon, general practitioner, . . . or any name, title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognized by law as a physician, or surgeon, . . . or a practitioner in medicine, . . . ; shall upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding £20."

In November, 1889, the solicitor of the General Medical Council sent a written notice to the plaintiff Leeson informing him that on a specified day the General Medical Council would hold an inquiry into a charge of alleged "infamous conduct in a professional respect" which had been preferred against him, "the particulars of which alleged conduct are as follows: that you, being a registered practitioner, do act as cover of, or by your presence, advice, and assistance do enable, one C. B. Harness (an unqualified person) to carry on the business or profession of a medical electrician, and to practise as if he were duly qualified under the style of the Medical Battery Co. (Limited), and publicly advertising himself as the Medical Battery Co.'s consulting medical electrician."

The charge in question was preferred in the name of the Medical Defence Union, which was an incorporated company limited by guarantee under the Companies Act, 1862, and the objects of which (inter alia) were "(1) to support and protect the character and interests of medical practitioners practising in the United Kingdom; (2) to promote honourable practice and to suppress or prosecute unauthorized practitioners; (3) to advise and defend, or assist in defending, members of the union in cases where proceedings involving questions of professional principle or otherwise are brought against them."

By article 36 of the articles of association of the Medical Defence Union, the management of the business and the control of the Medical Defence Union was vested in a "council," which were thereby authorized to exercise all such powers and to do all such acts as might be exercised or done by the Union, and which were not by the articles or by statute expressly directed to be exercised or done by the Union in general meeting. The only limit on the power of the "council" contained in the articles, was a provision in article 2 that the objects of the Union, so far as they related to the suppression or prosecution of unauthorized practitioners, should not be acted upon without the sanction of a unanimous resolution of the "council" confirmed by a majority of the members of the Union present and voting at a general meeting.

The inquiry into the charge so preferred against the plaintiff Leeson was held by the General Medical Council. The proceedings at the inquiry were opened by the solicitor of the General Medical Council, who read the charge against the plaintiff Leeson, and the solicitor for the Medical Defence Union then submitted written statements in support of the charge. The plaintiff Leeson was present at the inquiry, accompanied by his solicitor and other persons who submitted statements in support of his contention that in his conduct he had done nothing which was infamous in a professional respect. The General Medical Council in the result found the plaintiff Leeson had been guilty of "infamous conduct in a professional respect, for that he, being a registered practitioner, did act as cover," &c., following the words of the charge; and they accordingly passed a resolution to that effect, and directed their registrar to erase the name of the plaintiff Leeson from the register of medical practitioners.

Among the members of the General Medical Council who took part in the inquiry and in the resolution arrived at, were two persons, Mr. Teale and Dr. Glover, who were also members of the incorporated company forming the Medical Defence Union, as being subscribers of ten shillings a year, and as guarantors, but neither Mr. Teale nor Dr. Glover were members of the Council of the Medical Defence Union.

The General Medical Council had no power to, and did not in fact, throw the expenses of the inquiry before them, on the plaintiff Leeson.

The present action was brought by Leeson for an injunction to restrain the General Medical Council from removing his name from their register of medical practitioners, and from publishing the above resolution.

North, J., held that the charge against the plaintiff was really that he had acted as "cover" of Harness, not merely to enable the latter to carry on the business of a medical electrician, but to practise as if he were a duly qualified medical practitioner; that this was a matter within the statutory jurisdiction of the General Medical Council; and that, they having acted regularly and bonâ fide in their proceedings, the court had no power to interfere. He also held that the two members of the General Medical Council who were also members of the Medical Defence Union were not thereby incapacitated from taking part in the inquiry, and that the decision of the General Medical Council was not invalidated on this ground, and he accordingly declined to grant an injunction.

Bigby, Q.C., Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and George Henderson, for the appellant.—The written complaint against the appellant was that he enabled Harness, an unqualified person, to carry on the business of "a medical electrician," and to "practise as if he were duly qualified under the style of the Medical Battery Co."—i.e., duly qualified as a medical electrician. It is no offence under section 40 for an unqualified person to act as a medical electrician; for a medical electrician is not a medical practitioner, and therefore there was no complaint against the appellant which could possibly have been made the subject of a charge under section 29 of the Medical Act, 1858. [They referred on this point to Ex parte La Mert, 12 W. R. 201, 4 B. & S. 582, and Allbutt v. General Medical Council, 37 W. R. 771, 23 Q. B. D. 400.] Secondly, the tribunal which made the order now in question was a non-competent tribunal, as two of its members were also members of the Medical Defence Union, the incorporated association which brought this charge against the appellant; that is contrary to the well-known rule that a man cannot be both prosecutor and judge: Dimes v. Proprietors of the Grand Junction Canal, 3 H. L. Cas. 759; Mercers' Company of Chester v. Bowker, 1 Strs. 639; Reg. v. Allan or Hodgson, 12 W. R. 423, 4 B. & S. 915; Reg. v. Milledge, 27 W. R. 659, 4 Q. B. D. 332; Reg. v. Gibbon, 29 W. R. 442, 6 Q. B. D. 168; Reg. v. Farrant, 36 W. R. 184, 20 Q. B. D. 58. If this be established, the fact that these two persons had no pecuniary interest in the result, or, in fact, showed no bias, is immaterial.

Sebastian, for the Medical Battery Co.

Everett, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the respondents, were called on as to the second point only.—The proceeding before the General Medical Council is not a judicial, or a quasi-judicial, proceeding at all. The General Medical Council might themselves mero motu have set the inquiry in motion. If the whole body of the General Medical Council can promote the proceedings mero motu, how can the fact, that two members of the General Medical Council sat on the inquiry promoted by another body in which these two persons had an interest, render the inquiry bad? These two persons had no pecuniary interest in the result, and therefore it must be shown that they had some interest which would create a real bias against the appellant, in order to invalidate the order of the General Medical Council: Reg. v. Handsley, 30 W. R. 368, 8 Q. B. D. 383; Reg. v. Meyer, 24 W. R. 392, 1 Q. B. D. 173; Reg. v. Rand, L. R. 1 Q. B. 230, 14 W. R. C. L. Dig. 47; Reg. v. Rochester, Dean and Chapter, 17 Q. B. 1. These two persons were not members of the Council of the Medical Defence Union, and as individual members of the Medical Defence Union they had nothing to do, either actually or constructively, with the promotion of this inquiry, and they were not, therefore, virtually prosecutors, even assuming that the promotion of this inquiry was in the nature of a prosecution, which we submit it was not. The inquiry is one by a domestic forum: Reg. v. General Medical Council, 9 W. R. 413.

Bigby, Q.C., in reply.—The promotion of this inquiry and the proceedings thereon was in substance a prosecution. The Medical Defence Union was the accuser in this case, and if any member of the accusing body sit in judgment on the case the judgment is invalid. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Reg. v. Pettitmangin, 9 L. T. N. S. 683, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 72.]

Dec. 21.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a refusal of North, J., to restrain the defendants from acting on a resolution which they had arrived at—viz., that the name of the plaintiff be struck off the register of medical practitioners, and to prevent them from publishing that resolution. [The Lord Justice, after referring to 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, read section 29 of that Act, and proceeded:—] It was with reference to the powers given by section 29, that the defendants, the General Medical Council, proceeded in this case, as regards Dr. Leeson, as he was on the register—and properly on the register—at the time when the order in question was made by the General Medical Council.

There is another section of the Act, section 40, which I ought to refer to, as it was a good deal referred to in the argument. That section enabled criminal prosecutions to be taken against persons who falsely pretended to be registered practitioners; but the proceeding taken in this case was not with reference to that section.

The first point argued was that the matter in respect of which the General Medical Council adjudicated or decided in this case, was not a matter within the powers given to them under section 29; and for the purpose of this argument the charge made against Dr. Leeson, and which was brought to his notice by writing, according to the practice of the General Medical Council, was referred to. [The Lord Justice read the charge above set out, and proceeded:—] It was said that there was nothing contained in this complaint which would justify the General Medical Council in exercising the powers given them by section 29, because, as was said, the complaint contains no allegation that Mr. Harness is practising as if he were a duly qualified medical man, but only "as if he were duly qualified under the style of the Medical Battery Co.," and that all Dr. Leeson was supposed to have assisted in, was to represent Harness as a medical electrician. I cannot read it in that way. We know what a duly qualified man is in the Act. A person is duly qualified if he is on the register, and in that respect duly qualified to obtain the benefit of the Act as regards the privileges which are conceded to those medical men who are on the register; the register stating the different qualifications in respect of which medical men—and the medical man in question—can be put on the register. I have myself no doubt that this charge does state that which would justify the General Medical Council, if on the facts they were satisfied of it, in coming to the conclusion that an offence in the words of the Act, of "infamous conduct in any professional respect," had been committed. That, in my opinion, is the true construction of the words of the charges which are made against Dr. Leeson.

It was found that Dr. Leeson had been guilty of the acts which were charged against him, and then there was a direction to erase his name from the register.

Now there has been, on this appeal, a good deal of question as to what took place, and we have had the evidence which was before the General Medical Council, and the evidence given in this action, brought before us. In my opinion it is wrong for us to consider whether the General Medical Council arrived at a right conclusion on the evidence before them. That is not for us to consider. The General Medical Council cannot have what is strictly called evidence. They cannot take evidence on oath. They cannot take evidence in the sense of what we, as lawyers, consider evidence. They have statements made before them in support of any complaint which is made, and they have also statements made on the other side by the medical man against whom the complaint is made, and if it be once established that the complaint made before them does involve a matter in respect of which they can exercise the jurisdiction given to them by section 29, then I think we ought not to look at the evidence for the purpose of, in any way, considering whether they have arrived at a right conclusion. Of course, if it were alleged that they acted corruptly, and if those who appealed to us gave evidence that they had acted corruptly, and proved it by showing that there was no statement made before them on which they could reasonably and honestly arrive at the conclusion at which they did arrive, then, I think, we ought to consider it, to see whether the absence of any statement, which would justify the conclusion, was such evidence as, if not displaced, would lead us to the conclusion that the council had not acted honestly on the charge brought before them, but for some other indirect purpose or with some other indirect object. But although there were some statements in the affidavit of the plaintiff in this case, that there was prejudice against him, that matter was not pressed upon us by counsel, nor was it in any way supported by anything which was brought before us. Dr. Leeson seems to have had a most perfect consideration of his case. The complaint was brought forward in the ordinary mode required by the rules and regulations of the General Medical Council. Dr. Leeson was present, he was represented by his solicitor, and he brought his own witnesses—i.e., those who were with him were to make statements in support of his contention that in his conduct he had done nothing which was infamous in a professional respect—and everything was most fully heard and considered, and then the council arrived at the conclusion at which they did arrive. That being so, in my opinion we cannot consider as to whether they were right or wrong. That is left for them. If they acted honestly, required statements to be made, and gave every opportunity for the man complained of, to bring his statements before them, and fairly conducted the matter in question, in my opinion we ought not to enter into the question, because if we once do that we are assuming to judge whether or not, in our opinion, they came to a right conclusion on the statements which were before them. In my opinion, therefore, the first ground which was taken in support of this appeal fails, because I think there was a charge which justified the General Medical Council in coming to a conclusion under section 29, and there was no reason for suggesting that the proceedings were improperly conducted by them.

But there was another point raised, which gave us rather more doubt. It was said that this order made by the General Medical Council must be considered as made by a non-competent tribunal, because, taking the General Medical Council as acting judicially, they were in such a position—they were so constituted on this particular occasion—that any order made by them ought, having regard to the decisions in the cases cited, to be considered as a nullity.

It appears that the complaint—I will not call it indictment or anything of that sort—made against Dr. Leeson, and which was the complaint so considered, was one which was brought in the name of the Medical Defence Union, and it appears also, when attention has been called to the matter, that two of the members of the General Medical Council who were present when the case of Dr. Leeson was considered, were also members of the Medical Defence Union; and it is said that that being so, they are to be considered in the light of prosecutors, and that, being prosecutors, they were acting in this matter in such a way that they could not also sit as judges of the matter, and that, therefore, any decision arrived at by the General Medical Council when these two members, who were incompetent to act as judges in the matter, were present, must be considered as a nullity.

Now, of course, the rule of law is very clear that no man can be actor, plaintiff, or prosecutor in any action, and at the same time sit in judgment to decide in that particular case—either in his own case or where he is bringing forward, as against the person complained of, the accusation or complaint on which the order is made—where, in fact, he puts himself in the position of prosecutor or complainant. It is clear to my mind, that the General Medical Council, in respect of the complaint against Dr. Leeson, were acting judicially. Though not judges in the ordinary sense, yet they had to decide judicially as to whether or not the complaint against Dr. Leeson was well founded, and, in my opinion, they could, if they considered it was well founded, make an order which would be of great importance to him, and would deprive him from being on the register, with very important consequences. The question, therefore, we have to consider is whether either of these two gentlemen—Mr. Teale and Dr. Glover—are to be considered as complainants in this case.

Now, for this purpose I must examine what is the Medical Defence Union. [The Lord Justice then stated the nature and objects of the Medical Defence Union, as above set out, and continued:—] On looking at its articles of association I find that there was a council, and that this council practically had all the powers of the company which formed the Medical Defence Union, except in one respect—viz., that the council could not institute prosecutions against anyone who was acting in violation of the law without the vote of a general meeting. The provision I refer to is this. [The Lord Justice read the proviso contained in article 2 above stated, and continued:—] As we are not now considering a prosecution of an unauthorized practitioner under the Act, I only mention the above provision, as the limit on the power of the Council of the Medical Defence Union; except in that respect, there is no limit on the power of that council, who can do everything which is not expressly, or by Act of Parliament required to be done by the whole body. [The Lord Justice read article 36, which is above stated; and continued:—] Neither Mr. Teale nor Dr. Glover were members of the council of the Medical Defence Union, but they were members of the company which formed the Medical Defence Union, by subscribing 10s. a year and by giving a guarantee, the amount of which we do not know, which was to provide for any expense which would be necessary in order to carry out the objects of the company.

Now this complaint made against Dr. Leeson was a complaint brought forward by the council of the union, to which council neither of these two members of the General Medical Council belonged. These two gentlemen, not being on the council of the union, could not, having regard to the articles, exercise any control or give any direction as to what should be done by the council of the union in bringing forward this complaint.

Then are they, as members of the company which formed the union, in any way interested? The expenses of this complaint could not be thrown by the General Medical Council on Dr. Leeson, the person complained of. The General Medical Council had no power to give any costs, and therefore, whatever might be the result of this complaint, it could not in any way affect the liability of Mr. Teale and Dr. Glover to contribute to the expenses of this proceeding.

In my opinion, therefore, as regards the question whether Mr. Teale and Dr. Glover are to be considered as complainants, we ought to look to the substance of the thing, and we ought not to hold that, because the complaint is brought by the council of the union in the name of the union, a member of the union—who has nothing to do, and can have nothing to do, with bringing forward the complaint—must be treated as a prosecutor; or as one of the persons who are bringing this complaint. The term "prosecutor" was sometimes used and sometimes objected to, but I use it for the sake of simplicity.

As regards the objects of the Medical Defence Union (I give no opinion as to whether it is desirable to form such unions), it must be remembered that the objects were just as much to defend those who might be improperly attacked, as to bring before the General Medical Council any question which might throw reflection on the conduct of any member of the profession; so that, in my opinion, these two gentlemen, as members of the union, cannot be considered as complainants in this case —i.e., as persons bringing forward this charge. I have already pointed out that they could have no pecuniary interest in the result, for whichever way it turned out, their liability as to contributing to the expenses would be just the same, and, indeed, there was hardly any contention that their position as members of the union did involve a bias which would prevent them from adjudicating on this case.

Numerous cases have been cited, but in the view which I take it, is only necessary to advert to one, which probably is the strongest in favour of the appellant, Reg. v. Allan. In that case certain riparian owners and the owners of salmon fisheries, and some persons who were outsiders, formed themselves into an association—not in any way incorporated—all of whom apparently would have equal power, and a committee was formed, which was a committee to direct prosecutions. Three magistrates were on the bench when a question as to a breach of the Fishery Laws was brought before them, and they were members of the association which had been formed. One of them was a member of the committee, and had directed the prosecution. There was no doubt, therefore, he was a prosecutor in the matter brought before the magistrates for decision, and therefore there could be no doubt that, having regard to the principle of law often laid down, the conviction was bad. But the other two magistrates had nothing to do with the committee, and were only members of the association. That fact, however, was the principal point relied upon by the appellant in the present case. Cockburn, C.J., in that case, however, does use language which would seem to show that even if only those magistrates who were members of the association, and not on the committee, had been on the bench, the conviction would have been bad. He said, "Certain members of that association were present as justices, and took part in this conviction. They were essentially prosecutors, being members of an association the aggregate of which were undoubtedly prosecutors." For my part, I do not think that the language of judges ought to be taken without reference to the facts of the case, and although the Chief Justice does use those wide words, yet Lord Blackburn—then Blackburn, J.—and Mellor, J., who also constituted the court on that occasion, do not use language which can be even tortured into expressing that if any member of the association had been on the bench at the time, that would have vitiated the proceeding. Blackburn, J., said, "One of the justices who joined in the conviction, being a member of the committee of the association which instituted the proceedings, was one of the prosecutors. There may be difficulty in finding magistrates in this neighbourhood, who are not interested, to hear such an information, but members of the association which institutes the prosecution must not act as judges upon it." There, I think, he puts it that the conviction was bad because one member of the committee who were actually prosecutors, was sitting on the bench at the time; and the language of Mellor, J., fairly interpreted, leads to the same conclusion. But even if Cockburn, C.J., did intend by the language he used, to say that the conviction would have been bad if any one of the members of the association who had nothing to do with the prosecution, and who could have nothing to do with it, and who was not on the committee, had been present as a justice, and had taken part in the conviction, I should not follow him in a case like the present, in which neither Mr. Teale nor Dr. Glover had, or could have, any voice at all in this prosecution, and in which neither of them, on the evidence, knew anything at all about it until the matter was brought before them as members of the General Medical Council.

In my opinion, this objection, which is a most serious one, cannot prevail, and we ought to hold that North, J., was right in refusing the injunction.

BOWEN, L.J.—As to the first point raised by the appellant, I shall say very little in addition to what the Lord Justice has already stated. These proceedings were in the nature of judicial proceedings, although the forum is a domestic one, and although the evidence taken before such forum differs in many respects from evidence which is adduced in a court of law, and in particular in the all-important respect that it is not given upon oath.

What alone the courts can investigate when proceedings of the General Medical Council of this character are brought before them, is whether the domestic forum has acted honestly within its jurisdiction. The jurisdiction is defined by the statute. There must be an allegation before the General Medical Council of infamous conduct in some professional respect, and the adjudication must be arrived at after due inquiry. The statute says nothing more, but in saying so much, it certainly imports that the substantial elements of natural justice must be found to have been present at the inquiry. There must be due inquiry. The accused person must have notice of what he is accused. He must have an opportunity of being heard, and the decision must be honestly arrived at after he has had a full opportunity of being heard. With respect to the charge made, the charge of which he has notice, it is a charge of infamous conduct in some professional respect, and the particulars which should be brought to his attention in order to enable him to meet that charge ought to be particulars of conduct which, if established, is capable of being viewed by honest persons as conduct which is infamous. That is all. We have seen that these conditions have been fulfilled by the inquiry and by the tribunal which instituted it. The functions of the court of law are at an end. It appears to me that we have no power to review the evidence any more than we have a power to say whether the tribunal came to the right conclusion. If, indeed, it could be shown that nothing was brought before the tribunal which could raise in the minds of honest persons the inference that infamous conduct had been established, that would go to show that the inquiry had not been a due inquiry; but if there is no blot of that kind upon the proceedings, the jurisdiction of the domestic tribunal, which has been clothed by the Legislature with the duty of discipline in respect of a great profession, must be left untouched by courts of law. It appears to me for these reasons that the view which Cotton, L.J., has expressed, is the sound one, and I entirely concur with it.

Next comes a very serious question, whether or not the tribunal which adjudicated in respect of the appellant's conduct was, in respect of two of its members, rendered incompetent by the fact, as alleged, that they had taken part as accusers before the General Medical Council of that very person upon whose conduct they were adjudicating. As the Lord Justice has said, nothing can be clearer than the principle of law, that a person who has a judicial duty to perform disqualifies himself from performing it if he has a pecuniary interest in the decision which he is about to give or a bias which renders him other than an impartial judge. If he is an accuser he must not be a judge. If he has a pecuniary interest in the success of the accusation he must not be a judge. Where such a pecuniary interest exists, the law does not allow any further inquiry as to whether or not the mind was actually biassed by the pecuniary interest. The fact is established from which the inference is drawn that he is interested in the decision, and he cannot act as a judge. But it must be in all cases a question of substance and of fact, whether one of the judges has in truth also been an accuser. The question which has to be answered by the tribunal which has to decide —the legal tribunal before which the controversy is waged—must be, has the judge whose impartiality is impugned, taken any part whatever in the prosecution, either by himself or by his agents?

I think it is to be regretted that these two gentlemen, as soon as they found out that the person accused, was a person against whom the complaint was being alleged by the council of a society to which they subscribed and to which they in law belonged as members, did not at once retire from the inquiry. I think it is to be regretted, because judges, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion, and in the minds of strangers the position which they occupied upon the General Medical Council was one which required explanation. Whatever may be the result of this litigation, I trust that in future the General Medical Council will think it reasonable advice that those who sit on these cases, should cease to occupy the position of subscribers to a society which brings these cases before the General Medical Council.

Having said that I will come back to the point which we have to decide, whether these two gentlemen took any part whatever in the prosecution, either by themselves or by their agents. It appears to me, in spite of the cloud which the ingenuity of the appellant's counsel raised upon it, that the true answer must in this case on the facts—and it is a question of fact—be in the negative. I think that, although they were members of the incorporated body whose council did bring this complaint before the General Medical Council, they did not themselves take any part, and could not have taken any part, whatever in the prosecution. They did not in fact take any part whatever in the prosecution, and the prosecution was not conducted by the council of the union as their agents. The council of the union was supreme in the matter, and I think that these two gentlemen stand clear, upon the facts being investigated, of all suspicion whatsoever.

For these reasons, treating the latter part of the case as one which depends upon an inference of fact, and regretting, as I do, that there should be colour for the suggestion that has been made, and that a controversy should accordingly have arisen which required to be carefully considered, nevertheless I think that, as a matter of substance and of fact, these gentlemen were not accusers on this particular occasion.

The appeal, therefore, in my judgment must be dismissed, with costs.

FRY, L.J.—Two questions have been urged before us. The first was a question whether the charge which was laid before the General Medical Council was one which was within the jurisdiction of that council. Now with all that has been said by my learned brothers on that part of the case I entirely concur. I shall add nothing to what they have so fully and clearly expressed.

Then comes the second question, whether, having regard to the fact that two members of the General Medical Council which adjudicated on the charge, were subscribers to what is known as the Medical Defence Union, the General Medical Council as so constituted, was competent or incompetent to determine the charge. Now there, again, there are two subordinate questions in which I entirely agree with my learned brethren. In the first place I cannot for one moment yield to the argument which was addressed to us by the leading counsel for the General Medical Council that they were not acting judicially in the performance of their duties on that occasion. The nature of the proceedings and the effect of the proceedings seems to me to be very strong to show that it must be a judicial proceeding, because the result was to deprive Dr. Leeson of rights which before that, were vested in him as a duly qualified medical man on the register of the council. Further than that, the language of the statute, if it be necessary to refer to that, is in my judgment equally clear—it requires a due inquiry. It requires a judgment. It requires that that judgment shall find him guilty. Now "inquiry" and "judgment" and "guilt" are all words which express and which are relevant to a proper form of judicial proceedings, and therefore, although this body proceeds by different rules of evidence to those on which the courts of law proceed, I cannot for a moment doubt, that the council were proceeding judicially, nor can I help adding, that the manner in which the council has proceeded on this inquiry, as on all other inquiries, shows that the council are fully conscious that they are performing judicial duties, and endeavour evidently to perform them in a very admirable manner.

Now the second point is this. It was urged before us that the Medical Defence Union were not in fact complainants. It was said that the Medical General Council could proceed without any prosecutor or person acting before it. They might proceed mero motu. That is quite true, but it is equally true that in this case they did not proceed mero motu, but they proceeded in this manner. They allowed the solicitor and the honorary secretary of the Medical Defence Union to appear before them in the character of complainants, a course which seems to me to have been a very convenient one to pursue, and it is not unworthy of remark that on the very same meeting of the General Medical Council at which these proceedings were taken against Dr. Leeson, rules in respect of the procedure at such inquiries were passed, which divided themselves into two classes of cases. Where the inquiry is brought before the General Medical Council by a complainant, and the complainant appears personally or by counsel or by a solicitor, then a certain order of procedure was enacted, and that order of procedure followed very nearly the procedure before a court; it gave the complainant an opportunity to state his case, then produce his proofs; then the accused was to be invited to state his case and to produce his proofs; and then there was an opportunity given for a reply in certain cases. The second class of cases was where no complainant appeared. There the General Medical Council proceeded simply by reading the complaint and calling on the accused practitioner to state his case and produce his evidence. It is evident therefore, the Medical Defence Union, either as a whole or by their executive, were proceeding as complainants and as quasi-prosecutors in this inquiry. No doubt the Medical Defence Union acts through its council, through its executive body, and this proceeding was taken by the executive body, and they were represented as I have already stated, by their solicitor and the honorary secretary. They acted in fact as prosecutors, producing the evidence and stating the case and urging what was to be said for the prosecution or quasi-prosecution. Now to that union two of the members of the General Medical Council which sat upon this case, and therefore took part in this decision, were subscribers, and it may be taken that this prosecution—I call it a prosecution for the sake of brevity—this proceeding, was within the objects of the union. Now it appears to me that subscribing to a union of this description implies two things. It implies a general sympathy with the objects of the union, and it implies, secondly, a confidence in the discretion of the executive body who have to carry on the business of that union. No doubt the amount of confidence and the amount of sympathy may vary in different cases and from time to time with the same subscribers; but that is the natural conclusion I think one arrives at when one finds a person subscribes to an association for carrying on prosecutions. Now that, in my opinion, makes the subscriber to an association of this kind, what has been called a virtual prosecutor—of course he is not an actual prosecutor, he is not before the tribunal in propria persona, he has not even given instructions to the solicitor who appears, but he has shown his sympathy and his confidence in that body who are acting in this respect, and I cannot think that a body of subscribers to a union of this description, could form a satisfactory body of judges to determine the proceedings taken by the union itself. Taking that view of the case I cannot shut my eyes to the fact, which judges know as well as everybody else, that there are in this country numerous associations formed for the purpose of carrying on prosecutions in respect of alleged violations of the law of various kinds. They may be sometimes in respect of violations or alleged violations of rights of fishery in a river, as in the Tees case (Reg. v. Allan), or they may be violations or alleged violations of the laws which restrain cruelty towards animals, or they may be violations or alleged violations of the ecclesiastical laws. Now it appears to me that subscribers to those associations indicate their sympathy with the general proceedings of the body in carrying on those prosecutions, and I think they come within the description which has been laid down of virtual prosecutors.

To my mind this point is determined by authority. I do not say authority binding on us, but authority which I think deserves the utmost respect and consideration. I mean the case to which Cotton, L.J., has referred, of Reg. v. Allan. In that case there was a voluntary association of persons, which consisted of two classes—first, ordinary members, who were the owners of riverside property, or occupiers of the rights of fishing in the Tees and its tributaries; secondly, honorary members, who might be desirous of promoting the objects of the association by contributing to its funds, and who were, as I understand, not riparian proprietors or owners of rights of fishing in the Tees. That body acted, as most of these bodies do, through a committee, and that committee was not only to make bye-laws and rules and regulations, but they were the persons to engage and dismiss watchers; and, in the event of proceedings under the Act being considered necessary, they—that is, the committee—were to instruct the secretary to enforce its provisions, and the secretary and treasurer were, subject to the approval of the committee, to determine what proceedings should be taken against any person acting in contravention of the law. The ordinary members, therefore, and the honorary members had nothing whatever to do with instituting the prosecutions, or appointing watchers. The person who laid the information in that case was a watcher of the association—therefore engaged and liable to dismissal, not by the general body, but by the committee. The magistrates who sat on the bench to hear that complaint were three—Mr. Allan, who was an ordinary member and the owner of property having a frontage to the river; Mr. Smith, who was not only an ordinary member, but an active member of the committee, and had been concerned in a resolution which authorized the committee to take proceedings for the recovery of such penalties as, in their opinion, had been incurred at the defendants' locks; and lastly, Mr. Pease, who was not an ordinary member, but only a subscribing member of the association. Those were the three justices.

Now in what way did the court deal with the application to quash the conviction on the ground of the magistrates being the virtual prosecutors? Cockburn, C.J., said:—"It is impossible to hold, consistently with the principles which have been established by decided cases, and are founded in the very essence of justice, that these magistrates were competent judges upon the occasion in question." Now, observe, he does not hold that one magistrate is disqualified, but he holds that all three were disqualified according to the essential principles of justice. "An information was laid against the defendant for the violation of the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed for the protection of salmon fisheries." Then he says:—"Certain members of that association were present as justices"—again dealing with them all individually—"and took part in this conviction. They were essentially prosecutors, being members of an association the aggregate of which were undoubtedly the prosecutors." Then Lord Blackburn—Blackburn, J., as he then was—in my view, notwithstanding what has been said by Cotton, L.J., took the same view. He deals, no doubt, in the first place, with the case of Mr. Smith, who was a member of the committee; but he goes on to add this:—"There may be difficulty in finding magistrates in this neighbourhood who are not interested to hear such an information, but members of the association which institutes the prosecution must not act as judges upon it." In other words, he says neither an ordinary nor an honorary member of this association can act as judge upon the matter. Every subscriber to that association appears to me, in the view of these two learned judges, disqualified from sitting as judge or acting as judge on that complaint.

I think, therefore, that is a decision which, in point of substance and principle, applies to the present case. Of course it is not binding upon us, but, in my view, that decision is right, and I think it ought to be upheld and applied to the present case. I think it is a matter of public policy, so far as is possible, that judicial proceedings should not only be free from actual bias and prejudice of the judges, but that they should be free from the suspicion of bias or prejudice, and I do not think that subscribers to associations for the purpose of carrying on prosecutions, can be said to be free from suspicion of bias or prejudice in the cases of prosecutions instituted by the associations to which they subscribe. It is needless for me to disclaim any intention, in arriving at that conclusion, of holding that the two gentlemen in question were liable to any bias. That appears to me a point which is not really open to us, because I put my decision on the ground of public policy, and I disclaim any right to inquire whether in fact they were or they were not biassed. I need hardly say that I do not believe they were. Then it was urged that this case is not conclusive and is not in point, because it was said that there the association was not an incorporated one, and in the present case it was incorporated. That, in my judgment, has nothing to do with the case. Corporation or non-incorporation is quite immaterial in considering the operation upon the mind of being a member of a union for the purpose of carrying on prosecutions. I think, therefore, that we should be misled by a trivial and immaterial difference if we gave any effect to that. If the matter, therefore, rested with me, I should have held that the decision of the General Medical Council in this case was invalid, and that the General Medical Council, as constituted on the occasion in question, was not competent to decide on the case before it, and in so doing I think that I should best maintain the dignity, and, therefore, the usefulness, of the General Medical Council. My learned brethren are of the opposite opinion, and, therefore, this appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

GRAY v. SMITH AND BENNITT. (a.)

Partnership — Dissolution—Agreement to retire from partnership—Specific performance—Concluded agreement—Interest in land within Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4—Right to use name of retiring partner.

*Gray, Smith, and Bennitt being partners, Smith agreed to retire from the partnership, and almost immediately afterwards Bennitt signed a document, the material part of which was as follows:—"Rough Draft.—*31 May, 1888.—This is to record that, in consideration of William Gray or his executors paying H. C. Bennitt or his assigns the sum of £100 on the 1st of January, 1890, and the sum of £100 on every 1st of January for the nine succeeding years, H. C. Bennitt agrees to withdraw from the firm of Gray, Smith, & Bennitt." The partnership business was carried on upon leasehold premises.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that the document amounted to a concluded agreement, and that, though, as involving an agreement to assign the leasehold premises, which constituted an interest in land, it fell within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, it was a sufficient memorandum in writing within that section.

Held, also (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that Gray was not entitled to use Bennitt's name as part of the title of the new firm.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

It appeared that Messrs. Gray, Smith, & Bennitt entered into a partnership in 1885 as soap manufacturers. In May, 1888, Smith agreed to retire from the firm, and at the end of the same month Bennitt signed the following document:—"Rough Draft.—Rockingham Soap Works, Wath-on-Dearne, 31 May, 1888.—Memorandum from Gray, Smith, & Bennitt.—This is to record that, in consideration of William Gray, or his executors, paying H. C. Bennitt, or his assigns, the sum of £100 on the 1st of January, 1890, and the sum of £100 on every 1st of January for the nine succeeding years, H. C. Bennitt agrees to withdraw from the firm of Gray, Smith, & Bennitt." Bennitt shortly afterwards repudiated the contract, and refused to execute an assignment of his share in the partnership property. The business had been carried on upon leasehold premises.

Gray brought this action for specific performance, and a declaration that the partnership was dissolved. The defendant Smith delivered no defence, but Bennitt set up (inter alia) the defence that the agreement involved the sale of his share of the leasehold premises on which the business was carried on, and that therefore the transaction was within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and that the above memorandum was an insufficient memorandum in writing within that section.

Smith, as one of the partners, appeared by counsel at the trial, but did not oppose the plaintiff's contention, merely asking for his costs.

Kekewich, J., held that the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds applied, but that the memorandum was sufficient to satisfy it, and he expressed an opinion that Gray would not be entitled to use Bennitt's name as part of the title of the new firm.

The order as drawn up included a declaration that the plaintiff was not entitled to use Bennitt's name as part of the title of the new firm.

The defendant Bennitt appealed from the former part of that decision, and the plaintiff Gray from the latter part.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. Terrell, for Bennitt.—This was an agreement within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, because it was an agreement to assign the partnership business, a most material part of which was the leasehold premises. My first point, however, is that no concluded agreement was come to between the parties. It was a material part of the contract that there should be an indemnity, and that is not in the memorandum. The document really only amounted to heads of an agreement. But assuming there was a concluded agreement, it is one that comes within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and the memorandum is insufficient as not containing all the material terms of the agreement on its face, as it should do to satisfy that section. The indemnity is not an implied term. The ordinary relation of vendor and purchaser does not imply any undertaking by the purchaser to indemnify the vendors.

Curtis Price, for the defendant Smith, merely asked for his costs.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the plaintiff.—[COTTON, L.J.—We do not require to hear you in answer, Mr. Crackanthorpe, but we should like to hear you in your own appeal.] We are entitled to call ourselves the successors of the late firm, but, as the injunction stands at present, we cannot use the defendant's name at all. Further than that, we have a right to use the old name, and a right to sell the existing stock of soap which is impressed with the old name, and is included in the assets assigned to us: Levy v. Walker, 27 W. R. 370, 10 Ch. D. 436; Banks v. Gibson, 13 W. R. 1012, 34 Beav. 566. The soap is part of the assets assigned to us. That the right to use the name is part of the assets of a partnership was held in Levy v. Walker, per James, L.J. "Gray, Smith, & Bennitt" is a mere style or firm. Gray is in the same position as if the goodwill were expressly assigned. The firm name is a mere fancy name, and is a part of the goodwill of the firm, being the only name. There is a property in it, and an agreement to hand over all the property of the firm includes the name. The agreement to withdraw implies an agreement to hand over all the property of the firm, which includes the goodwill, and that includes the name. Even if we are not entitled to use the name, Bennitt has no right to stop us from doing so.

H. Terrell, for the defendant Bennitt, was not called upon in the plaintiff's appeal.

COTTON, L.J.—I think we need not hear any further argument. To take the appeal of the defendant Bennitt first, his first contention is that there was no concluded agreement at all between himself and the plaintiff Gray at the time the memorandum was signed. That contention, however, is not supported by the evidence, though, no doubt, it was the intention of the parties that the terms of the memorandum should be embodied in a formal document, which was to be subject to the approval of their solicitors. But that means nothing more than that the solicitors were to consider the best way of carrying out the terms of an agreement already entered into.

Then it was said that if there was a concluded agreement at that time, it was an agreement within the Statute of Frauds. I think it was. Then it was contended that there was not in the document of the 31st of May a full statement of all the terms which ought to be stated in writing. But it was not necessary that all the terms should be expressed in the memorandum when those terms were intended to be worked out by a formal deed to be drawn up afterwards. It is said that an indemnity was stipulated for, but was not included in the memorandum, though it was an essential part of the agreement. But when the agreement was carried into effect by a formal deed there would have to be an assignment of all the interest in the leasehold property on which the partnership business was carried on, and that would contain an indemnity to the assignor. There is an implied obligation upon the assignee, when the property is given up to him, to indemnify the person who gives it up, in the absence of any express contract for indemnity. Bowen, L.J., reminds me that there was one other point—it was one which failed to make much impression on my mind. It was that there was no stipulation in the memorandum as to the time when the defendant was to withdraw from the firm. Well, that being so, in the absence of any specified time, the time for him to withdraw would be "forthwith"—that is to say, within a reasonable time. In my opinion the appeal of the defendant fails.

Then, as to the cross appeal of the plaintiff, the judge held that the agreement gave the plaintiff no right to use the name of the defendant as part of the the title of the firm. Was the judge wrong in deciding that the plaintiff could not continue to use the old firm's name? I think he was right, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to use it, except in the case of the stock-in-trade existing at the date of the dissolution of partnership, and which was stamped with the name of the old firm, which included that of the defendant. But it was contended that the plaintiff was entitled to use Bennitt's name, because the right to use the name is part of the goodwill of the partnership, and the goodwill is part of the property to be assigned, and that the right to use the name would therefore be included in the assignment of the property. We must look at the memorandum to see if there was to be an assignment, not only of the leasehold shop, but of all the property of the partnership. I think it implies that the plaintiff is to have an assignment, but when it says that Bennitt is to withdraw from the firm, that does not imply, but rather contradicts the view, that the plaintiff was to have the right to use Bennitt's name. In the case of Levy v. Walker the agreement was not at all like that in the present case. In that case Levy could not have been subjected to any liability by the continued use of the name of the old firm. It was not his name. Moreover, there was in that case an assignment in express terms of the goodwill and business, whereas in the present case the only agreement is that Bennitt shall withdraw from the partnership. The plaintiff's appeal, therefore, fails also, and he is not entitled to use the defendant's name except so far as is necessary in order to wind up the affairs of the old firm.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I believe we all think, after the discussion that has taken place, that it is necessary to modify the injunction by adding some such words as these: "Except so far as is necessary, in order to realize the assets of the old firm."

REG. v. VESTRY OF ST. PANCRAS. (a.)

Metropolis Management Acts—Officer of vestry—Superannuation allowance—Discretion—29 & 30 Vict. c. 31, ss. 1, 4.

A metropolitan vestry has a discretion, under 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31, s. 1, not only to grant or refuse a superannuation allowance to a retiring officer, but also as to the amount of the allowance, provided that it does not exceed the scale prescribed in section 4.

Reg. v. Vestry of St. George's, Southwark, 35 W. R. 841, 19 Q. B. D. 533, dissented from.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division making absolute a rule for a mandamus (ante, p. 238).

The facts are fully set out in the report below. For the purposes of this report they may be shortly stated as follows:—Richard Westbrook had been for some years in the service of the Vestry of St. Pancras as rate collector, and upon his resigning office he applied for a superannuation allowance under 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31. His salary was at that time £480 a year. The vestry at an ordinary meeting resolved to grant him an allowance if he would accept £150 a year. Westbrook declined this, insisting that he was entitled under the Act to £230 a year. The vestry thereupon, at a meeting convened for the purpose under section 7 of the Act, refused his application for an allowance. In Reg. v. Vestry of St. George's, Southwark, 35 W. R. 841, 19 Q. B. D. 533, it was held that if a vestry in their discretion grants an allowance the amount must be in accordance with the scale laid down in the Act.

The Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) held that under the circumstances the vestry had not exercised their discretion on fair and proper grounds, and made the rule for a mandamus absolute, directing them to hear and consider the application of Richard Westbrook for a superannuation allowance, and to take the necessary steps to secure him such allowance according to the provisions of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31.

The vestry appealed.

The case is reported solely upon the question whether the decision in Reg. v. Vestry of St. George's, Southwark, was right, and so the facts, arguments, and judgments relating to the exercise by the defendants of the discretion are omitted. It is sufficient to state that the Court of Appeal agreed with the Divisional Court that the defendants had not properly exercised their discretion, and affirmed the order for a mandamus.

By 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31, s. 1, "The vestry of any parish . . . within the metropolis . . . may, at their discretion, grant to any officer . . . who shall become incapable of discharging the duties of his office with efficiency by reason of permanent infirmity of mind or body, or of old age, upon his resigning . . . an annual allowance not exceeding in any case two-thirds of his then salary, regard being had to the scale of allowances hereinafter contained."

By section 4, "Subject to the provisions herein contained, the allowance . . . shall be as follows:"—(then followed a scale beginning at ten-sixtieths for ten years' service and increasing one-sixtieth for each additional years' service up to forty-sixtieths).

Poland, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, for the defendants.—The decision in Reg. v. Vestry of St George's, Southwark, was wrong, and ought not to be followed. Section 1 of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 31 gives the vestry an absolute discretion, both as to granting an allowance, and also as to the amount of it, subject to the scale in section 4 not being exceeded. The words in section 1, "regard being had to the scale," only mean that, as regards the amount of the pension, the vestry must look at the scale to see that they do not exceed it.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the prosecutor.—The words in section 1 giving the vestry a discretion refer only to the question whether they will grant a pension or not. The amount is regulated by the scale in section 4. Section 1 refers the vestry to the scale, and section 4 says that the allowance "shall be as follows."

Reported by W. F. HARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the Lord Chief Justice and Mathew, J., both held that they could not go into the question whether the case of Reg. v. Vestry of St. George's, Southwark, was rightly or wrongly decided. They considered themselves bound by it; though they said that they did not agree with it. This court, however, could say whether they would follow that case or not, and, having carefully considered the language of the statute, I am prepared to say that I too disagree with that case.

Now, section 1 of the Act provides that the vestry may, at their discretion, grant to any officer, who shall come incapable of discharging the duties of his office by reason of permanent infirmity or old age, an annual allowance. Those are the conditions precedent to the grant of an allowance. If the section had stopped there, then, no doubt, the discretion of the vestry would only extend to the grant or refusal of an allowance, and the amount of the allowance, if granted, would be fixed by the scale in section 4. But the section goes on:—"Not exceeding in any case two-thirds of his then salary." That seems to me, by necessary implication, to involve this, that the vestry have a discretion to give less. An instance of the use of similar words occurs in section 6, where it is said that a gratuity not exceeding three months' pay may be given. Can anyone doubt that under those words the vestry could give a sum less than three months' pay? Section 1, however, further goes on:—"Regard being had to the scale of allowances hereinafter contained." Those words refer to section 4, which prescribes the scale, a scale of allowance ascending with the number of years' service. That enables the vestry to regard the number of years' service in exercising their discretion as to the amount of the allowance so long as they do not exceed the limit prescribed by the scale, but it does not, in my opinion, prevent them from granting a smaller allowance if they think fit in their discretion to do so. This interpretation of section 1 seems to me to render the interpretation of section 4 reasonably plain, for then the words "the allowance shall be as follows" refer to the maximum rate of allowance as prescribed by the scale, and do not take away from the discretion previously given by section 1. The vestry, therefore, upon the application for an allowance, if they decide to grant one, may either grant the full allowance authorized by the scale or any less sum. In my opinion, the decision in Reg. v. St. George's, Southwark, cannot be supported.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Henn Collins suggested that the only discretion the vestry had under section 1 was to consider whether the retiring officer should have a pension or not, but that there was no discretion as to the amount of the pension, the amount being fixed by the statute. The result of such a construction would be that whenever a vestry think it desirable to grant a pension they must shut their eyes to the amount they are going to vote, as the statute acts automatically and fixes the amount. The Legislature might conceivably have so enacted; but if they had intended to do, so one would have expected to find the two functions clearly separated. It seems to me that the Act gives the vestry power to determine, not only whether there shall be a pension, but also what its amount is to be within certain limits. Section 1 places in the discretion of the vestry the power to grant an annual allowance "not exceeding in any case two-thirds of his then salary." Those words fix the maximum. It seems clear to me that the question of quantum is dealt with by this section as well as the question of the grant, and that both are linked together as matters of discretion. The section then goes on to say, "regard being had to the scale of allowances hereinafter contained." One may be allowed to ask, What would be the use of looking at the scale if the scale worked automatically? Obviously it would be of use to refer to the scale if the vestry had a discretion to act within the scale. The true meaning of those words, in my opinion, is that the vestry is to look at the scale to see that it does not exceed it. Reliance has been placed on the words in section 4, "the allowance shall be as follows." Those words seem to me to be merely declaratory of the maximum limit allowed by the scale, and not to fetter the discretion within the scale. This seems a more reasonable construction of the Act than that adopted in Reg. v. Vestry of St. George's, Southwark.

In re EAST LONDON RAILWAY CO. OLIVER'S CLAIM. (a.)

Railway company—Lands injuriously affected—Amount of compensation—Question of liability—Order for trial by judge of the High Court—Jurisdiction—Railways Regulation Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), ss. 41, 43—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, r. 7*a.*

Upon a claim for compensation against a railway company for lands alleged to be injuriously affected, the railway company disputed the title of the complainant to the lands in question, and, on an application of the railway company under section 41 of the Railways Regulation Act, 1868, to a judge at chambers, an order was made directing that the questions of liability and the amount of compensation (if any) should be tried before a judge of the High Court sitting without a jury.

Held, that the order exceeded the jurisdiction given to a judge at chambers under the said section, and that "the question between the parties" mentioned in the section only embraced the question of compensation.

Semble, that the question of compensation, if ordered to be transferred to the High Court under the section, could only be tried by a judge with a jury.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) reversing an order of Grantham, J., at chambers.

Under the Railways Regulation Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), s. 41, an application had been made at chambers on behalf of the East London Railway Co. to have all questions at issue between the parties removed for trial to the High Court. Notice had previously been given to the sheriff to issue his warrant for a jury to try the question of compensation in accordance with the provisions of the Railways Regulation Act, 1868, adopting the procedure under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the sheriff had fixed a day for the hearing. Grantham, J., made an order directing that the questions of liability and the amount of compensation (if any) claimed by one Oliver in respect of lands alleged to be injuriously affected by the railway works should be tried before a judge of the High Court sitting without a jury. The Divisional Court set aside this order on the ground that section 41 of the Act of 1868 gave no jurisdiction to make it. Against this decision the East London Railway Co. appealed.

Littler, Q.C., and Lawson Walton, for the appellants.—By section 41 of the Railway Regulations Act of 1868 "the question between the parties" can be transferred to the High Court by order. That must mean the whole question at issue, whether of liability or compensation. Both questions could then be disposed of at one sitting: New River v. Midland Railway Co., 25 W. R. 502; Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 37 W. R. 285, 22 Q. B. D. 435; East and West India Docks v. Gattke, 20 L. J. Ch. 217.

Jelf, Q.C., and Gover, for the respondent.—Whether damage has arisen by the acts of the railway company must be a question of fact for a jury, while the question of title is for the judge, so there must be a separate trial of the issues in any case. The question of compensation is alone dealt with in section 41 of the Act of 1868. It is only in regard to that question that the judge has jurisdiction to order its transfer. The order in any case is beyond the judge's jurisdiction, since he can only order the question between the parties to be tried before a judge and jury. If the question here is only one of discretion, that discretion has been wrongly exercised. In the Birmingham Land case a verdict was first taken on the question of compensation and treated exactly as a verdict taken in the sheriff's court.

Littler, Q.C., in reply, cited the practice of the Chancery Court of prohibiting by injunction the trial of the question of compensation before the question of liability had been determined: London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Smith, 1 M. & G. 216.

Jelf, Q.C., referred to South Staffordshire Railway Co. v. Hall, 3 M. & G. 353, and London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Cross (per Lindley, L.J.), 34 W. R. 201, 31 Ch. D. 367, as overruling the older chancery practice.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—At the time when the Railways Regulation Act, 1868, was passed the law had been perfectly settled in regard to actions under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts for injury to lands—namely, that no question in law or equity could be raised to try the title of the complainant in regard to land so alleged to be injured until the amount of compensation for the alleged injuries had been decided by a jury in the sheriff's court. It is equally clear that at the trial the title of the claimant to the lands injured might be assumed to be bad, and yet that question of the possible damage might be tried before the sheriff's jury. It is said that the Court of Chancery was once accustomed to issue an injunction against the sheriff's jury proceeding with any inquiry until the court had decided the question of title and a decision of Lord Cottenham has been cited to this effect (London and North-Western Railway Co. v. Smith.) It is clear that Lord Truro was, in a subsequent case (South Staffordshire Railway Co. v. Hall), not of the same opinion, since, though he declined to be quoted as overruling Lord Cottenham, he left it open for succeeding equity lawyers to say, and for the House of Lords to hold, that he had practically overruled the earlier decision of Lord Cottenham granting such an injunction. The law may therefore be taken to be settled beyond a doubt, against an injunction being granted under such circumstances, since Mr. Walton has been unable to cite to us any case beyond this one, which has practically been overruled. It is argued, however, that section 41 of the Railways Regulation Act, 1868, altered the course of procedure so far as to allow the court or judge, when applied to, to order or not, at his discretion, the question of title to be decided first, or together with the question of compensation. I may observe upon this that if the Legislature had intended to give such a discretion, the existing practice being then perfectly well settled, it would have stated such an alteration in plain terms. Is that the effect of section 41? It must be admitted that if that section does effect that alteration it is drawn in terms the very opposite of clear, and such a meaning can only be deduced from a special interpretation of particular words by a manipulation rather than construction of their ordinary meaning. All the argument depends on this section. Has the Legislature thereby given power to the court or judge to alter the former settled practice? This section enacts that: "Whenever, in the case of any lands purchased or taken otherwise than by agreement for the purposes of any public railway, any question of compensation in respect thereof, or any question of compensation in respect of lands injuriously affected by the execution of the works of any public railway, is, under the provisions of 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act of 1845' (g), to be settled by the verdict of a jury empanelled and summoned as in that Act mentioned, the company or the party entitled to the compensation may, at any time before the issuing by the company to the sheriff as by that Act directed, apply to a judge of any one of the superior courts of common law at Westminster, who shall, if he think fit, make an order for trial of the question in one of the superior courts upon such terms and in such manner as to him shall seem fit; and the question between the parties shall be stated in an issue to be settled in case of difference by the judge, or as he shall direct, and such issue shall and may be entered for trial and tried accordingly in the same manner as any issue joined in an ordinary action, at such place as the judge shall direct; and the proceedings in respect of such issue shall be under and subject to the control and jurisdiction of the court as in ordinary action therein, but so nevertheless that the jury shall, where the issue relates to the value of lands to be purchased, and also to compensation claimed for injury done or to be done to lands therewith, deliver their verdict separately in manner provided by the forty-ninth section of 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.'" The section only applies to "lands purchased for the purposes of a public railway" and to any question of compensation in respect thereof, or any question of compensation in respect of lands injuriously affected by the execution of the works of any public railway." "Whenever any such question—i.e., of compensation—is to be settled under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, by the verdict of a jury empanelled as therein mentioned, the company or party may . . . apply to a judge of the superior court, who shall, if he shall think fit, make an order for trial of the question in one of the superior courts upon such terms and in such manner as to him shall seem fit." "The question" must refer to the question of compensation as mentioned at the beginning of the section. Whether the judge could, since the Judicature Act, order such a question to be tried before a judge alone, it is not necessary for us here to determine. He certainly could not at common law at the time when this section was enacted. Here we have only to say what question he could order to be tried in the superior court. The section goes on, "The question between the parties shall be stated in an issue to be settled in case of difference by the judge or as he shall direct." These are the only words relied upon by the appellants in support of their contention upholding the judge's order at chambers. But it must be noted that the words are still "the question," not "the questions" between the parties. The only question hitherto mentioned is that of compensation, the one which would be tried before the sheriff's jury unless ordered otherwise by the judge. It is argued that the judge could not be meant to settle issues of compensation only, and that the words necessarily include the question of title. But I do not think that is a necessary implication, since there might be distinct questions of compensation upon which it might be advisable to have distinct verdicts from the jury, and if so the Act may intend to provide that such be put in separate issues to be settled by the judge if necessary. To say that the mere words "the question between the parties" may be intended to enlarge the only question previously alluded to—viz., of compensation—is to give an unreasonable construction to the words, since the obvious answer is that, had the Legislature intended to alter or extend a well-known form of procedure, it could easily have done so in plain words, and it is admitted by the very argument of the appellant that these words do not do so in plain language, but only by inference. It is said that the further enactment that the proceedings in respect of such issue shall be under and subject to the control and jurisdiction of the court as in ordinary actions therein," shows that the usual consequences of a judgment are to follow—namely, execution—and thereby imply that all questions between the parties may have been determined by the proceedings. But it is a mistake to suppose that execution is under the control and jurisdiction. Execution is a right which the successful party is entitled to use unless otherwise stayed. It depends upon the party to put it into practise, and is not the necessary proceeding under the control of the court. All that the court does is to see that that right of the successful party is exercised according to law. The control alluded to in the section is presumably the control which the court exercises over questions submitted to arbitration, as to the reception of proper evidence, &c., and the intention is to assimilate the trial of these questions of compensation to the general control exercised over tribunals of reference and arbitration. I can see nothing in section 41 which shows sufficiently, or indeed at all, that the rights of parties under the Lands Clauses Act are in any ways affected. It is argued that section 43 is in favour of the appellants, which enacts that "the verdict and judgment of the court upon any issue authorized by this Act shall, as regards costs and every other matter incident to or consequent thereon, have the same operation and be entitled to the same effect as if that verdict and judgment had been the verdict and judgment of a sheriff upon an inquiry conducted upon a warrant under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845." But either this section leaves untouched the question of compensation dealt with in section 41 or, if it applies, it is against the appellants, because it places the verdict and judgment of the High Court upon the issue exactly in the same position as the question of compensation before the sheriff, implying that it is a similar issue. Possibly it may refer to the lodging of that verdict and judgment at the town clerk's offices, as, it is asserted, is the necessary proceeding with the verdict and judgment of the sheriff's court under the Act of 1845. What I think it practically means is that the issue or question allowed by this Act to be transferred to the High Court gives to the High Court a peculiar jurisdiction and does not bring the issue or question under the general jurisdiction of that court. Its verdict and judgment could not be enforced under its general jurisdiction. Some machinery is required, and the sections together apply to the verdict and judgment of the High Court upon the issues or question of compensation brought before it under the provisions of this Act exactly the same machinery as was supplied by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for the same issues or question of compensation before the sheriff's court. I am of opinion that Grantham, J., had no jurisdiction to make this order, nor do I see any reason why we should exercise any discretion we may have to order that the question of compensation should be transferred to the High Court. I will not here express any opinion as to whether such a question could, since the Judicature Act and the new rules consequent thereon, be tried before a judge of the High Court alone sitting without a jury.

FRY, L.J.—This is an application to restore an order made for the trial of this claim of compensation as well as a question of title before a judge of the High Court without a jury. One ground is that all questions between the parties can be thereby decided on in one sitting; the other ground is based upon special circumstances. The first point is the important one. It depends upon the construction of the Railways Regulation Act, 1868, s. 41. The proceedings under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act were well known when this later Act was passed. Two distinct questions were differently tried, one, that of compensation, by the sheriff and a jury summoned under his warrant, the other, that of title, by a judge and a jury of the High Court. The chancery courts seem at one time to have tried to interfere with the trial of the question of compensation by an injunction restraining such a proceeding until the question of title had been decided; but they have for a long time withdrawn from any such interference, and the right of its exercise seems to have been strongly doubted, so that the general practice of having the question of compensation tried first must be taken to be the established practice. Section 41 commences by regulating the trial of the question of compensation before a sheriff's jury, it goes on to enact that "the question between the parties" may upon application be ordered to be tried before a judge of the High Court with a jury. What is the question alluded to? Clearly the question which was, if not otherwise ordered, to be tried in the sheriff's court. But that is the question of compensation only. I can hardly understand that there can be any real doubt that that is the true and plain construction of the words. This is further shown by the words of section 43, that "the verdict and judgment of the High Court upon the question so ordered to be submitted to it shall have the same operation and the same effect as the verdict and judgment in the Sheriff's Court." As to the argument that it would be more convenient to try both questions at one sitting, if such a course would really shorten the proceedings, it would doubtless be advisable if permitted under the Act, but, if so, such procedure must exist in all cases. Here, according to the argument of the appellants, if the question of compensation can be transferred into the High Court and be tried with the question of title, it comes under the general jurisdiction of the High Court, and a long process of appeal would thereby become open to the parties, whereas if the question is left to be tried in the Sheriff's Court no such appeal is left open. It cannot be intended that two such different procedures should be allowed under the wording of the Act, which expressly enacts that the verdict and judgment of the High Court upon the question transferred by order to that court, should have the same operation and effect as the verdict and judgment in the sheriff's court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Upon the question of discretion as to transferring the one question of compensation to the High Court I do not see that it would be advisable so to order the present case, in view of the delay which would be incurred, and seeing that the sheriff has already issued his warrant for a jury to view the buildings alleged to be injured, and has fixed a day for the trial of the question of compensation. It is not necessary, therefore, to decide whether the order is wrong in respect of its ordering a trial before the judge alone, but I am inclined to think that such a trial must be before a judge and jury. This is special legislation for specific procedure, and I doubt if such could be altered by subsequent general legislation as to procedure under the Judicature Act.

GOSSAGE'S CASE. (a.)

Habeas corpus—Application for writ—Inability to obey caused by previous illegal act of person to whom writ addressed—Intention to evade process of court.

The defendant, having permission from the parent of a child to keep the child in his institution, without the leave of the parent, handed the child over to a person to be adopted by him and taken out of the country. Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Bowen, L.J.).

In September, 1888, Dr. Barnardo received into his homes a boy of twelve years of age named Harry Gossage, who had been found in a destitute condition at Folkestone. The boy's father was dead, and his mother resided at Leamington. Communications were entered into with the mother, and on September 29 a letter was written by her expressing her wish that the boy should be kept at the homes as she could not afford to keep him herself. Dr. Barnardo thereupon sent to her for her signature the form of agreement in use by him in such cases, which contained a consent by the parent to the child being sent to any of her Majesty's colonies. This form was never filled up or signed, and was subsequently returned to Dr. Barnardo. On November 12 an application was received at the homes purporting to be made on behalf of the mother that the boy should be transferred to a Roman Catholic home. On November 16 Dr. Barnardo handed the boy over to a Mr. Norton in order that he might adopt the child and take him to Canada. Mr. Norton made it a condition of receiving the boy that he should give no address in order to escape the importunity of the boy's relatives. The child's mother was not told until January 4 that he had been sent away. On an application at chambers for a writ of habeas corpus on March 13, Mathew, J., declined to issue the writ on the ground that the child was no longer in Dr. Barnardo's possession, custody, or control; but on November 23 (the case of Reg. v. Barnardo (Tye's case), 37 W. R. 789, 23 Q. B. D. 305, having in the meantime been decided by the Court of Appeal), the Divisional Court directed the writ to issue.

The appellant in person.

The present case is not governed by Reg. v. Barnardo (Tye's case). The question in that case was as to a valid return to a writ, not as to its issue. It was never intended that the writ of habeas corpus should be punitive and not remedial, and it cannot be issued where it is apparent to the court that obedience to it is impossible.

He cited In re Matthews, 12 Ir. C. L. R. 233; In re Goldsworthy, 2 Q. B. D. 75, 25 W. R. Dig. 169; Reg. v. Clarke, 5 W. R. 222, 7 E. & B. 186; In re Ethel Brown (or Rowe), 33 W. R. 79, 13 Q. B. D. 614; In re Agar-Ellis, 32 W. R. 1, 24 Ch. D. 317.

Forbes Lankester (Joseph Walton with him) for the respondent.—It was decided in Reg. v. Barnardo (Tye's case) that inability to obey the writ, if caused by an illegal act of the person to whom the writ was directed, was no answer to the writ, and it was said that it was immaterial whether the illegal act was committed before or after the application for the writ. Inability to obey is, therefore, no reason why the writ should not issue. When a child is once handed over to a person other than its lawful guardian, that person becomes responsible for its safe guardianship, even although he has parted with its physical custody, if he has done so without legal excuse.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case a writ of habeas corpus has been granted against Dr. Barnardo, directing him to produce to the court the body of Harry Gossage. Against the issue of that writ Dr. Barnardo has appealed, and we have to see whether on all the facts now before us, we, if we had been in the position of the court below, should have directed the writ to issue. The person to whom the writ is directed is the head of a peculiar institution, of which, from its magnitude, it is impossible that he should himself regulate every detail. He is obliged, therefore to leave much of the work that he would otherwise do himself to be done by agents and subordinates, for whose conduct he is, of course, responsible just as if he had done it himself. What is the history of the case? The child in question is found at Folkestone in a destitute condition, and is sent by a benevolent clergyman to Dr. Barnardo's home. There was no obligation on him to receive it, but he agreed to do so. Then, having ascertained that the child has a mother alive—though his father was dead—Dr. Barnardo writes to the mother and sends her, for her signature, the form of agreement which he ordinarily uses in such cases. That agreement, if signed, would, as long as it held good, have authorized Dr. Barnardo to keep the child in his homes, and to send it to any of the colonies. The agreement was, however, never signed; but a letter was written by the child's mother, saying that she should be glad for Dr. Barnardo to keep the child, as she could not afford to keep it herself. What, then, was Dr. Barnardo's position? He had the consent of the mother to keep the child; he had not her consent—so he knew, for I must take it that what was known to his subordinates was known to him also—to send it abroad. As I have said before, in Tye's case, even if the mother had signed the agreement, she might have revoked it at any time, and even where such an agreement is signed by the parent Dr. Barnardo takes a child subject to the risk of subsequent retractation.

The next thing that happens is that certain persons, thinking that it is for the spiritual welfare of the child that it should be brought up as a Roman Catholic, get the mother to give them authority to ask for the child. The mother was herself utterly careless and neglectful of her duty to her child, but I cannot see that these persons used any improper influence with her or that they did anything wrong in asking for the child. Accordingly, on November 12, an application for the child was received at the home by Dr. Barnardo's subordinates. Dr. Barnardo contends that there was no direct authorization from the mother, but the application purports to be made by her authority; and I think that until the contrary was proved, Dr. Barnardo was bound to consider that the letter was written with her sanction. That letter was received by Dr. Barnardo's subordinates; and, if it were necessary, I should hold that their knowledge of it amounted in law to his knowledge of it, but even if he had not known of it, what he did was illegal. On November 16, without any consent of the mother, he hands over the child to a person who tells him that he is going to take it next day to Canada. He may have acted with the best motives, but he acted illegally, and had no authority to do what he did. The child is deliberately handed over in such a way that all means of tracing it shall be lost. I am quite willing to believe that this was done in order to save the person who intended to adopt the child from future annoyance from its relatives, but I repeat that Dr. Barnardo had no right to do as he did. He sent the child out of the jurisdiction in such a way as to deprive the court of the power of inquiring what had become of it. In Tye's case we considered what the consequences of such action were, and we decided that it was no answer to a writ of habeas corpus that the person to whom the writ was directed had, by his illegal act, put it out of his power to obey the writ. Almost every argument that we have heard to day was before us then, and we decided, on the authority of the Irish case In re Matthews, that if a person other than its lawful guardian was once shown to have the custody of a child, and if he wrongfully and without legal authority parted with the custody of the child in such a way that he can truly say that he cannot get the child back when he is asked for it, that is no answer to an application to produce the child. It was unnecessary then, and it is unnecessary now, to decide whether if he would show an absolute impossibility to produce the child, as, for instance, by proving its death, the writ of habeas corpus ought to issue merely to punish him. I have no hesitation in saying that in such a case it ought not to go, and that the writ was not intended to be used merely punitively. But neither in Tye's case nor in this was there any such absolute impossibility. It may be very difficult and almost impossible for Dr. Barnardo to reach the child, but he is bound to use every effort to recover it—to write, to advertise, if necessary to go to America himself to seek for it. It has been urged upon us that Tye's case only had reference to the return to a writ already issued, and that this is an application for a writ to issue. But I think that we assumed in Tye's case that all that had been done was done before the application for the writ, and that Dr. Barnardo had put the child out of his control before the writ was asked for.

I cannot see the distinction between the two cases, and I cannot accept the argument that where, if the writ was issued, we should hold that the facts constituted no answer to it, the same facts, if the writ has not been issued, constitute a good reason against its issue. That argument appears to me too far-fetched, and would be too great a restriction on the power of the court. I do not think that we can accept any excuse except the proof of absolute impossibility to obey. We are, no doubt, applying the writ to a state of circumstances for which it was not originally intended; but I think that, following the Irish case and Tye's case, we must direct the writ to issue. I need hardly say that we are far from deciding now what shall be done with the child when it is produced. It by no means follows that we shall hand it over either to the mother or to the Roman Catholic institution. We shall have then to consider what is most for its benefit. Dr. Barnardo must, I think, produce it, and must use every effort to do so, in order that the court, and not he, may decide what is best for the child's welfare. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—I need not say much as to the circumstances of this case, as I agree with the Master of the Rolls about them. Up till November 16 I think Dr. Barnardo had the lawful custody of this child with the mother's consent. He had, however, no authority to do more than keep it. But on November 16, without any authority, he makes over the child to Norton in order that he should take it to Canada. Dr. Barnardo has argued that at the time of the application for the issue of the writ, and at the time of the making the order for the issue of the writ, against which he now appeals, all his power over the child was gone, and it was no longer under his custody or control, and therefore he says that a writ of habeas corpus cannot issue against him even if he acted unlawfully in parting with the custody of the child. A very similar point was raised in Tye's case. The question there was whether inability to obey the writ if brought about by the unlawful act of the person to whom the writ was directed was a valid return to the writ. Lindley, L.J., there said, "As a matter of law, I think that it is no valid excuse for not producing a child or other person in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus to state inability to obey, if such inability is the result of the previous illegal conduct of the person to whom the writ is addressed. Here the defendant's inability arises from his having illegally sent the child abroad against the will of his lawful guardian, and that he did this before any legal proceedings against him were commenced is immaterial." The question there determined was in regard to a valid return to the writ, and it is now said that what cannot amount to a valid return to the writ cannot be a reason why the writ should not issue. The Master of the Rolls says that the court there intended to decide that point, and that there judgment applies equally to the issue of the writ as to the return to the writ. If that is so I must differ from that judgment.

I cannot think that it was ever intended that the writ should issue when, to the knowledge of the court, it was impossible that it should be obeyed. The very name of the writ, the suggestion that the person to whom the writ is directed has the custody of the body, the exigence of the writ that he should produce the body, and the statutes relating to the writ, all combine to show that the principal object of the writ was that the body should be brought before the court, and therefore, if that is really and manifestly impossible, I do not think the writ ought to issue. It proceeds upon the hypothesis of possible obedience, and therefore, if obedience is impossible, the writ ought not to go. Otherwise the consequence would be that the court, by virtue of the writ, would require a person to do that which the court knows to be impossible. That is what the court has never been in the habit of doing. Then, for not doing that which it was impossible for him to do, a person would be in contempt. Contempt of this kind is the failure to do something which the court orders to be done, and which the person ordered can do. If it is impossible for him to do that which he is ordered to do, there is no contempt. If, therefore, we directed the writ to issue in such a case, we should be using it to punish—though, perhaps, justly enough—a person for having done a wrongful act before the writ was issued. I do not think it would be right so to strain the machinery of the writ. It would be to determine that a person might be committed to prison on affidavit, and by a single judge, for an unlimited period. All this makes me pause before saying that where the facts would not amount to a good return the writ must issue nevertheless.

It is said that the case of In re Matthews is an authority for that proposition. That case came before the court on three occasions. The first question was whether the writ could issue; the second, whether the facts proved constituted a good return to the writ; and the third, whether the contempt which had been committed had been purged. It is plain that only the first of these can be an authority in this case. The decision on that point relied on the fact that the court believed that the person to whom the writ was addressed had the "virtual" custody of the child. If by virtual custody what would in law amount to legal custody is meant the case is no authority for the proposition now contended for. If virtual custody means anything other than legal custody, I confess that I do not understand what it does mean.

Therefore, I think that if we were called upon to issue the writ knowing that it would be impossible for it to be obeyed, I could not be a party to such a decision. But there is, in my opinion, one exception to this view. Where an illegal act resulting in inability to obey the writ is done before the issue of the writ, and there is reason to believe that it was done in order to evade the exigence of the writ and to defeat the process of the court, then there is an exception to the rule I have laid down, and in such a case the writ must issue. The facts of the present case raise in my mind the strongest suspicion as to the circumstances under which the child was made over to this person from Canada, and I cannot help thinking that the child was sent out of the jurisdiction of the court in order to evade the operation of the writ, and I am inclined to believe that if the writ issues the child will be produced. I think it lay on Dr. Barnardo to repel the inference which the circumstances of the case raise that this child was sent away in order to evade the process of the court. He has not done so, and, therefore, I agree in thinking that the writ must issue. I cannot but believe that if it goes it is highly probable that the child will be produced.

Petition.

This was a petition for the sanction of the court to resolutions for the reduction of the capital of the company. The company was incorporated in April, 1888, its capital being £800,000, divided into 45,000 ordinary shares of £10 each and 35,000 preference shares of £10 each. The vendor of the patents to the company had received in part payment for the same a number of fully-paid ordinary and preference shares, but in consequence of the property sold having been found to be of less value than originally estimated, the vendor, by an agreement dated the 10th of August, 1889, and made with the company, agreed to surrender 16,325 ordinary shares and 12,697 preference shares to the company for cancellation, for the purpose of reducing the amount of his consideration. The usual resolutions had been passed by the company for the reduction of its capital by the cancellation of these shares, and the company now asked for the confirmation thereof.

Farwell, for the petition.—This case is distinguishable from The Union Plate Glass Co., 37 W. R. 792, 42 Ch. D. 513, as here we ask to cancel fully-paid shares, whilst in that case it was proposed merely to reduce the value of a class of shares. [North, J.—Is there any distinction between reducing shares by taking part off them or by writing off the whole shares?]

He also cited In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., 37 W. R. 249, 39 Ch. D. 582, and In re Quebrada Railway, Land, and Copper Co., 33 S. J. 202, 40 Ch. D. 363.

North, J.—I think I must make the order asked for. Kay, J., says in In re Union Plate Glass Co. that he can find no authority or intimation in the Companies Act, 1867, giving a company power to reduce some of its shares without reducing others, but I cannot find anything in the Act which prevents a company from so reducing its shares, and I adhere to what I said in In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., that there is nothing in the Act which requires that the reduction should be spread, either equally or rateably, over all the shares in the company, and that if it is a proper case for assenting, nothing in the Act prevents me from so doing. I think the application reasonable, and I therefore make the order.

In re Lord Stamford's Settled Estates. (a.)

Settled Land Act, 1882—Different estates and same tenant for life—Application of capital moneys of one estate for improvements on another—Costs of surveyor and solicitor of tenant for life.

Four estates were devised upon trust for the same tenant for life, and, after her death, as to the first three of the estates, to different persons in strict settlement, and as to the fourth, upon trust for a long term of years, and subject thereto as to one moiety to the uses of the first of the other estates, and as to the other moiety to the uses of the second of the other estates.

Held, that, notwithstanding the term of years, the second estate and the moiety of the fourth estate constituted one settled estate within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, and that, consequently, capital moneys arising from the moiety of the fourth estate might be applied in improvements on the second estate; and that the costs as between solicitor and client of the surveyor and solicitor of the tenant for life, in preparing and carrying out the schemes for such improvements, were costs incidental to the application, and payable out of the same capital moneys.

Adjourned summons.

The Earl of Stamford and Warrington, who died on the 2nd of February, 1883, by his will, dated the 26th of June, 1875, devised his Staffordshire, Leicestershire, Lancashire, and Cheshire estates, subject to the mortgages affecting the same respectively, to trustees during the life of his wife upon trust for her benefit, subject to provisions as to management and to the payment of certain annuities. Subject thereto the testator devised the Cheshire, Staffordshire, and Leicestershire estates to different persons in strict settlement, and the Lancashire estate to his trustees for the term of 1,000 years, and subject to such term as to one moiety to the same uses as the Staffordshire estate, and, as to the other moiety, to the same uses as the Leicestershire estate. The trusts of the term of 1,000 years were to apply the rents and profits in aid of the testator's personal estate in paying his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies and annuities given by his will, and then towards discharging, first, the mortgages on the Staffordshire estate; secondly, the mortgages on the Leicestershire estate; thirdly, the mortgages on the Cheshire estate; and, lastly, the mortgages on the Lancashire estate itself; and when the expenses, debts, legacies, annuities, and mortgages were all paid and discharged, the term was to cease and determine. And the testator declared that the subsistence of the term should not prevent the trustees from selling the Lancashire estate for any purpose for which such sale was authorized by the will, and that such sale, unless expressly made subject to the term, should have priority over it. The trustees were also empowered to apportion the Lancashire estate, or any part thereof, among the persons entitled thereto, and for that purpose to revoke and appoint uses of any hereditaments, and to provide, by means of mortgages, for equality of partition. The will further contained powers of management during minorities, and also during the life of the testator's wife, and as to the Lancashire estate during the term of 1,000 years. The management clauses commenced as follows: "And I hereby declare my will to be, as regards each settled estate (for facility of reference hereinafter, the Cheshire estate being considered and treated as one settled estate, the Staffordshire estate and one moiety of the Lancashire estate being considered and treated as one other settled estate, and the Leicestershire estate and the other moiety of the Lancashire estate being considered and treated as the third settled estate)," &c. The will also contained powers of sale and exchange.

The aggregate rents and profits of all the estates were more than sufficient to pay the interest on all the mortgages, but the rents and profits of the Leicestershire estate (which was very heavily mortgaged), exclusive of the mansion-house, were not sufficient by themselves to keep down the interest on the mortgages upon that estate and to pay the expenses of management; permanent improvements were also greatly needed upon that estate. The Lancashire estate, on the other hand, produced a considerable surplus income, and there were in the hands of the trustees capital moneys arising from that estate sufficient for permanent improvements both on that and on the Leicestershire estate.

The present summons was taken out by the Countess of Stamford as tenant for life for a declaration authorizing the trustees to apply the capital moneys arising from the Lancashire estate in improvements on the Leicestershire estate. The summons also asked that the costs of the application, including the costs of the tenant for life and her solicitor and surveyor in preparing and carrying out the necessary schemes, might be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid by the trustees out of the property subject to the trusts of the will.

Hastings, Q.C., and B. Fossett Lock, for the applicant, argued that, as regarded the four settled estates, the will constituted one settlement within section 2 of the Settled Land Act, but that even if that were not so, at all events the Leicestershire estate and one moiety of the Lancashire estate constituted one settled estate.

They cited In re Duke of Marlborough's Settlement, 33 W. R. 871, 30 Ch. D. 127.

Buckley, Q.C., and Marshead, for the trustees, submitted that each estate was the subject of a distinct settlement.—With regard to the costs, they said that the employment of a surveyor was a necessary step towards the exercise of the power, and the case of In re Eyton's Settled Estate, W. N., 1888, p. 254, which appeared to be opposed to that view, was an exceptional case. [STIRLING, J., said that the surveyor's costs were certainly costs incidental to the exercise of the power. They must, however, be reasonable and ordinary costs, and it would not do to get, for the purpose of selling one farm, the costs of a survey of the whole estate.] The next question was as to the costs of the solicitor of the tenant for life. [Hastings, Q.C., said that that was decided by In re Llewellin, 36 W. R. 347, 37 Ch. D. 317. STIRLING, J., said that the words of the Act were not merely "costs, charges, and expenses of," but also "or incidental to," and he thought it was intended to give to a tenant for life properly put to costs and charges in the course of the execution of the power something more than ordinary costs.]

Borthwick, for the infant tenant in tail of the Staffordshire estate, contended that the effect of the interposition of the 1,000 years' term was that the Lancashire estate was divided for the benefit of all the other three estates, the first trust being to discharge the mortgages on the Staffordshire estate, and that while that term was in operation the moiety of the Lancashire estate did not coalesce with the Leicestershire estate so as to form one settled estate.

Henry Fellows, for the tenant for life in remainder of the Leicestershire estate.

Peck, for the tenant for life of the Staffordshire estate.

Hastings, Q.C., in reply.

Aug. 9.—STIRLING, J., stated the facts and continued:—The question which has arisen is this:—It appears that the Leicestershire estate is heavily burdened with mortgages, and there are no capital moneys arising from that estate which are available for the purpose of improvements on that estate, which improvements are urgently wanted. On the other hand, the Lancashire estate is a very valuable estate. It is less heavily burdened, and there are capital moneys arising from it which it is sought to apply in improvements on the Leicestershire estate. It was first contended that as all the four estates were settled by the same instrument, and as there was the same tenant for life of them all, there was really only one settlement created by the will, and one settled estate. As to that, I felt during the argument, and still feel, very great difficulty. It is not necessary, however, that I should decide that question, because the point was, I will not say abandoned, but at any rate not insisted upon; and ultimately the case was put in a different way. It was said that the Leicestershire estate and one moiety of the Lancashire estate constituted but one settled estate. That is totally different from the case at first put with reference to the four estates. As regards the three estates, the Cheshire estate, the Staffordshire estate, and the Leicestershire estate, though they are all settled by the same instrument, and though there is the same tenant for life, in the first place, of them all, yet all the subsequent limitations are in substance different, whereas, as regards the Leicestershire estate and one undivided moiety of the Lancashire estate, the limitations are the same throughout, with this one exception, that upon the Lancashire estate there is created a term of 1,000 years immediately after the death of the present tenant for life.

Now, what are the purposes for which the term of 1,000 years is created? It is for the satisfaction of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, legacies, and annuities, and then for payment of the mortgage debts of all the four estates in a particular order. It seems to me, therefore, that, in substance, we have here a settlement of one estate consisting of the Leicestershire estate and an undivided moiety of the Lancashire estate, but that the undivided moiety is subject to a charge from which the Leicestershire estate is exempt. The question which I have to consider, therefore, is whether, when a settled estate comprises land which is subject to a charge from which the rest of the settled estate is exempt, capital moneys arising from the lands which are subject to the charge can be applied for the improvement of the portion of the settled estate which is not subject to the charge; which is a very different question from the one put forward in the first instance. Mr. Borthwick called my attention to this, that if I come to the conclusion that the capital moneys arising from the moiety of the Lancashire estate are available for improvements on the Leicestershire estate, I must also be prepared to say that they are applicable for any of the purposes to which capital moneys may be applied under the Act, and his argument was that, as regards other applications, there were indications in the Act that that was not intended. In particular, he referred to the sections which deal with the application of the capital moneys in the purchase of lands to be settled to the same uses and to those which deal with the application of capital moneys for the payment off of incumbrances.

Now I must see whether there is anything in the provisions of the Act relating to those applications which prevents me from saying that money arising from the Lancashire estate, which is subject to the charge, can be applied for improvement or otherwise for the benefit of the Leicestershire estate, which is not.

First of all, as regards the investment in land, that is regulated by section 24; and the 2nd sub-section says, referring to land which has been acquired by purchase or in exchange, or on partition, that "freehold land" which has been acquired by purchase shall be conveyed "to the uses, on the trusts, and subject to the powers and provisions which, under the settlement or by means of the exercise of any power of charging therein contained, are subsisting with respect to the settled land, or as near thereto as circumstances permit, but not so as to increase or multiply charges or powers of charging." I must read that in connection with sub-section 5—"Where a charge does not affect the whole of the settled land, then the land acquired shall not be subjected thereto unless the land is acquired either by purchase with money arising from sale of land which was before the sale subject to the charge, or by an exchange or partition of land which, or an undivided share wherein, was before the exchange or partition subject to the charge." The 5th sub-section undoubtedly provides that land purchased by moneys arising from the sale of land subject to a charge is to be conveyed subject to that charge; but it was considered necessary to insert an express provision directed to this particular matter, and the conveyance in that way would not necessarily have followed merely from the provisions of the 2nd sub-section. It is obvious, from a comparison of the 2nd sub-section with the 5th, that the Act contemplates that the settled land may, as to part, be subject to a charge, and as to the rest be free from it, and there is an express provision with reference to the conveyance of land when moneys arise from the part which is subject to the charge. I think that the charge which is referred to in sub-section 5 is not merely one which takes priority over the settlement; but extends to charges which are created by the settlement itself. The word is used in various parts of the Act with reference to both, and conspicuously in section 20, which deals with conveyances; and as to the operation of conveyances made by the tenant for life under the Act, it is expressly enacted by sub-section 2 that such a deed is effectual to pass the land conveyed "discharged from all the limitations, powers, and provisions of the settlement, and from all estates, interests, and charges subsisting or to arise thereunder, but subject to and with the exception of (1) all estates, interests, and charges having priority to the settlement." So that the word "charge" is used there with reference to both classes, and I see no reason why, in sub-section 5 of section 24, that should be limited to charges existing in priority to the settlement. I think, therefore, that, as regards the purchase of lands, that rests on the peculiar provisions of section 24 with reference to those portions of the settled land which are subject to charges.

Then I have next to consider whether there is anything in the way in which the payment off of incumbrances is dealt with which would lead me to suppose that it was not intended by the Act that the power to apply the money in payment off of incumbrances should extend to paying off incumbrances on the part of the land which is not subject to the charge. That is governed by section 21, sub-section 2, which provides that capital money arising under the Act may be applied in "discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances affecting the inheritance of the settled land or other the whole estate, the subject of the settlement, or of land tax, rent-charge in lieu of tithe, Crown rent, chief rent, or quit rent, charged on or payable out of the settled land." Mr. Borthwick directed my attention to section 5, which provides that where, on a sale, exchange, or partition, there is an incumbrance "affecting land sold or given in exchange or on partition, the tenant for life, with the consent of the incumbrancer, may charge that incumbrance on any other part of the settled land, whether already charged therewith or not, in exoneration of the part sold or so given, and, by conveyance of the fee simple or other estate or interest the subject of the settlement, or by creation of a term of years in the settled land, or otherwise, make provision accordingly." That is to say, there are special powers given, on a sale, exchange, or partition, to the tenant for life to shift incumbrances from one part of the settled estate to the other; and the suggestion is that there is no power, in the absence of an express provision, to apply capital moneys arising from one part of the settled estate in discharge of incumbrances on another part. I think that that would be taking too narrow a view of the Act. It has been decided by Pearson, J., in In re Ohaytor's Settled Estates Act, 32 W. R. 517, 25 Ch. D. 651, that capital moneys arising under the Act may be applied in the discharge, purchase, or redemption of incumbrances which affect only a part of the settled land.

The question which I have now to consider is whether, when the capital money arises from the part of the settled land which is subject to the charge, I can apply it in discharge of the incumbrances affecting the other part. There is no restriction expressly imposed by the Act, and it seems to me that, in the absence of express restriction, I ought not to hold that there is no such power, and that the real answer to any difficulty which arises out of the supposition of the existence of such a power is that it is not to be exercised arbitrarily by the tenant for life, but, under section 53, is to be exercised, as all the other powers are, with a due regard to the interests of all parties entitled under the settlement. By that section the tenant for life is, in relation to the exercise of such a power, to be "deemed to be in the position, and to have the duties and liabilities, of a trustee for those parties." Therefore it is his duty, in exercising the discretion which is vested in him under the Act as to the application of capital moneys, to consider whether he is unduly prejudicing any of the parties by the proposed exercise of that discretion, and if he is, then it would not be proper so to exercise the discretion; but where it is a matter of doubt, in the absence of any reason for supposing that the discretion is unfairly exercised, then that discretion ought to prevail. I may illustrate that by reference to the mode in which the income arising during the term of 1,000 years is to be applied in the present case. It is, leaving out the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, legacies, and annuities, to be applied in payment off of mortgage debts on the four estates in the following order: Staffordshire, Leicestershire, Cheshire, and Lancashire. I think it would hardly be disputed that the capital money arising from the Lancashire estate could be applied in discharge, at the discretion of the tenant for life, of incumbrances on the Lancashire estate, notwithstanding the direction of the will as to the proceeds of the income arising during the term of 1,000 years. I think that the point has, in substance, been decided already by Chitty, J., in the case of Clarke v. Thornton, 35 W. R. 603, 35 Ch. D. 307, with reference to improvements. There the will had thrown the improvements on the income, and yet it was held that, notwithstanding the express provision made by the will, the tenant for life had a right under the Act to have capital moneys arising under the Act applied for improvements. It seems to me that the reasoning which prevailed in that case with reference to improvements would also prevail so as to enable incumbrances on the Lancashire estate to be paid off out of capital moneys arising under the Act, in priority to the Staffordshire estate for example, although the income which arises under the trusts of the term of 1,000 years can only, under the terms of the will, be applied in paying off incumbrances on the Lancashire estate in the last place, and after all the incumbrances on the three other estates are satisfied.

Then, again, the contention on behalf of the persons interested in the Staffordshire estate is, that if the capital money is taken and applied in improvements on the Leicestershire estate or is taken and applied in payment of incumbrances on the Leicestershire estate, the persons who are entitled to the Staffordshire estate will be deprived of a certain amount of income during the term of 1,000 years which would be available for payment of the debts on the Staffordshire estate. Now there might be circumstances under which that argument would deserve the very greatest weight. Suppose, for example, that the Staffordshire estate was so heavily incumbered that, according to reasonable calculation, the whole of the income available during the 1,000 years would be required to discharge those incumbrances; then it seems to me that it would not be a fair exercise of the discretion vested in the tenant for life to take the moneys arising from the Lancashire estate and pay off the debts of the Lancashire estate in the first instance; but if the Staffordshire estate is only moderately incumbered, and there are ample means under the term of 1,000 years for paying off the mortgages on the Staffordshire estate, then the only result is, that instead of the Staffordshire mortgages being paid off quickly under the term of 1,000 years, a little longer time will be required for their complete discharge, and it would, as it seems to me, be a fair question for the tenant for life to consider which course would be most for the benefit of all parties interested in the settled estate, and if he comes to the conclusion, in the exercise of a fair discretion, that it is better that the money should be applied in payment off of incumbrances, or for the purpose of improvements, then I think that there is power so to do, and that the discre- ought not to be interfered with.

I might give other illustrations of the same thing. If, for example, the Leicestershire estate was heavily incumbered, as I understand it is, and if it were sought to apply such a large amount of the capital moneys that the Staffordshire estate would practically be deprived of any benefit, then I should not think that a fair exercise of discretion; but if it is simply a question of the time at which the Staffordshire estate will be discharged, and the effect of applying the money in the way proposed will merely be to postpone for a little longer the complete discharge of the Staffordshire estate, then I should consider that that would be a fair matter for the exercise of the discretion of the tenant for life. I give these instances simply as general illustrations of the way in which I view the Act.

It seems to me, on the whole, that there is nothing in the Act, either as regards the application of the capital money for the purchase of land or for the purpose of paying off incumbrances, which prevents me from saying that there is power to do what is sought to be done; and that it is a matter for the discretion of the tenant for life, to be exercised in accordance with the provisions of section 53, in each case as to whether the particular application ought to be made. I think, therefore, in this case, it not being alleged that anybody will be irretrievably prejudiced by the proposed application, that I may say that, as regards the capital moneys arising from one moiety of the Lancashire estate, they may be applied for the improvement of the Leicestershire estate, and there must be a declaration to that effect. There will also be a direction that the costs of and incidental to this application, including the costs of the tenant for life, and her solicitor and surveyor, in the preparation and carrying out of the necessary schemes, may be taxed as between solicitor and client, and paid out of capital moneys arising from the Leicestershire and one moiety of the Lancashire estates.

Reg. v. Judge of the Bloomsbury County Court. (a.)

County court—Local jurisdiction—Administration proceedings—Metropolitan county court districts—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 74, 75, 84.

Section 84 of the County Courts Act, 1888, must be construed as forming an exception to section 75, sub-section 3. Therefore, where the plaintiff or the defendant in administration proceedings carries on business within the district of a metropolitan county court, the judge of that court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding that neither the deceased nor his executor had their place of abode within that district.

Order nisi in the nature of a mandamus calling upon the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court to show cause why he should not hear and determine certain administration proceedings.

In October, 1889, one Taylor, a creditor of Richard Cattle, deceased, commenced by plaint in the Bloomsbury County Court proceedings for the administration of his estate, making Mrs. Cattle, the widow and executrix of the deceased, defendant to the proceedings. The deceased in his lifetime, and Mrs. Cattle subsequently, resided at Holloway, outside the district of the Bloomsbury County Court, but within the metropolitan district. The deceased carried on business within the district of the Bloomsbury County Court, and so did his widow after his death. Taylor also carried on business within the same district.

By section 74 of the County Courts Act, 1888: "Except where by this Act it is otherwise provided, every action or matter may be commenced in the court within the district of which the defendant, or one of the defendants, shall dwell or carry on his business at the time of commencing the action or matter."

By section 75: "The provisions of the next preceding section shall not apply to any of the following proceedings; but . . . (3) Proceedings for the administration of the assets of a deceased person shall be taken in the court within the district of which the deceased person had his last place of abode in England, or in which the executors or administrators, or any one of them, shall have their or his place of abode."

By section 84: "Where a plaintiff shall dwell or carry on business in the district of the Bloomsbury County Court of Middlesex, or in the district of the Brompton County Court of Middlesex"—and so on, enumerating all the metropolitan county court districts—"and the defendant shall dwell or carry on business in the district of any of the said courts, the action or matter may be commenced, and all proceedings thereon taken and had, either in the court of the district in which the plaintiff shall dwell or carry on business, or in the court of the district in which the defendant shall dwell or carry on business."

The county court judge thought that, inasmuch as neither the deceased nor his executrix had their place of abode within the district he was precluded by sub-section 3 of section 75 from entertaining the proceedings, and therefore declined to hear the matter.

F. J. Lowe, for the defendant in the administration proceedings, showed cause.—The county court judge rightly declined jurisdiction. Section 74 is a general rule applying to "every action or matter." Section 84 uses the same words, "the action or matter"; and the effect of section 84 is to modify the general rule in its application to the metropolitan district. Section 75, on the other hand, deals with various special "proceedings," which are neither actions nor matters within the meaning of section 74; and sub-section 3 deals with administration proceedings. Section 75 thus stands quite apart from section 74, and its operation is not modified by section 84.

Rose-Innes, for the plaintiff in the administration proceedings, was not called upon to argue.

Fry, L.J.—The question is as to the jurisdiction of the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court to entertain these administration proceedings, which are brought by Taylor, who carries on business within the district of that court, against Mrs. Cattle, who also carries on business within the same district. It is necessary to consider the sections of the County Courts Act, 1888. By the interpretation clause (section 186), "action" shall include suit, and shall mean every proceeding in the court which may be commenced by plaint; and "matter" shall mean every proceeding in the court which may be commenced otherwise than by plaint. Therefore the two words "action" and "matter" include all possible proceedings which may be commenced in the court. Section 74 says that, except where by the Act it is otherwise provided, every action or matter may be commenced in the court within the district of which the defendant dwells or carries on business. Section 75 makes an exception to section 74. It says that the provisions of that section "shall not apply to any of the following proceedings." The word "proceedings" here is a single word used to express both actions and matters. Sub-section 3 says that administration proceedings shall be taken in the court in the district of which the deceased had his place of abode or the executor has his place of abode. In the present case the place of abode of the deceased and that of the executrix are outside the district of the Bloomsbury County Court.

Then section 84 says that where the plaintiff dwells or carries on business in the district of any metropolitan county court, and the defendant dwells or carries on business in the district of any metropolitan county court, the action or matter may be commenced, and all proceedings thereon taken, either in the court of the district in which the plaintiff dwells or carries on business or in the court of the district in which the defendant dwells or carries on business. If this section applies, the judge has jurisdiction. In my opinion it does apply. It is said that section 84 constitutes an exception to section 74, and not to section 75. But section 84 is a local provision, the two other sections being generally applicable to the whole country. I see no reason why section 84 should not apply to administration proceedings as well as to other proceedings. I think that section 84 is not only an exception to section 74, but also to section 75. I am therefore of opinion that the county court judge had jurisdiction.

Mathew, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that section 74 stands clear of section 84, and that section 75 equally stands clear of section 84.

Order absolute.

In re Brighton and Dyke Railway Co. (a.)

Railway company—Scheme of arrangement—Assent of preference shareholders—Ordinary shares split into preferred and deferred half-shares—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), ss. 12, 17—Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118), s. 14—Brighton and Dyke Railway Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. clxxxix.), ss. 10—13, 17.

A railway company, by its special Act, was empowered to divide any share in its capital into a preferred half-share and a deferred half-share; the dividend which would have been payable on an entire share to be applied, first, in payment of a dividend not exceeding five per cent. per annum on the preferred half-share, and the remainder (if any) on the deferred half-share; each preferred half-share to be entitled to such dividend in priority to the deferred half-shares bearing the same number; the several half-shares to be half-shares in the capital of the company, and every two half-shares (whether preferred or deferred, or one of each) held by the same person, to confer such right of voting at meetings of the company, and to have all such other rights, liabilities, and incidents as attached or were incident to an entire share.

The share capital of the company, on its incorporation, consisted exclusively of ordinary shares. The company, in exercise of the power in that behalf contained in its special Act, divided a part of its shares into preferred half-shares and deferred half-shares. The directors of the company subsequently prepared and filed a scheme of arrangement with the creditors of the company.

Held (reversing North, J.), that the holders of preferred half-shares were not preference shareholders nor a class of preference shareholders within the meaning of section 12 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, and therefore that it was not necessary to procure their assent as such to the scheme of arrangement, in the manner required by that section.

Appeal from North, J.

By the Brighton and Dyke Railway Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. clxxxix.), the Brighton and Dyke Railway was incorporated as a company, with a capital of £72,000 in 7,200 shares of £10 each. The shares were all ordinary shares. Section 10 of this special Act gave the company power, with the authority of three-fourths of the votes of the shareholders at a general meeting of the company specially convened for that purpose, "to divide any share in their capital into half-shares, of which one shall be called 'preferred half-share,' and the other shall be called 'deferred half-share.'" Section 11 enacted that "the dividend which would . . . be payable on any divided share, if the same had continued an entire share, shall be applied in payment of dividends on the two half-shares in manner following—i.e., first, in payment of dividend after such rate not exceeding five per cent. per annum as shall be determined once for all at a general meeting of the company . . . on the amount for the time being paid up on the preferred half-share, and the remainder (if any) in payment of dividend on the deferred half-share. . . ." Section 12 enacted that "each preferred half-share shall be entitled, out of the profits of each year, to the dividend which may have been attached to it by the company as aforesaid, in priority to the deferred half-share bearing the same number." Section 13 provided for the registration of each half-share and the issue of certificates of each half-share bearing the same number as the certificate of the original entire share. Section 17 enacted that "the several half-shares under this Act shall be half-shares in the capital of the company, and every two half-shares (whether preferred or deferred, or one of each) held by the same person shall confer such right of voting at meetings of the company, and (subject to the provisions hereinbefore contained) shall confer and have all such other rights, qualifications, privileges, liabilities, and incidents as attach and are incident to an entire share."

The company, under the power conferred by section 10 of their special Act, had "split" 4,960 of the shares into 2,480 preferred half-shares and 2,480 deferred half-shares, leaving 2,240 shares "unsplit"; the preferred half-shares to have a five per cent. dividend. Subsequently, the company being unable to meet its engagements with its creditors, the directors prepared, and on the 11th of December, 1889, filed, a scheme of arrangement under section 6 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), and that scheme was, on the 23rd of December, 1889, submitted to an extraordinary general meeting of ordinary shareholders specially called for that purpose, and was assented to by a large majority of the shareholders.

On the 2nd of January, 1890, the directors presented a petition, under section 16 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867, for the confirmation of the scheme by the court. The petition was opposed by a minority of shareholders who objected to the scheme.

North, J., ordered that the petition should stand over generally for the purpose of enabling the directors to procure the assent of preference shareholders in accordance with the Act of 1867.

The question in issue was whether or no the holders of preferred half-shares were preference shareholders or a class of preference shareholders within the meaning of section 12 of the Act of 1867, which section enacts as follows:—"The scheme shall be deemed to be assented to by the guaranteed or preference shareholders of the company when it is assented to in writing as follows—if there be only one class of guaranteed or preference shareholders, then by three-fourths in value of that class; and if there are more classes of guaranteed or preference shareholders than one, then by three-fourths in value of each of such class."

The only other section of the Act of 1867 material to be referred to is section 17, which provides as follows:—"After hearing the directors and any creditors, shareholders, or other persons whom the court thinks entitled to be heard on the application, the court, if satisfied that the scheme has been, within three months after the filing of it, . . . assented to as required by this Act, and that no sufficient objection to the scheme has been established, may confirm the scheme."

The Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118), by section 13 enables any company which is by its special Act authorized to raise any additional sum by the issue of new preference shares to create and issue new shares, either ordinary or preference; and section 14 provides that "the preference shares so issued shall be entitled to the preferential dividend or interest assigned thereto out of the profits of each year, in priority to the ordinary shares . . . of the company."

The directors appealed from the decision of North, J.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the appellants.—The Regulation of Railways Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), s. 13, gives power to railway companies which have paid a dividend on their ordinary stock of not less than three per cent. per annum to split their ordinary stock into preferred and deferred ordinary stock. Though that Act does not apply to this company, yet the provisions as to splitting are similar to those contained in the special Act of this company. The holders of preferred half-shares are not holders of preference shares, nor a class of preference shareholders within the meaning of section 12 of the Act of 1867, therefore it is not necessary that their assent should be obtained as such, in the manner required by that section. The directors have obtained the assent of ordinary shareholders as required by section 13 of the Act of 1867. The holders of the preferred half-shares are really only ordinary shareholders. Preference shareholders are those who are entitled to take out of the profits a preferential dividend in priority to the ordinary shareholders: section 14 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863. If these preferred half-shares are to be considered to be preference shares, then stock of the same kind is to be considered as preference stock, and might be invested in, as such, by trustees under the Trust Investment Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32), s. 3 (g); whereas it is obvious such an investment was never intended to be authorized. The shares in this company have not in fact been all split.

S. Stephens, for the holders of some of the preferred half-shares, contrà.—The company have treated the holders of preferred half-shares as preference shareholders in the ordinary sense. In their circulars they speak of these shares as "fixed five per cent. preference shares." The effect of "splitting" is that the preferred half-share is always to have preference. It is a particular class of preference share. The power of splitting shares in this company depends entirely on section 10 of their special Act. The object of this section was to enable the company to create a class of preference shares without being obliged to get a fresh Act of Parliament for that purpose.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

COTTON, L.J. — I don't intend at present to express any opinion as to what might be the result in a case where all the shares in a company like this had been split; but I am of opinion that there is not, at present, in this company a class of preference shareholders within the meaning of section 12 of the Act of 1867. The practice of "splitting" shares does not seem to have been in existence in 1867, but what we have now to decide is, whether or no the shares in this company which have been split, under the power contained in the special Act, do form a class of preference shares within the Act of 1867. I am afraid I do not entertain so clear an opinion on the point as my learned brethren do; for the special Act of this company does not use the same nomenclature as the Act of 1868, and say in express terms that it treats part of the split shares as preferred ordinary stock, and the other part as deferred ordinary stock. But in my opinion it cannot, in substance, be said that there is any class of preference shareholders within the meaning of the Act of 1867, because in the special Act there is nothing mentioned but ordinary shares, and there is no statement that there is to be any preference shares or preference stock at all.

On looking at the special Act of this company one sees that two of these half-shares do not together constitute one entire share; the Act only gives the holder of two of these half-shares the same right of voting at meetings of the company as if he were the holder of one entire share, and that is an entirely different thing from enacting that two of the half-shares constituted one entire share. That seems to me to create a difficulty in the way of the view taken by North, J., for how can it be said that there is any class of preference shares where no preference shares exist, but only two half-shares, which when held by one person gave him the same right of voting as if they were one entire share?

When these split shares were introduced, the framers of the special Act did not provide as to whether the two halves were to be considered preference shares within the Act of 1867 or not. I do not think we can hold them to be so, because preference shares are described by the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, s. 14, as being "entitled to the preferential dividend or interest assigned thereto, out of the profits of each year, in priority to the ordinary shares of the company." But that is not what has been done in this case; the dividend attributable to the ordinary shares is to be given to the split shares, but then that dividend is dealt with in this way: the preferred half of the split share is to have a fixed dividend, and the remainder (if any) is to go to the deferred half of the split share. Though, therefore, there may be a difference of interest as between the holders of the preferred half-share and the holders of the deferred half-share (which may, in the opinion of a judge, make it reasonable, before confirming the scheme, that there should be some assent of the holders of the preferred half-shares), yet I cannot see that section 12 of the Act of 1867 has hit upon the holders of these preferred half-shares, as either preference shareholders or a class of preference shareholders.

I differ, therefore, from North, J., in the view that he took—viz., that the assent of the holders of the preferred half-shares is required by section 12 of the Act of 1867, but I express no opinion as to what had better be done if he sees that there is any difference of interest between the holders of the preferred and the deferred half-shares.

LINDLEY, L.J.—North, J., ordered the petition to stand over, on the theory that this company contained a class of persons who are preference shareholders within the Act of 1867, and that the assent of that class, as required by section 12 of the Act of 1867, had not been obtained. The form of the order made by him clearly shows that that was his view. Was that view right? In my opinion this company contained no class of shareholders who are preference shareholders within the meaning of the Act of 1867, and, therefore, it was not necessary to obtain the assent of that class as required by section 12 of the Act of 1867.

The practice of "splitting" shares has originated since 1867; it seems to have been unknown then. That is how the confusion has arisen in the present case. The holders of the preferred half-shares have, no doubt, as between themselves and the holders of the deferred half-shares, a priority, but they are not what is commonly called preference shareholders, and they are not within the class of persons denoted by that expression in the Act of 1867. I think, therefore, that North, J., erred in the construction he put on section 12 of the Act of 1867. When the petition comes before him again, he will, of course, have to deal with the matter under section 17 of the Act of 1867, and these holders of preferred half-shares will be entitled to be heard in opposition to the scheme. It will be the duty of the judge to see that they are not unfairly dealt with, and that their rights are sufficiently protected, and he may decline to sanction the scheme without their assent. That is all within his power under section 17, and they are sufficiently protected by the duty cast on him by that section.

LOPES, L.J.—In this company there are no preference shares at all; all the shares are ordinary shares which have been split into preferred and deferred half-shares. Preference shares, as I understand the definition of them, are shares which give the right to the holder of them to receive interest thereon in priority to ordinary shareholders. I do not think the holders of these split shares are in that position, and, therefore, they do not come within section 12 of the Act of 1867. The practice of splitting shares does not seem to have been known in 1867, and the Act of 1867 was passed without any reference to the state of things which has happened in regard to this company.

TOMLIN v. LUCE. (a.)

Mortgage—Sale by mortgagee—Misdescription—Compensation to purchaser—Liability of mortgagee to mortgagor—Measure of damages—Minutes of judgment.

On a sale of a building estate by first mortgagees, the particulars, which were prepared by an auctioneer employed by the first mortgagees, contained an erroneous statement that the roads on the property were kerbed and sewered, and the purchaser claimed and obtained compensation in respect of this misstatement.

Held, that, as between the first mortgagees and the second mortgagees, the former were liable to the latter, but only if, and so far as, any loss had been occasioned by the misstatement; that the compensation allowed to the purchaser was not, however, the measure of that loss; and, therefore, that the judgment of Kekewich, J., on that point (37 W. R. 490, 41 Ch. D. 573) could not stand.

Appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J., reported 37 W. R. 490, 41 Ch. D. 573.

The plaintiffs in this action were second mortgagees of a building estate which had been sold by the defendants, the first mortgagees, under the power of sale contained in their mortgage. The property was sold in lots, and the particulars of lots 2, 3, and 4, which were prepared by the defendants' auctioneer, contained a statement that "all roads on the property are constructed in the best manner, are kerbed and sewered, and there is perfect drainage." The property was purchased for £20,800, but the purchaser having ascertained, after the sale, that the above statement was not correct, refused to complete without compensation. The vendors, after some negotiations with the purchaser, agreed to allow the latter to deduct £895 from the £20,800, as compensation.

The plaintiffs by this action claimed, as against the defendants, an account of the purchase-moneys, on the footing of wilful default, and claimed to be entitled to charge the defendants, in taking the accounts, with the sum of £895, as part of the purchase-money which the defendants ought to have received.

Kekewich, J., at the trial of the action, found that, as between the vendors and the purchaser, the sum of £895 was a reasonable and proper sum to allow the purchaser as compensation in respect of the misstatements; but he also held that, in taking the accounts between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the defendants ought to be charged with this £895.

The defendants appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and G. Harris Lea, for the appellants.—The misstatement the defendants made was a misstatement inducing an increase, not a diminution in the price, and yet the judge below has held that the defendants must account to the plaintiffs for the whole £895. [They were stopped.]

Neville, Q.C., and Charles Browne, for the plaintiffs, the respondents.—The case was argued below on the point as to whether or not a mortgagee selling under a power of sale was responsible for the negligent act of his agent, and for loss arising therefrom. It is quite possible that the misstatement may result in a loss on the purchase-moneys, and as to the amount, that is a question of quantum. It seems to have been admitted in the court below that the plaintiffs were entitled to the whole £895, or to nothing. We are, however, willing to take an inquiry now, as to what was the actual loss arising by the misstatement.

G. Harris Lea, for the appellants, did not object to such an inquiry.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants against a judgment of Kekewich, J., and the defendants are appealing as to the exercise of a power of sale contained in their mortgage. They got for the property a bid, and a contract was made for a sum of £20,800. Unfortunately the conditions of sale contained a statement by the auctioneers of importance. It was this, that, it being building land, and to a certain extent prepared for building, "the roads on the property are constructed in the best possible manner, are kerbed and sewered, and there is perfect drainage." The purchaser found out that that was not correct, and he contended that he was entitled to rescind unless some allowance was made for the misstatement, and after some negotiation between the parties, a sum of £895 was allowed to be deducted from the purchase-money. The defendants, therefore, did not get the whole of that sum, but only £19,905, and the plaintiffs, who are second mortgagees—whom therefore we may treat as owners of the equity of redemption—said that that ought not to be allowed, that that £895 ought to be struck out and disallowed; and they put it in this way by their pleadings, and I suppose by their argument, that the defendants, the first mortgagees, were answerable for that £895 on this ground, that they were answerable for what they received or for what, but for their wilful default, they might have received. The judge has found that that sum, was a sum reasonably and properly allowed by the first mortgagees in order to avoid any contest with the purchaser. I do not see how, on that footing, and on the contention of the plaintiffs, that sum of £895 could be disallowed to the first mortgagees, as in fact it has been disallowed by Kekewich, J., by the judgment which he gave. On what exact ground he disallowed it, I cannot understand. Probably he was led to that judgment by the contention on the one side, and on the other, because the defence seems really to have been very much, if not entirely, directed to this, that the mortgagees, selling under their power, employed a competent auctioneer, and were not answerable for any blunder which the auctioneer committed. There they were wrong, and that point, I think, was not argued before us; but I think probably that Kekewich, J., was misled in his judgment by the two grounds taken on both sides—on both the plaintiff's and defendant's sides—but certainly we cannot agree with that judgment as being a correct statement of the law. What we think is this, that the mortgagees when they sold, there being that blunder made by the auctioneer, were answerable for any loss which was occasioned by that blunder. It may be that there was none. It may be that there was considerable loss occasioned by it, because, of course, as Kekewich, J., says, and I think rightly, in an estate like this, the question whether the roads were properly made throughout, and whether the things stated to have been done had been done, was an important matter, and he finds, as against the mortgagees, the value of the misstatement to be £895. I think the value of the misstatement was this—what would have been given by a purchaser for the property if it had been properly described—that is to say, if the fact that the roads had not been kerbed and sewered, had been stated? In other words, the difference between £19,905 and that which would have been given if the property had been properly described. The loss occasioned is a matter of fact, and in my opinion, therefore, the judgment is not right in treating the defendants, the mortgagees, as answerable for this £895 as a sum which, but for their wilful default, they might have received. That being so, we must disaffirm the judgment. The plaintiff, when he found that we intimated our opinion against the view taken by Kekewich, J., asked for an inquiry as to what the damages were, and this was not objected to on the other side. What ought to be done, we think, is to direct an inquiry, and Fry, L.J., has prepared and will read the terms of the order which we are prepared to make. We must ascertain what really was the loss occasioned by this misstatement. In our opinion the mortgagee exercising the power of sale is answerable for that loss. Fry, L.J., has also prepared minutes dealing with the costs. The view taken in those minutes is, I think, a correct one. The first mortgagees have their costs up to and including the trial, then this inquiry will be directed; and his lordship has framed the minutes in such a way that it will not be necessary for the matter to come back to us, but in accordance with the result of the inquiry will the costs of the inquiry be borne.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion as Cotton, L.J. I agree with the order as framed by Fry, L.J. I do not agree with the judgment of the court below, or with the reasoning of it. I do not think that reasoning is the proper line of reasoning to apply to the facts of this case, and as the case below has been reported as an authority with respect to the measure of compensation, I think that that case and the reasoning of it must be taken to be overruled, and to be no longer an authority so far as it stands upon the records of the court. But, on the other hand, we must recollect that this action has got into a tangle, owing, I think, to the way in which it was presented to Kekewich, J., at the trial, and by which he was led to adopt the line of reasoning which turns out really not to be applicable to the case. I agree that the true measure of damages, or the true measure of allowance I ought to say, is that which has been stated by the Lord Justice and embodied in the order. The only point upon which I have some hesitation is this. I am not certain, if I had been sitting by my own unaided, I will not say light, but twilight, that I should have come to the same conclusion as to the costs of the trial below. It is a matter with which my brothers are so infinitely better fitted to deal with than I am, that I willingly yield my view on this point to theirs.

FRY, L.J.—[The Lord Justice read the minutes which are given below, and proceeded:—] I am of the same opinion. It does not appear to me that the reasoning of Kekewich, J., can be maintained. I am not able myself to follow it. I think the learned counsel who appeared for the respondents are quite right in the course which they took in not insisting upon maintaining the judgment as it stands. Then arises the question of inquiry, and as to this we were relieved of much difficulty by the appellants' counsel not objecting to that inquiry. The case was evidently in a very tangled condition, partly by reason of the way in which it had been conducted in the court below, and partly by reason of the admissions which seem to have been made on both sides; but under the circumstances of the case I think the minutes of the judgment which I have already read are the right ones for this court to pronounce.

With regard to the question of costs in the court below, I agree with Cotton, L.J., and for this reason. It appears to me that the plaintiffs came with an entirely false view of their case, their pleadings stating a claim to £895 as a specific disallowance, and they claimed to have an account taken as against the first mortgagees upon the footing of wilful default. They not only put that forward in their pleadings, but they seem to me to have put that as the case before the learned judge, and I think they were entirely wrong in this case until the moment when Mr. Neville asked for the inquiry in lieu of the disallowance of £895. I think, therefore, that they were absolutely wrong at the hearing before the learned judge, and ought to pay the costs up to and including that hearing. The subsequent costs caused by the inquiry, we deal with by making them follow the event. Under the circumstances no costs of the appeal.

MINUTES OF JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs, by their counsel, admitting that the disallowance of the £895 cannot be maintained, and asking in lieu thereof for the inquiry hereinafter directed, and, the defendants not objecting to such inquiry, vary the judgment of Kekewich, J., and, as varied, let the judgment stand as follows:—This court doth order that the following inquiry and accounts be made and taken—that is to say (1) An inquiry whether the lots 2, 3, and 4 would have sold for any, and, if any, for what, sum in excess of the sum of £19,905 (being the sum of £20,800 less £895) in case the same had been sold without the misstatement contained in the particulars in the pleadings mentioned; (2) An account of what, on the 5th of May, 1887, was due to the defendants under and by virtue of the indentures of mortgage dated October 26, 1883; (3) An account of the defendants' costs of this action up to and including the hearing before Kekewich, J.; (4) An account of the proceeds of sale of the hereditaments comprised in the said indentures of mortgage received by the defendants or by any other person or persons by the order or for the use of the defendants. Declare that in case that it shall appear on the inquiry numbered (1) that the said lots would have sold for any sum in excess of the sum of £19,905, then the costs of the said inquiry are to be borne by the defendants. But if it shall appear that the said lots would not have sold for any sum exceeding the said sum of £19,905, then the said costs are to be borne by the plaintiff. Let the smaller of the two following sums be deducted from the larger of them, and the balance thereof be certified—that is to say, (A) the amount of proceeds of sale as certified on account numbered (4), together with the sum, if any, which may be certified in answer to inquiry numbered (1); (B) the sum due on the said indentures of mortgage as certified in answer to account numbered (2). Let interest be computed on the said balance at five per cent. per annum from the 5th of May, 1887, and certified accordingly. Let the plaintiff be charged with the amount of account numbered (3), and to or from the said balance or interest, Let the costs of the said inquiry numbered (1) be added or deducted as the case may require. Let the ultimate balance, according to all the said directions and declarations, be certified. Liberty to apply in chambers for the payment of such balance and in respect of any costs not dealt with by this order. No costs of this appeal.

HODGSON v. BELL. (a.)

County court—Power to remit action—Claim reduced to a sum not exceeding £100—Reduction by payment after action—"Payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 65.

Where, in an action of contract, the claim indorsed on the writ is reduced to a sum not exceeding £100 by payment of part after action brought, there is no jurisdiction under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to remit the action for trial in a county court.

Appeal from an order of the Divisional Court remitting an action for trial in the county court.

The claim indorsed upon the writ was for £173 money lent. Upon an application under order 14 the plaintiff obtained leave to sign judgment for £101, and the defendant paid that sum. The defendant had leave to defend as to the balance. The master, upon the application of the plaintiff under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, ordered the action to be tried in the county court. The defendant appealed, and Charles, J., referred the matter to the court.

In the Divisional Court Denman, J., held that there was power to remit the action to the county court, Wills, J., held that there was not. The order of the master therefore stood. The defendant appealed.

51 & 52 Vict. c. 43, s. 65.—"Where in any action of contract brought in the High Court the claim indorsed on the writ does not exceed £100, or where such claim, though it originally exceeded £100, is reduced by payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise to a sum not exceeding £100, it shall be lawful for either party to the action at any time, if the whole or part of the demand of the plaintiff be contested, to apply to a judge of the High Court at chambers to order such action to be tried in any court . . . and on the hearing of the application the judge shall, unless there is good cause to the contrary, order such action to be tried accordingly," &c.

Colam, for the defendant.—There was no jurisdiction here to remit the action. The words of section 65, "payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise," are the same as those used in section 7 of the County Courts Act, 1867, and it was held that those words did not include a payment after action brought: Osborne v. Homburg, 24 W. R. 161, 1 Ex. D. 48; Foster v. Usherwood, 26 W. R. 91, 3 Ex. D. 1. In section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856, the words used were "payment into court, payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise," and it was held in Gray v. Hopper, 36 W. R. 716, 746, 21 Q. B. D. 15, 246, that those words included payment after action brought. The Legislature, in the present Act, knowing of those decisions, deliberately adopted the words used in the Act of 1867, and therefore section 65 does not include a case where the claim is reduced to a sum not exceeding £100 by payment after action brought.

T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.—This is a new statute, and the court will not follow the decisions upon the former statutes. The language of the present section is different. Under the Act of 1867 the application could only be made by the defendant, and had to be made within eight days. In the present section the application can be made by either party, and may be made at any time, clearly showing that the Legislature contemplated a reduction of the claim after action brought. If the contention of the defendant is adopted the effect will be to narrow the Act.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This appeal must be allowed. There were before the County Courts Act, 1888, two sections of two separate Acts stating the circumstances under which actions could be remitted or transferred to the county court. In each section certain elements of reduction were stated by which a claim, that was originally beyond the county court jurisdiction, might be reduced to a sum within the jurisdiction. One section used a set of words which plainly referred to matters reducing the claim before action brought, and accordingly the courts construed the section in that way. The other section used an additional phrase, "payment into court," which could only occur after action brought. It was held that the words "or otherwise" following that phrase included a payment after action brought. There being then those decisions upon those two sections, the County Courts Act, 1888, was passed, a consolidating and amending Act, in which the words "payment into court" is omitted. The Legislature, under those circumstances, must have carefully left those words out, and the only inference that can be drawn is that it intended to leave them out with all the consequences arising therefrom by reason of the decisions of this court. There was therefore no jurisdiction to order this action to be tried in the county court.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In section 26 of the County Courts Act, 1856, the words used were "payment into court, payment, an admitted set-off, or otherwise." Though the word "payment" meant payment before action brought, the words "or otherwise," by reason of the preceding words "payment into court," were held to include payment after action brought. Then came the County Courts Act, 1867, and section 7 expressly omitted the words "payment into court." In Foster v. Usherwood it was held that the word "payment" there also meant payment before action, and being coupled with "set-off," which must arise before action, it was held that the words "or otherwise" must also refer to something happening before action. The present statute is in pari materiâ with those two statutes as so construed. The words used in section 65 are the precise words used in section 7 of the Act of 1867. The present Act is a consolidating Act, and, though it is also an amending Act, it is perfectly clear that the words used must bear the same construction as the same words in the former Act. It was said that the words of section 65 giving an unlimited time to make the application showed that the intention was to alter the meaning placed upon the words in the former Act. Unless that was a necessary implication the court could not depart from the construction placed by the former decisions upon the words. I can see no such necessary implication here.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is really unarguable. There were two sections in two former Acts, one of which was held to extend to payment after action brought, and the other not. The Legislature, knowing of those decisions, deliberately excluded the words which had been held to extend the section to payment after action brought. The Legislature must have done so with the intention of adopting those decisions.

Appeal allowed.

FAITHFULL v. WOODLEY. (a.)

Practice—Motion for judgment in default of pleading—Foreclosure action—Personal judgment—Allegation of amount due—Admission—Form of judgment—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 19, r. 13; ord. 27, r. 11.

On a motion for judgment in default of defence in a foreclosure action, the plaintiff (who was an equitable mortgagee of leaseholds) asked for a personal judgment against the defendant, the mortgagor (who did not appear), for the amount which the plaintiff alleged by his statement of claim to be due to him, on the ground that the defendant, by not pleading, had admitted that amount to be due to him. The plaintiff had not, by his statement of claim, asked for a personal judgment against the defendant.

Held, that the defendant's admission by not pleading, could only be treated as made for the purpose of the relief asked by the statement of claim, and that, as the defendant did not appear, the plaintiff could only have such relief as he had asked by his statement of claim. An account was therefore directed of what was due to the plaintiff.

Motion for judgment.

This was a foreclosure action. The plaintiff was the equitable mortgagee of certain leasehold property; the defendant was the mortgagor. The mortgagor had covenanted to pay the mortgage debt, with interest, and upon the request of the mortgagee to execute a mortgage of the leasehold hereditaments by way of underlease or of assignment of the residue of the original term, as security for the debt and interest, and that meanwhile the property should be charged with the payment to the mortgagee of the mortgage debt and interest. No mortgage had been executed. The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, claimed an account of what was due to him by virtue of his mortgage; payment of the amount found due; and, in default of payment, to have his security enforced by foreclosure or sale, and an assignment of the property for the residue of the term and possession thereof.

The defendant did not put in any defence.

The plaintiff now moved for judgment in default of pleading. The defendant did not appear at the hearing.

J. G. Wood, for the plaintiff.—[NORTH, J.—Why is the application not made by summons?] Because rule 5a of order 55 does not contain any provision that an order for conveyance of the legal estate in property subject to an equitable mortgage can be made on summons. [North, J.—It is not necessary for me to decide now whether the court has jurisdiction to order a conveyance on summons, but I shall give no special decision as to costs.] I now ask for a personal judgment against the mortgagor for the debt and interest in the alternative form settled by the Court of Appeal in Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co., 34 W.R. 22, 31 Ch. D. 42, as applicable to a case in which the amount due on the mortgagor's personal covenant is admitted or proved at the trial. The defendant, by not pleading, must be taken to have admitted the allegation in the statement of claim of the amount due: ord. 19, r. 13. [North, J.—There can be no admission because the defendant does not appear.] The allegation in the statement of claim as to the amount due is not denied, therefore it is admitted. [North, J.—You do not by your statement of claim ask for personal judgment.] It was not asked for in Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co. I ask for what I am entitled to on my statement of claim.

North, J.—As the defendant does not appear I cannot give the plaintiff any relief which he has not asked by his statement of claim. The plaintiff might have asked, by his statement of claim, for judgment for the sum which he alleges to be due, but he has not done so. The defendant's admission by not pleading can only be treated as made for the purpose of the relief which is asked by the statement of claim. The judgment, therefore, will be in the form given in Farrer v. Lacy, Hartland, & Co., for a case in which the amount due is not admitted.

Wells v. Wells. (a.)

Infant—Maintenance—Right to accumulations during minority—Apportionment of maintenance as between income of vested and contingent life estates—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43, sub-section 2.

Under the trusts of a will, an infant granddaughter of the testator was entitled to a life interest in the moiety of the annual income, of a pecuniary legacy and of a freehold house, contingently on her attaining twenty-one or marrying; and power was given to the trustees in their discretion to apply the whole or part of the income arising therefrom for the maintenance of the granddaughter during her minority; the granddaughter was also entitled under the will to a vested life interest in one-sixth share of the income of the testator's residuary estate. After the testator's death, and while the granddaughter was still an infant and unmarried, an order was made in chambers appointing a guardian of the granddaughter, and directing that the trustees of the will should, out of the funds subject to the trusts by the will declared in favour of the granddaughter, pay on account of her maintenance, £100 per annum to her guardian. After the date of this order, and thenceforth during the minority of the granddaughter, the trustees paid the £100 to the guardian out of the whole income arising from the granddaughter's share of the trust property, without distinguishing between the income arising from her share of the pecuniary legacy and the freehold house on the one hand, and the share of residue on the other; and they accumulated the surplus income.

On the granddaughter attaining the age of twenty-one years, the question was raised whether she was absolutely entitled to the whole of the accumulations of income arising from her share of residue, and also in what manner the payments made for her maintenance were to be apportioned as between the income arising from her share of the pecuniary legacy and the freehold house on the one hand, and the one-sixth of residue on the other. There was an affidavit by the trustees that they had not exercised any discretion in the matter. The income arising from the granddaughter's share of the pecuniary legacy and of the freehold house was less than £100 per annum.

Held, that the granddaughter was absolutely entitled to the accumulations of income which had arisen from the share of residue.

Held, also, that the moneys paid for maintenance were primarily payable out of the granddaughter's share of the pecuniary legacy and freehold house, that being most for her benefit, and that, as the trustees had not exercised any discretion in the matter, the court could exercise it for them.

Adjourned summons.

Michael Wells, by his will dated the 26th of April, 1883, bequeathed to his trustees the sum of £2,600 upon trust to invest the same as therein mentioned, also his freehold house and premises called Orchard House, upon trust that his said trustees should stand possessed of the said trust fund, and the said freehold hereditaments and the annual income arising from the same respectively, upon trust, as to one moiety thereof, if and when his granddaughter Rose Wells should attain the age of twenty-one years, or marry under that age, to pay the income arising from such moiety to the said Rose Wells during her life for her separate use, and after her decease should stand possessed of the said moiety of the said trust fund and freehold hereditaments and the income thereof in trust for the children of the said Rose Wells, who being sons should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being daughters should attain that age or marry. Provided always that if the said Rose Wells should be under age and unmarried at the testator's death, the trustees might in their discretion apply the whole, or such part as they should think fit, of the income arising from the said moiety, for the maintenance, education, and support of the said Rose Wells, and such part of the said income as might not be required for such purpose should be accumulated and invested so as to follow the corpus of the fund and premises from which it arose; and as to the other moiety of the said trust fund and freehold hereditaments and the annual income thereof, upon such and the same trusts, and under and subject to the same provisoes and conditions, in favour of the testator's granddaughter Christina Wells and her children as were thereinbefore declared and contained as to the first-mentioned moiety in favour of the said Rose Wells and her children. Provided always that if either of them, the said Rose Wells and Christina Wells, should die without having had any child or children who should attain a vested interest under the trusts aforesaid, then the share of the one so dying should be held upon the same trusts for the other of them, the said Rose Wells and Christina Wells and her children, as were thereinbefore declared respecting her original share; and if both of them, the said Rose Wells and Christina Wells, should die without having had any child or children who should attain a vested interest under the trusts aforesaid, then the said trust funds and freehold hereditaments were to fall into and form part of the residue; and the testator devised to his trustees certain freehold hereditaments upon trust for his daughter Elizabeth Wells for life, and after her death for her children at twenty-one or marriage, and in default of such children the said hereditaments were to fall into and form part of the residue; and the testator devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust for conversion and investment as therein mentioned, and the testator directed his trustees to stand possessed of his residuary estate and the investments thereof as to one-sixth part thereof, upon the same trusts in favour of the said Rose Wells and her children as were thereinbefore declared in favour of his daughter Elizabeth Wells and her children, and as to another one-sixth part thereof upon the same trusts in favour of the said Christina Wells and her children as were thereinbefore declared in favour of the said Elizabeth Wells and her children.

The testator died on the 23rd of March, 1884. At the date of his death, Rose Wells and Christina Wells were both under the age of twenty-one years, and unmarried.

By an order made in the matter of the two infants on the 23rd of July, 1886, a guardian of the infants was appointed, and it was ordered that the sum of £200 per annum should be allowed for the maintenance of the infant Rose Wells out of the funds subject to the trusts declared in her favour by the said will, and the trustees of the will were ordered to pay on account of such maintenance £100 a year to the guardian, by half-yearly payments. The residue of the £200 was ordered to be paid out of other property to which the infant was entitled. From the date of this order until Rose Wells attained the age of twenty-one years the trustees paid the £100 a year to the guardian out of the whole income arising from a moiety of the said legacy and freehold house and the one-sixth share of residue, without distinguishing between income arising from Rose Well's share of the legacy of £2,600 and the freehold house on the one hand, and her share of residue on the other, and accumulated the surplus income. Rose Wells attained the age of twenty-one years on the 21st of May, 1889. She then claimed that, inasmuch as she had under the will a vested life interest in a one-sixth share of the residue, she was entitled to receive all the accumulations of income arising from such share, and she also claimed that her maintenance ought to have been paid out of the income arising from her share of the legacy of £2,600 and the freehold house, in which she only had a contingent life interest, in relief of the income arising from her share in the residue, in which, under the will, she had a vested life interest. The trustees of the will thereupon took out this originating summons against Rose Wells, Christina Wells, and Rebecca Beville and her only child, Fredk. Wells Beville (the persons entitled to the shares of Rose Wells and Christina Wells in the residue, in the event of their both dying without having had any children), as defendants, to have it determined (inter alia) whether Rose Wells was entitled to payment of the whole of the accumulations of income arising during her minority from her share of the residue; and if she was so entitled, in what manner the payments made for her maintenance ought to be apportioned between the income of the respective trust funds settled on her by the will.

The summons was adjourned into court.

There was evidence that the income arising from Rose Wells' share of the legacy and freehold house was less than the annual sum of £100 ordered to be allowed for maintenance.

There was an affidavit by the trustees that they had not exercised any discretion in the matter.

Rolt, for the summons.

Colt, for the defendants, Rose Wells and Christina Wells.—Rose Wells is entitled to all the accumulations which arose from her share in her grandfather's residuary estate. She took a vested life interest in her share, and not a contingent life interest, as in the case of the legacy and freehold house. So far as this point is concerned In re Buckley's Trusts, 31 W. R. 376, 22 Ch. D. 583, is exactly in point. Your lordship is not bound by section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. As the trustees have not exercised their discretion, but have paid maintenance out of the funds generally, without distinction, the court will now exercise their discretion for them: Lucas v. King, 11 W. R. 818.

Marcy, for the other defendants.—As to the accumulations of the income of the residue, I rely upon the express words of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. By section 43, sub-section 2, the trustees are directed to hold the accumulations for the benefit of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property from which the same arise. "Property" there means capital. In re Buckley's Trusts was a very different case from the present, for there the infant might have become entitled to corpus. With regard to the other point, as the trustees have not exercised their discretion, it is too late for them to do it now. [NORTH, J.—If they have not exercised their discretion, must not I exercise it for them?] I submit not, since the time has gone by during which income can be applied for maintenance. The order of the 23rd of July, 1886, precludes this question.

NORTH, J.—I think the point is quite clear. I am of opinion that the accumulations of the income of Rose Wells's share in the testator's residuary estate belong to her absolutely. I think the principle upon which the case of In re Buckley's Trusts was decided applies to the present one. I am by no means satisfied that the word "property" in sub-section 2 of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, means capital exclusively; it, no doubt, includes capital. In the present case I shall be prepared to hold, if necessary, that Rose Wells is, as regards the income of her share of residue, the person who has "ultimately become entitled to the property" from which the accumulations have arisen within the meaning of sub-section 2. I am satisfied that the Conveyancing Act, which was passed for the purpose of shortening and simplifying conveyances, was not intended to alter the devolution of property. Then, as regards the question of apportionment, it seems to me that the case of Lucas v. King is exactly in point. I was under the impression at first that the trustees had exercised their discretion as to which fund should be applied to the payment of the maintenance, and if they had done so I should not interfere with it. It is clear, however, that they have not done so. They have received the income of both funds, and have applied so much of this income as was necessary for maintenance without distinguishing between the two funds, and have accumulated the surplus income. As, therefore, the trustees have not exercised their discretion in the matter, the court has now power to make the apportionment. It is clearly for the benefit of Rose Wells that the income applied for her maintenance should be treated as having come out of the legacy of £2,600 and the freehold house, in exoneration of the testator's residuary estate. There will, therefore, be a declaration that, as between the legacy of £2,600 and the freehold house on the one hand, and the residue on the other, Rose Wells' maintenance ought to have been paid out of the former fund in exoneration of the latter.

FRANCIS v. HARRISON. (a.)

Foreclosure action—Parties—Trustee representing cestui que trust—Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 16, r. 8.

In a foreclosure action a mortgagee defendant who is a trustee of the money secured on his mortgage, and who has become bankrupt, does not properly represent his cestui que trust.

Motion for judgment.

This was a foreclosure action. The plaintiffs were first mortgagees; the defendants were the mortgagor, a second mortgagee, and the trustee in bankruptcy of the second mortgagee. The second mortgagee was a trustee of the money secured by his mortgage for several persons. In February, 1889, he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and he had not entered an appearance to the writ; the other defendants had appeared, but had not delivered any defence.

The action now came on on motion for judgment in default of pleading.

The question was raised whether the second mortgagee sufficiently represented his cestuis que trust.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and B. Fossett Lock, for the motion, referred to Jennings v. Jordan, 30 W. R. 369, 6 App. Cas. 698, and rule 8 of order 16. [NORTH, J., referred to Mills v. Jennings, 28 W. R. 549, 13 Ch. D. 639.]

None of the defendants appeared.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion the defendant Sankey (the second mortgagee) does not sufficiently represent his cestuis que trust. Mills v. Jennings was a redemption action. A foreclosure action differs entirely from a redemption action. In the former the defendant has to provide money to redeem the mortgage; in the latter the defendant has to receive money paid for redemption. It cannot be supposed that an insolvent trustee will be able to find money to redeem a mortgage. The observations made by Cotton, L.J., in Mills v. Jennings appear to me to be precisely in point. The Lord Justice said:—"Under ord. 16, r. 7, of the Rules of Court, 1875, trustees may, both as plaintiffs and defendants, sufficiently represent the trust estate without any of the parties beneficially interested being before the court, with power, nevertheless, for the court or judge to direct any of such last-mentioned persons to be made parties. But this rule is, in substance, a repetition of rule 9, section 42, of the Chancery Act, 1852, and it was argued that in suits relating to mortgages it had been held, as in Goldsmid v. Stonehewer, 1 W. R. 91, 9 Hare, App. 38, that trustees did not sufficiently represent their adult cestui que trust unless it was probable that the trustees, from being executors or otherwise, had funds in hand sufficient to enable them to redeem. But that case was a suit for foreclosure, in which the trustee was a defendant whom the plaintiff sought to foreclose; and there is a reason in such a case for not giving the plaintiff the relief he seeks, unless he brings before the court all those interested in the equity of redemption who may probably have the means of redeeming the mortgage. Here the plaintiff trustee is seeking to redeem, and the dismissal of his bill will be effectual in favour of the defendant Jennings, so as to prevent any further proceedings for redemption in respect of the property vested in the plaintiff as trustee." I should have had great difficulty in holding that even a solvent trustee who is a mortgagee sufficiently represents his cestuis que trust as defendant to a foreclosure action. But here the trustee is a bankrupt, and under these circumstances I think the cestuis que trust are not only proper, but necessary, parties to the action, and I cannot give judgment for foreclosure in their absence. I will give liberty to amend, but I can make no other order.

AMERICAN BRAIDED WIRE CO. v. THOMSON & CO. (a.)

Patent—Infringement—Damages—Reduction in price arising from competition.

The defendants infringed the plaintiffs' patent, and in consequence of the competition thereby caused, the plaintiffs reduced the price of the goods. The official referee found that the damages consisted of (1) the profits made by the defendants by the sale of the goods; (2) the loss arising to the plaintiffs by the reduction in price.

Held, that the loss arising to the plaintiffs by the reduction in price was too remote, and could not be regarded in the assessment of damages, which must be limited to the profits made by the defendants by the sale of the goods by them.

United Horse Shoe and Nail Co. v. Stewart, 13 App. Cas. 401, 36 W. R. Dig. 63, discussed and applied.

Motion.

This action was brought for an injunction against an infringement of the plaintiffs' patent for improvements in braided wire bustles, and for damages. At the trial Kekewich, J., decided against the validity of the patent; but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and their judgment affirmed by the House of Lords. An inquiry as to damages was accordingly taken before the official referee, who awarded to the plaintiffs £8,625 for damages under the following heads: (1) Loss by diminution in price in consequence of the defendants' competition; (2) The actual amount of the defendants' sales.

This was an application to the court by the plaintiffs to adopt the report of the official referee, there being a cross-application by the defendants to vary the report.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Moulton, Q.C., and Roger Wallace, for the plaintiffs.

Aston, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and W. N. Lawson, for the defendants.

KEKEWICH, J.—The official referee in his finding in this case reports that the plaintiffs' prices for goods sold during the period of infringement were diminished in proportion to the defendants' sales during the same period. He also reports that the plaintiffs might have sold at their own original prices but for the sales effected by the defendants. I adopt these findings of the referee as correct. But on this state of the facts a serious question arises—namely, whether the reduction in price caused by the competition of the defendants may be properly regarded as an element in assessing the damages, in other words, whether, in fixing the price of the articles sold both by the plaintiffs and defendants for the purpose of assessing damages, the price originally fixed by the plaintiffs should be taken as a basis, or the price subsequently ascertained and determined by the competition. There is nothing to prove that the fashion of wearing these articles dropped off during the period of infringement, so that the plaintiffs could not have maintained their original prices. The question of damages caused by the difference of price arising from competition was discussed in United Horse Shoe and Nail Co. v. Stewart (13 App. Cas. 401, 36 W. R. Dig. 63). "The sole question," said Lord Macnaghten in that case (p. 416), "is, what was the loss sustained by the appellants by reason of the unlawful sale of the respondents' nails? The loss must be the natural and direct consequence of the respondents' acts. In the first place, I think the claim for loss of profit by reason of the reduction of price must be rejected. I do not think that was the natural or direct result of the respondents' acts."

In my opinion Lord Macnaghten there intended to lay down the rule that in an action for infringement, although the patentee may be entitled to the benefit of all sales made by the person infringing the patent as if they had been made by himself, so that he may take all the profits derived from such infringement, yet, if he thinks fit to reduce the price at which he himself was selling the goods in question, he is not entitled to recover the difference between the original and the lower price, because it is not the natural and direct consequence of the acts of the person so infringing, and the damage is therefore too remote. No damages must therefore, in my opinion, be given in respect of the reduction in price of the goods which the plaintiffs have themselves sold; but the only damages allowed must be in respect of the defendants' sales, calculated on the basis of the actual prices charged. That will reduce the damages from £8,625 to £1,654. The plaintiffs will have the costs of the inquiry before the referee, and the defendants will have the costs of the present application and cross-application.

FAIRCLOUGH v. ROBERTS. (a.)

Justices—Intoxicating liquors—Sale by retail—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3—Beerhouse Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85), s. 19—Excise Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 81), s. 2.

The plaintiff, not being a brewer, held a licence under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2, "to sell strong beer in casks of not less than four gallons and a half imperial gallon measure, or of not less than two dozen reputed quart bottles at one time, to be consumed elsewhere than on his premises." He was summoned under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 3, for having sold beer by retail without being licensed to do so, in that he had sold beer in two dozen imperial pint or half-pint bottles, instead of in the manner stated in the licence, and he was convicted and fined for the said offence.

Held, upon a case stated, that the conviction must be quashed, on the ground that, by section 74 of the Licensing Act, 1872, when read with section 19 of the Beerhouse Act, 1834, a sale of beer by retail is defined to be selling in less quantity than four gallons and a half, that the quantity sold was the criterion of the offence, and that here there had been no offence shown under the Licensing Acts, as the quantity sold was in excess of the measurement statutably imposed.

Case stated by the justices of Bangor in petty sessions under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

The case stated that the appellant, Fairclough, was "a person, not being a brewer, holding a licence to sell strong beer in casks of not less than four gallons and a half, imperial gallon measure, or of not less than two dozen reputed quart bottles at one time, to be drunk or consumed elsewhere than on his premises," under the provisions of 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2. The appellant had been summoned under the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3, for having sold beer by retail when not licensed so to sell it—namely, by selling it in two dozen imperial pint or half-pint bottles. The case further found that the quantity of beer so sold amounted to more than what would have been contained in two dozen reputed quart bottles. The appellant had twice applied for another licence to sell by retail, but his applications had been refused. The justices convicted the appellant for the offence, and imposed a fine of £5, and the appellant thereby forfeited his licence.

The question submitted to the court was whether the appellant was entitled to sell beer in other than reputed quart bottles of not less than two dozen without an additional licence? and, if not, whether he was rightly convicted of selling beer by retail without being licensed to do so under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872?

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Mansfield, for the appellant.—Imperial quart bottles are no longer customary in the trade. The only offence is a sale of less quantity at one time than that authorized by the licence. The offence charged is under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 3—namely, for "selling by retail intoxicating liquor without being duly licensed." "Sale by retail" is defined in section 74 of that Act as "the sale of that liquor in such quantities as is declared to be sale by retail by any Acts relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors"; and by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 19, "a sale of beer, cyder, or perry in any less quantity than four gallons and a half shall be deemed a selling by retail." Both Acts mention the quantity sold at one time as the criterion of a sale being wholesale or retail, and here the quantity is not less than that authorized by the licence held under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2. It was an excise offence, if any, and could be dealt with under the Inland Revenue Acts; but the excise authorities had acquiesced in wholesale sales of beer in pint or half-pint bottles provided the quantity sold at one time was equal to the amount mentioned in the licence.

Bryn Roberts, for the respondent, the inspector of police.—The Licensing Act, 1872, s. 74, refers back for its definition to other Acts relating to the same matter. This brings in 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 1, which expressly requires any person holding an excise licence under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, to take out an additional licence if desirous of selling beer "in any less quantity and in any other manner" than in casks or less than two dozen quart bottles as mentioned. The words disallowing a sale in any other manner must include sales in pint or half-pint bottles. No other manner of sale than that mentioned—viz., in casks or quart bottles of not less than two dozen—can be brought under the definition of the Licensing Act, 1872. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 19, is not an exclusive definition. The appellant had twice applied for a retail licence and been refused. Pint bottles can be more easily concealed for illicit sale than quart bottles.

POLLOCK, B.—This conviction cannot, it seems to me, be sustained. Much of the argument has been applied to the point as to what might be offences deducible from the series of Licensing Acts referred to. Our duty here is simply to inquire whether this conviction for an offence charged under section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872, was a proper one? The appellant was charged with the specific offence of selling beer by retail without being duly licensed. That offence is expressly prohibited by the section under which he was summoned. The question here is not what licence the appellant ought to have had, but whether or not he sold beer by retail? Sale by retail is defined by section 74 to be "selling in such quantities as is declared to be sale by retail by any Acts relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors." We turn to the Beerhouse Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 19), and find that sale by retail is expressly defined as "selling in any less quantity than four gallons and a half." This is a specific measurement for persons requiring beer in a small quantity. The quantity is the criterion between retail and wholesale sales. Here the quantity is admittedly over four and a half gallons. Undoubtedly such a sale must be made at one time, and, so far as may be, in one delivery. It is argued, however, that the sale is taken out of this section by being made in pint or half-pint bottles, and must come under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2, where quart bottles are expressly mentioned. But that Act and the other cited (26 & 27 Vict. c. 33) are Excise or Revenue Acts. The section under which the appellant is charged is out of a Licensing Act, and must be construed in reference to Licensing Acts. The excise officers are not prosecuting here. They have not taken any action in regard to sales in pint bottles. The reasonable construction of sections 3 and 74 of the Licensing Act, 1872, cannot be used to make an offence of that which, if it is an offence at all, is not one against the licensing laws.

This conviction must be quashed.

HAWKINS, J.—I quite agree. The case stated distinctly refers to a summons for an offence against the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 3. The interpretation clause (section 74) does not say that the sale by retail must be in such vessels and such quantities as have been declared in other Acts, but only in such quantities as have been so declared, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 19, expressly defines the quantity. Whether any other offence against the Revenue Acts than that charged has been committed we need not stop to inquire. We have only to deal with an offence against public order and morality under the Licensing Acts, and I fail to see what moral offence there may be in selling beer in pint instead of in quart bottles under those Acts.

VALENTINI v. CANALI. (a.)

Infant—Contract—Money paid under—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), s. 1.

An infant is not entitled to recover money paid under a contract void under section 1 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, in respect of goods which he has used or consumed.

Appeal from the Woolwich County Court.

In August, 1888, the plaintiff, who was an infant, entered into an agreement with the defendant, a keeper of a restaurant, to rent certain premises from him and to pay £102 for the furniture, trade fittings, and goodwill of the business. He paid £68 15s. on account, took possession, and paid rent up to the following September.

In January the defendant applied for rent due, and the plaintiff then claimed repayment of the £68 15s. on the grounds of (1) infancy at the time that he entered into the agreement, (2) fraud, in that he had been deceived and misled as to the business and had derived no benefit therefrom. The defendant distrained, and the plaintiff then abandoned the tenancy and commenced an action in the Chancery Division for rescission of the contract and recovery of the money paid under it. The action was ordered to be transferred to the county court. The judge found that there had been no fraud, but decided in favour of the plaintiff on the plea of infancy. He declared the contract void but refused to order the return of the sum already paid.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. R. Paget, for the plaintiff.—Under section 1 of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, which it has been held must be strictly construed (Coxhead v. Mullis, 27 W. R. 136, 3 C. P. D. 439), this agreement is not voidable but absolutely void. There has, therefore, been complete failure of consideration, and the plaintiff is entitled to a return of the money already paid: Corpe v. Overton, 10 Bing. 252.

Forman, for the defendant, was not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the learned county court judge, in ordering the agreement to be cancelled, but declining to order a restoration of the money paid under it, has given the plaintiff the measure of justice to which he is entitled. The Infant Relief Act, 1874, though no doubt strong in its general terms, must be construed reasonably, and so as, if possible, to avoid gross injustice. Cases have been relied on in the course of the argument which, it is admitted, involve absurdity and injustice on the supposition of the plaintiff's contention being correct. I think that the old rule of law applies to this case—namely, that when an infant has had something for which he has paid and cannot give back, nor put the seller in the same position as he was before, as he cannot replace the consideration, he cannot recover the money. The infant has had the house and the use of the furniture and fittings for some months, and has paid certain sums of money for the use of them, and the judge declined to order the repayment of the money thus paid, as the plaintiff could not replace the defendant in the same position, and he had had a benefit which he could not give back. That is in accordance with the old rule of law on the point, which has not been altered by the Act of 1874. It was supposed to have been somewhat frittered away by judicial decisions, and it was the object of the Legislature, by the Act of 1874, to restore it, but to restore it subject to the old qualification. The defendant, therefore, cannot be called upon to repay the money paid to him by the plaintiff, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J., concurred.

bottles he affixed a label bearing his own name of B., and sent with the bottles an invoice which left no doubt that B. was the sender.

Held, that he was guilty of using a false trade description under sections 2 and 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

Case stated by metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellant, T. Wood, a mineral water manufacturer, was possessed, for the purposes of his trade, of glass bottles, on some of which were moulded his name and address, "T. Wood, 430, Hackney-road," and on others of which were moulded the words, "This bottle is the property of Thomas Wood, 430, Hackney-road." A considerable number of both kinds of bottles came into the possession of the respondent, T. Burgess, who was also a manufacturer of mineral waters. The respondent was in the habit of filling these bottles with mineral water of his own manufacture, but upon them he caused a paper label to be placed in the following form :—

LEMON,
215, Brick Lane,
Bethnal Green Road,

and with the bottles he used to send an invoice in the following terms :—"Received from T. Burgess, mineral water manufacturer." He had no authority from the appellant to use bottles bearing the name of T. Wood.

The respondent was summoned under sections 2 and 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, for "having in his possession for sale goods to which a false trade description—namely, the false name of T. Wood—was applied."

The magistrate found as a fact that the name "T. Wood" was a false trade description within the meaning of section 3, sub-section (3), of the Act, and that it was applied to goods which had not been manufactured by the appellant, whose name was used, and that the name was used without authority; but he also found that the respondent had no intention to defraud his customers by representing the mineral waters to be those of the appellant, and, being of opinion that in the absence of any intention to defraud the purchaser the respondent had "acted innocently" within the meaning of section 2, sub-section (2), he dismissed the summons.

The questions for the opinion of the court were :—

1. Whether selling mineral waters in bottles bearing the name of another manufacturer, but without any intent to defraud the purchasers, was an offence against the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

2. Whether an intent to defraud was a necessary ingredient in the offence under section 2, sub-section (2).

3. Whether the words "acting innocently" in sub-section (2) had any different meaning from the words, "without intent to defraud" in sub-section (1).

Horace Avory, for the appellant.—The words "or otherwise acting innocently" in section 2, sub-section (2), must be read with the words in the preceding paragraphs, which treat of the case of a retail dealer who has innocently purchased goods with a false trade description applied to them without any reason for suspecting the falseness of the description. The word "otherwise" must refer to similar kinds of innocent action—as, for example, a man's acting under a mistaken impression that he had the authority of another to use his name. That could not have been the case here, because the name was stamped upon the bottles, and the person who used them must have known that he had obtained no authority for it. The words "or otherwise acting innocently" may mean the same thing as acting "without intent to defraud." But the latter words do not mean without intent to defraud the purchaser. The object of the Act is to protect the owner of the trade-mark and not the purchaser. Even if it were part of the object of the Act to protect purchasers, the precautions adopted by the respondent would not necessarily prevent subpurchasers from being deceived, because the labels might become detached, and they would not receive the respondent's invoices.

The respondent was not represented by counsel.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the magistrate was wrong in the view which he took of this case, and that an intent to defraud the purchaser is not a necessary ingredient of the offence charged.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Case remitted.

Q. B. Div. (Mathew and Wills, JJ.) Oct. 1.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE LONDON, TILBURY, AND SOUTHEND RAILWAY CO. AND THE TRUSTEES OF GOWER'S WALK SCHOOLS. (a.)

Railway company—Land injuriously affected—Ancient lights—Right to full compensation for damage—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 6, 16.

The claimants were owners of a building which had acquired the easement of light and air for its windows, and, having pulled it down, they built up another building with some windows which did not coincide with the old ones. A railway company, in the exercise of parliamentary powers, obstructed the access of light of the new building before the windows in the new position had acquired an easement.

Held, that the claimants were entitled to compensation for the whole damage done to the building, and were not confined to the loss of the old easement.

Case stated by an arbitrator in a claim made under the Lands Clauses Act.

The claimants were trustees of certain schools situate in a street called Gower's-walk, and known as Gower's-walk Schools. In 1884 they purchased certain old buildings in Lambeth-street, Whitechapel, in which all the windows were ancient lights. These buildings they pulled down and on the same site they erected new schools. The windows in the new schools did not altogether coincide with the windows in the old buildings, and where they did coincide in position they differed in size.

In 1886 the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co., in the exercise of powers conferred upon them by their special Act (which incorporated the Railways Clauses and Lands Clauses Acts), erected on the opposite side of the street a warehouse, which obstructed to some extent the windows of the new schools.

The trustees of the schools claimed compensation in respect of all the windows which were obstructed, including those which did not coincide with any of the ancient lights. The company, on the other hand, contended that they were bound to pay compensation for that damage only which was done to the windows which did coincide with the old ones.

The arbitrator assessed the compensation at £1,450 if the claimants were entitled to have it assessed on the former basis, and at £725 if they were only entitled to have it assessed on the latter basis.

The question for the opinion of the court was which basis of assessment was correct.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bosanquet, Q.C. (Houghton with him), for the claimants.—It has been decided in Newson v. Pender, 33 W. R. 243, 27 Ch. D. 43, and Scott v. Pape, 34 W. R. 465, 31 Ch. D. 554, that the claimants have a legal right to the access of light only to those windows or portions of windows which coincide with the old ones, and it must be admitted that if this were an action for damages the measure of damages would be limited to the injuries inflicted on the ancient lights. But the case is altogether different in a claim for compensation under the Lands Clauses Act. The railway company have inflicted the injury now complained of in the exercise of their statutory powers; for otherwise they might have been prevented by an injunction from completing the warehouse which has obstructed the light. These statutory powers are contained in section 16 of the Railway Clauses Act, which provides that the company is to make full satisfaction for all damage sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers. No distinction is made between legal or other damage, and no distinction is to be drawn between a case in which a claim is made for compensation on the ground of land having been taken and a claim made on the ground of disturbance of an easement. No distinction is made between lands and other interests affected either in section 6 or section 16. The words are "all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties by reason of the exercise of such powers." In the case of land taken the claimant is entitled to be placed in exactly the same position pecuniarily as if the railway company had not exercised its powers: Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. Cas. 418, and Cowper Essex v. Local Board for Acton, ante, p. 209, 14 App. Cas. 153.

R. S. Wright (C. Haigh with him), for the company.—This principle has never yet been applied to any case in which land has not been taken, and ought not to be extended to a case in which land is injuriously affected. In Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works Lord Chelmsford argues that the deprivation of an easement must in that case amount to a taking of land, because in the Thames Embankment Act, with which the court was dealing, "lands" were defined to include "easements."

MATHEW, J.—In my opinion the claimants in this case are entitled to the sum of £1,450. The position of things appears to be this. The building now occupied by the school, which is a new building, contains some windows coinciding in position with the windows of the old building, it also contains a number of additional windows which do not so coincide, and in respect of which it is clear that the owners of the school had no legal right to the access of light. The railway company, in the exercise of its powers, erected a warehouse which had the effect of darkening the windows of the school. The result of that was that the easement undoubtedly possessed by those of the windows of the school which took the precise place of the old windows was destroyed or materially injured, and the question for us is whether the destruction of that easement lets in the entire claim for damage to the schools in consequence of the exercise by the company of the powers conferred on them by the Act of Parliament. It appears to me that, having regard to the language of the Act, that claim is let in. It is only necessary to refer to section 16 of the Railways Clauses Act, under the authority of which this warehouse was erected, to make it clear that the Legislature so intended, because the language of the section is this, "That in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner herein, and in the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested, for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers." What, then, is the damage which the school trustees have sustained here? Obviously a depreciation of their property which might never have taken place if the company had not exercised its powers; and their property has, according to the finding of the arbitrators, been thus depreciated to the extent of £1,450.

There are numerous authorities upon the construction of this section, and also of section 6 of the same Act, and section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, all of which sections are in pari materiâ, and in all the cases, if I understand them correctly, from Reg. v. Chester Clerk of Peace (Stockport case), 12 W. R. 762, down to the last case in the House of Lords, the case of Cowper Essex v. Local Board of Acton, the principle is recognized that when once a legal right of a claimant has been interfered with by the exercise of the powers conferred on the company, whether the right so interfered with was a right to the possession of land or a right to an easement, all the damage done to him as the consequence of that interference is the subject of compensation.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems that the structure erected by the railway company has obstructed the access of light to a number of new windows which are entitled to no legal protection, but it has also obstructed a certain number of other windows which are admittedly entitled to protection as ancient lights, and the question which the arbitrator submits to us is this—Under such circumstances as these, are the claimants confined to the legal damage which they would have been entitled to claim against the company in an action had the company not been acting under statutory powers, or are they entitled to all the damage which they have actually sustained by reason of the construction of this warehouse? To my mind the question so stated answers itself. Section 6 of the Railways Clauses Act provides, with respect to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith, that, "in exercising the power given to the company by the special Act . . . the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in, any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation . . . for all damage sustained . . . by reason of the exercise of the powers . . . vested in the company."

The authorities, which run in a clear and even channel, establish beyond dispute that the word "damage" there means the real loss which the claimant has sustained by reason of the construction of some work which could not have been constructed without the statutory authority, and is not limited to the damage which would be recoverable against a person constructing a similar work without statutory powers.

To put it in another way, the party injured by the construction of the works would, but for the statutory powers, be entitled to an injunction, which would prevent the works from being constructed altogether. Then the intention of the Act, as I understand it, is that the injured party shall, so far as money can do it, be put in the same position as if he had had that injunction, and as if things had been preserved in statu quo.

Order accordingly.

To an indictment for unlawfully wounding, unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm, assault occasioning actual bodily harm, and common assault, the prisoner pleaded as a plea in bar a conviction before a court of summary jurisdiction upon the same facts; but that court had inflicted no punishment beyond requiring the defendant to give security to be of good behaviour.

Held, that such conviction was a good plea in bar.

At a session of the Central Criminal Court held before the Recorder of London, George James Miles was arraigned on an indictment which charged him, in the first count, with unlawfully and maliciously wounding Charles Living; second count, unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm on the said Charles Living; third count, assaulting the said Charles Living, and thereby occasioning him actual bodily harm; fourth count, a common assault on the said Charles Living; fifth count, a common assault on Harry Anstey.

The prisoner handed in a special plea in the nature of autrefois convict as a plea in bar of his prosecution so far as the first four counts of the indictment were concerned, and pleaded Not Guilty as to those counts and the fifth count, and a special reply was put in by the prosecution.

The evidence offered by the defendant in support of his plea consisted of an examined copy of a record of a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at West Ham. It was further proved that the offences charged in the first four counts of the indictment related to the same matter as the offence mentioned in the said record. The counsel for the prosecution did not dispute that the first four counts of the indictment referred to the same matter as the offence mentioned in the said record, but argued that the said record did not disclose any conviction within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45, on the ground that the court had neither ordered the defendant to pay a fine nor to be imprisoned, and in support of that contention the case of Hartley v. Hindmarsh, 14 W. R. 862, L. R. 1 C. P. 553, was referred to. The counsel for the defence argued that by the 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 16, sub-section 2, express power was given to the magistrate, upon convicting a person of assault, to discharge him conditionally on his giving security to be of good behaviour, and that the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45, must now be read with the section of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49 above referred to, and that, consequently, the case quoted by the counsel for the prosecution was no longer in point.

The defendant was ultimately convicted on the first four counts of the indictment, and acquitted on the fifth count, and the question of the sufficiency of the plea in bar was reserved for the opinion of this court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—HAWKINS, J.—In this case the plea alleges, and the jury must be taken to have found, that the assault and battery of which the defendant was previously convicted and the wounding, assault, and battery in the first four counts mentioned, are the same. No certificate of dismissal was given, nor is any punishment fixed or determined in the conviction, and no fine or imprisonment had been inflicted or suffered. The Summary Jurisdiction Act, however, provides that the court, upon convicting the party, may discharge him on giving security, &c. In cases of assault where the complaint is dismissed, it seems to me that a certificate of dismissal is still necessary to entitle a defendant to the benefit of the provisions contained in section 45 of 24 & 25 Vict. But in cases where the justices, though they have convicted, think the offence deserving only of a nominal punishment, or of no punishment at all, and, acting under the power contained in the 2nd sub-section, determine to discharge the defendant without any punishment on his giving merely security to be of good behaviour, and such security is given, I am, without expressing any settled opinion upon the point, strongly inclined to think that nothing more is necessary to entitle him to the privileges conferred by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45. For I think the giving of security for good behaviour under such circumstances is intended as a substitute for punishment, and that the effect of such substitution, coupled with the performance of the condition—i.e., the giving the security for good behaviour—would place the defendant precisely in the same position as if punishment had actually been inflicted and suffered. It certainly never could have been intended by the Legislature that a person whose offence at the most deserved nothing beyond a nominal punishment, which had been foregone on his recognizances for good behaviour, should be in a worse position than a person whose offence had been visited by a substantial punishment which he had suffered. There may be, and I think are, objections to the form of the plea as framed, but, thinking as I do, that the common law defence I am about to refer to is such as entitles the defendant to have the conviction in question quashed, it is not necessary to discuss them upon the present occasion. I would, however, observe that, inasmuch as these common law defences to the indictment would afford no defence to civil proceedings, it would be expedient in future, if justices desire to give to a defendant the protection afforded by the 44th and 45th section of the 24 & 25 Vict., that they should found their proceeding and judgment upon the provisions of that Act rather than upon the later Summary Jurisdiction Act, the provisions of which are not very clear, and when they were framed, the previous enactments of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 were evidently not clearly remembered by the draftsman. The justices will do well also to bear in mind that they may also award damages under the later statute if they think right to do so.

With regard to the common law defence relied on as an answer to this indictment, it is not strictly a plea of autrefois convict (except as to the fourth count, which charged a mere common assault), because the defendant had never previously been actually convicted of either of the offences in the form in which they are charged in the first three counts; but it was a defence grounded, as Blackburn, J., said in Wemyss v. Hopkins, 23 W. R. 691, L. R. 10 Q. B. 381, "on the well-established rule at common law that whenever a person has been convicted and punished for an offence by a court of competent jurisdiction, transit in rem judicatum—that is, the conviction shall be a bar to all further proceedings for the same offence, and he shall not be punished again for the same matter; otherwise there might be two different punishments for the same offence." This rule of law so stated has never been doubted or qualified in any one of the numerous authorities which are to be found in the books upon the subject, though it has not always been found easy to apply the rule to the facts of particular cases under discussion. In the case cited (Wemyss v. Hopkins), where the appellant had been summarily convicted by justices under the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 78, for an offence which, though charged as a mere offence against the Highway Act, amounted also to an assault in law, it was held that he could not afterwards be convicted upon the same facts of an assault under section 42 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. That was a case too clear to admit of a reasonable doubt, and is a good illustration of the general rules of law. The difficulties which have arisen in the application of the rule have most frequently occurred in cases where a conviction or acquittal for a simple offence has been set up as a bar to a subsequent charge against the same person in a more aggravated form, and the law, as deducible from the numerous cases to be found on the subject, seems to be this—that where a criminal charge has been adjudicated upon by a court having jurisdiction to hear and determine it, that adjudication, whether it takes the form of an acquittal or conviction, is final as to the matter so adjudicated upon, and may be pleaded in bar to any subsequent prosecution for the same offence, whether with or without circumstances of aggravation, and whether such circumstances of aggravation consist of the offence having been committed with malicious or wicked intent, or by reason that the committal of the offence was followed by serious consequences. In this respect the criminal law is in unison with that which prevails in civil proceedings. Who ever heard of a new action prevailing after a verdict and judgment for damages for the same cause of action, simply on the ground that the damages were insufficient, or that the conduct of the defendant was, since the verdict and judgment, discovered to be more malicious than it was deemed to be at the trial? Judgment recovered in a former action was always a good plea in bar.

In Reg. v. John Walker, 2 Moo. & R. 446, it was held by Coltman, J., that a conviction, for an assault by wounding, before justices was a bar to an indictment for the same assault and wounding with felonious intent to maim, disable, and do grievous bodily harm. In Reg. v. Stanton, 5 Cox C. C. 324, the prisoner was indicted for wounding with intent to murder. He had previously been convicted and punished summarily for a common assault, founded upon the same facts. The jury found the prisoner guilty of a common assault. In answer to a question of Erle, J., why the previous conviction had not been pleaded, it was said there was a difficulty in pleading a conviction for an assault to a charge of felony, whereupon that learned judge said that, in his opinion, the conviction would, if pleaded, have been an estoppel to the judgment for the felonious assault, and, though not pleaded, he treated the charge as having been adjudicated upon. Ten years later the same point was decided in Reg. v. Elrington, 10 W. R. 13, 1 B. & S. 688, where to an indictment for assault and maliciously wounding and causing grevious bodily harm, &c., a plea that on the hearing of the charge for the same assault treated as a common assault before justices, they had dismissed the complaint, was held to be a bar. The true ground upon which these decisions were based seems to me to be that the summary conviction or dismissal of the charges in each case operated as an absolute bar to any future proceedings for or in respect of the same assault; and as the aggravating circumstances, unless coupled with the assault, amounted to no crime, there was nothing to support the indictment. No doubt it seems a little startling that a conviction for a common assault, accompanied by a shilling fine or a dismissal of the complaint as too trifling for any punishment, should afford an answer to a subsequent indictment for that same assault, upon conclusive evidence that it was accompanied by an intent to murder; but reason and good sense point out that, even at the risk of occasional miscarriages of justice, when once a criminal charge has been adjudicated upon by a court having jurisdiction, that adjudication ought to be final, and, after all, such miscarriages are very rare. No system of judicature can be suggested in which occasionally failure to insure complete justice may not arise. After the most solemn and careful trial of an indictment for murder, resulting in the acquittal of the person charged, it may happen that within a week the most cogent and conclusive proof of his guilt may come to light, or he may actually confess his crime. Yet his first acquittal is final. So with justices of the peace. After a summary conviction or dismissal of a charge upon which they have lawfully adjudicated, evidence may be discovered which would probably have induced them to come to an opposite conclusion. Yet, as in the case of an acquittal or conviction upon an indictment, their acquittal or conviction upon complaint within their jurisdiction is equally final, and their decisions upon matters within their jurisdiction cannot, as I have already shown, be altered by presenting the same charge in the shape of an indictment before a jury in an aggravated form. But it is not every summary conviction or acquittal for a common assault which will operate as a bar to an indictment for an offence in which that assault was an element.

It could hardly be contended that a previous conviction for a common assault could be pleaded in bar to an indictment for murder, though to prove the murder it might be essential to prove the assault adjudicated upon. For the offence of murder consists in the felonious killing. So also of manslaughter. See Reg. v. Morris, 15 W. R. 999, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 90. So, again, a conviction for a common assault could not be pleaded in bar to an indictment for rape, though possibly it might be for an assault with intent to commit rape; for the essence of the crime of rape is a felonious assault by penetration of the person of the prosecutrix, which justices have no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon, and, although it is quite true that, on a charge of common assault, evidence may be given of circumstances which, if true, would constitute a rape, and true also that the justices must form in their own minds an opinion as to the credibility of that evidence, with a view to determining whether their jurisdiction to deal with the matter has been ousted or not, and true also that if they disbelieve that evidence they may nevertheless believe that an assault, though not one of the particular character constituting a rape, has been committed, and convict the person charged accordingly, as was done in Wilkinson v. Dutton, 32 L. J. M. C. 152, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 7. Their conviction, nevertheless, would be no bar to an indictment for rape, for though incidentally they might be obliged to consider the evidence in order to determine whether they had jurisdiction over the charge before them, they would have no jurisdiction whatever to adjudicate upon the offence of rape, and their disbelief of the evidence would have no greater effect upon the charge of rape than if they had simply refused to commit for trial upon it, in which case nobody would question that an indictment might be presented by anybody who was dissatisfied with the justices' refusal. This subject was a good deal discussed in the Court of Exchequer in In re Thompson, 9 W. R. 203.

It might be suggested that it may so happen that justices take a grievously erroneous view of the facts presented to them, and that, by convicting of a common assault when the facts point to a serious felony, justice may be defeated and a great criminal may escape the punishment due to his crime. True it is that it may so happen; so it may that a judge or jury may take an erroneous view of facts presented to them. For this there is no remedy. Such misfortunes are mere accidents, and of very rare occurrence, and are very unlikely to happen by reason of any default of the justices if they will pursue, as I am sure they ever endeavour, the simple course of steadily bearing in mind the charge before them. If that charge be one of felony, or misdemeanour punishable by indictment only, they have no jurisdiction to adjudicate; they can but commit for trial or refuse so to do. In matters before them upon which they are called upon to adjudicate they must do so, unless they have upon the facts an alternative to send for trial upon indictment. In assault cases especial provision is made to this effect by section 46 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. In the case before us the doubts I once entertained are removed—the one and same assault of which the defendant was convicted is the sole foundation upon which the conviction at the Central Criminal Court is rested, although aggravations are added to it which at first sight make the offences appear different—more particularly the count for wounding; but I find it alleged and found as a fact that that wounding formed part of the assault and battery of which the defendant was convicted, as well it might, without amounting to an unlawful and malicious wounding, which is purely an indictable offence under section 20 of 24 & 25 Vict. This is recognized law (see Reg. v. Taylor, 17 W. R. 623, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 194). For the reasons I have given I am now satisfied that the conviction before us ought to be quashed.

The following judgment of POLLOCK, B., was read by HAWKINS, J.—This conviction ought, in my opinion, to be quashed. If the question depended solely upon whether the previous conviction pleaded by the prisoner was a good bar to the present indictment, as coming within the provisions of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45, I should pause before I came to such a conclusion, as the language of this section is certainly not in accord with that of section 16 of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49. My decision is based on the broader ground that the conviction pleaded and the evidence given in support of it formed a good bar at common law to the present indictment. At the trial it was proved on behalf of the prisoner and admitted by counsel for the prosecution that the first four counts of the indictment referred to the same matter as the offence mentioned in the record. In substance, therefore, the plea and the evidence establish that there was but one offence, and that the acts done by the defendant in respect of which he was convicted, by whatever legal name they might be called, were the same as those to which the indictment referred, and, therefore, the rule of law *Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto applies, and, if the prisoner were guilty of the modified crime only, he could not be guilty of the same acts with the addition of malice and design.

In Reg. v. Walker it was held that a plea of autrefois convict of an assault before magistrates is a bar to an indictment for feloniously stabbing in the same transaction. Reg. v. Stanton is to the same effect. These are decisions by single judges, but they were cited and approved of by the Court of Queen's Bench in The Queen v. Elrington, where Cockburn, C.J., says:—"We must bear in mind the well-established principle of our criminal law that a series of charges shall not be preferred, and whether a party accused of a minor offence is acquitted or convicted he shall not be charged again on the same facts in a more aggravated form." This is not only the law, but it is consonant with sound sense and the just treatment of defendants. One case only was cited by the prosecution which might at first sight seem to be contrary to this view—Hartley v. Hindmarsh, but, upon looking at the decision in that case, it will be found that the conviction was not pleaded as a bar at common law, but under the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45; and the judgment of the court proceeded upon the grounds that there was no record of any conviction, and, further, that the magistrate did not adjudicate upon the case, but, as a conservator of the peace, ordered the defendant to enter into recognizances.

* See Broom's Legal Maxims, 6th ed., p. 330.

The following judgment of CHARLES, J. (with which Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and GRANTHAM, J., concurred), was read by Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The facts upon which the plea in this case was based were proved at the trial, indeed it was not disputed that the offences charged in the first four counts related to the same matter as the offence mentioned in the record, but counsel for the prosecution argued that the record did not disclose any conviction within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45, the court having neither ordered the defendant to pay a fine nor to be imprisoned. The counsel for the defendant argued that by 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 16, sub-section 2, express power was given to the magistrate upon convicting a person of assault to discharge him conditionally on his giving security to be of good behaviour, and that 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45, must be read with the section above referred to. The defendant was convicted on the first four counts of the indictment, and the recorder reserved the question for the opinion of the court—Whether the proceedings before the court of summary jurisdiction against the defendant in respect of the assault on Charles Living were a bar to the proceedings against him at the Central Criminal Court for the same offence? The answer to this question does not, in my opinion, in any way depend on the construction of the 45th section of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, and the 16th section of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 16. I think the proceedings were a bar apart from any statutory provisions, and that the conviction should be quashed in accordance with the well-established rule at common law—that where a person has been convicted for an offence by a court of competent jurisdiction, the conviction is a bar to all further criminal proceedings for the same offence. This rule has been acted on again and again, and I can see no reason why it should not be acted on in this case. It cannot be material that a magistrate has power by statute to deal with a convicted person otherwise than by fine or imprisonment, for it is the conviction and not the nature of the sentence which constitutes the bar. The principle is that no man shall be placed in peril of legal penalties more than once on the same accusation. This being the view which I take of the case, it is unnecessary to decide whether the defendant is entitled to the protection provided by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 45. I may add that upon the question reserved no point arises on the form of the special plea, which, however, I think may be regarded as an informal plea of autrefois convict.

REG. v. CROSS. (a.)

Criminal law — Procuring abortion — Conviction of patient for conspiracy — Absence of evidence of pregnancy.

A woman was jointly indicted with others for conspiring to procure her miscarriage by unlawful means. There was no evidence of her being with child so as to render the acts criminal if done by herself alone.

Held, that she might nevertheless rightly be convicted of conspiracy to commit a felony.

At the assizes held for the county of Northampton Thomas William Whitehurch, John Howe, and Elizabeth Cross were indicted for that they "believing that the said

(a.) Reported by R. E. MELSHEIMER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Elizabeth Cross was then pregnant and that in due course of nature she would be delivered of a child begotten by the said John Howe, and wickedly intending and contriving to conceal such pregnancy, and to prevent such her delivery in due course of nature, on the 1st day of June, A.D. 1889, did amongst themselve unlawfully, knowingly, and wickedly conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together feloniously and unlawfully to procure the miscarriage of the said Elizabeth Cross by unlawfully administering to and causing to be taken by her certain noxious things, and by unlawfully using certain instruments and other means with intent to procure the miscarriage of the said Elizabeth Cross."

The indictment further set out a number of acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy.

At the trial, before Wills, J., the evidence established that the prisoners all believed that Elizabeth Cross was pregnant, and that, for the purpose of procuring abortion, Whitchurch and Howe, with her consent and by her procurement, both administered to her noxious drugs, and used or caused to be used upon her, instruments; but there was no evidence that she was in fact pregnant, and it is therefore assumed in her favour that she was not so.

On behalf of Cross it was objected that for a woman, not being pregnant, to do or cause to be done acts upon herself for the purpose of procuring abortion was no offence either at common law or by statute, and, therefore, she could not be convicted of conspiracy with other persons that they should do upon her and she should suffer the same acts.

The learned judge was of opinion that, whether or not it was no offence for a woman not pregnant to do acts to herself intending thereby to procure an abortion, which was actually impossible, it would none the less be criminal in her to conspire to commit a felony (which the administration of drugs and the use of instruments would have been in her as well as in the men if she had been pregnant: see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 58), because the commission of the felony was rendered impossible by circumstances unknown to her.

He was further of opinion that for the woman to conspire with the men to have certain things done to her, the doing of which constituted a felony on the part of the men, was criminal, although the object to be attained, if effected by herself alone, and without the help of the men, might not have been criminal, and accordingly he directed the jury, if they believed the evidence, to convict the prisoners.

The jury convicted all the prisoners.

The question for this court was whether the conviction against the woman could be sustained.

Hammond Chambers, for the prisoner.—It is submitted that a charge of conspiracy cannot be maintained against a person who would not, in the event of the scheme succeeding, be guilty of any offence whatever. In the present case the prisoner (not being pregnant) in attempting to procure abortion, in herself committed no offence either at common law or by statute. The consequences of upholding this conviction would be far reaching—if, for instance, under the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885 a man were charged with the defilement of a girl under the age of sixteen, it would logically follow that the girl might be indicted for a conspiracy to commit the offence. It is an essential element in a criminal conspiracy that the object of the combination is injury to some third person: Reg. v. Warburton, 19 W. R. 165, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 274.

Etherington Smith, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—The offence charged in this case is not an attempt, but a conspiracy, to commit a crime. These offences are totally different in their nature, and the gist of the offence of conspiracy is the act of combining with the convicted persons to commit the felony. It is difficult to feel any doubt that they are all equally liable on this indictment, although the person on whom the offence was committed would not if alone have been guilty of any offence.

But the court being of opinion that the said offence was of so trifling a nature that it is inexpedient to inflict any other than a nominal punishment, and the defendant, having given security to the satisfaction of this court to be of good behaviour, is discharged.'*"

Whitby v. Mitchell. (a.)

Perpetuity—Remoteness—Legal limitations—Limitation to unborn person for life, with remainder to her children born within the limits of the rule against perpetuities—Rule against a "possibility on a possibility."

That an estate cannot be limited by way of remainder (after a life estate to an unborn person) to children or issue of such unborn person, is an absolute and still existing rule of law (applicable to legal limitations), and exists independently of the rule against perpetuities, and such a remainder or gift over is not rendered valid by the insertion of words having the effect of restricting it to children or issue born before the expiration of the period allowed by the rule (known as the rule against perpetuities), which prevents property being tied up for a longer period than a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards.

By a marriage settlement lands were limited to the use of the husband and wife successively for life, with remainder to the use of any one or more of their children, grandchildren, or more remote issue (born before any appointment made), as the husband and wife should by deed appoint.

The husband and wife, in exercise of their power, appointed part of the lands, by deed, to the use of a married daughter for life for her separate use, and after her decease to the use of her children living at the date of that deed, as tenants in common in fee.

Held, that the limitation, to the children of the married daughter, contained in the deed of appointment, when read, as it must be, as part of the original settlement, was void, as offending against the first above-mentioned rule, notwithstanding the fact of the limitation being restricted to children living at the date of the deed of appointment.

Judgment of Kay, J. (ante, p. 5, 42 Ch. D. 494), affirmed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

The case is reported below, ante, p. 5, and 42 Ch. D. 494.

By marriage articles dated the 4th of November, 1821, and made in contemplation of a marriage between Charles Dennis and Mary Elizabeth Maddy, which was shortly afterwards solemnized, it was agreed that certain lands belonging to Charles Dennis in fee simple should be settled.

By a settlement made in pursuance of the marriage articles (but more than eighteen years afterwards), and dated the 7th of May, 1840, the lands were settled to the use of Charles Dennis for life, with a limitation to trustees to support contingent remainders, with remainder to Mary Elizabeth Dennis for life, with a like limitation to trustees to support contingent remainders, with remainder "to the use of a child, grandchild, or more remote issue, or all and every, or any one or more, of the children, grandchildren, or more remote issue of the said Charles Dennis by the said Mary Elizabeth his wife, such child, grandchildren, or more remote issue being born before any such appointment as hereinafter is mentioned shall be made to him, her, or them respectively, for such estate or estates, interest or interests, and in such parts, shares, and proportions (if more than one), and with such limitations over, such limitations over being for the benefit of some or one of the objects of this present power, and in such manner and form, as the said Charles Dennis and Mary Elizabeth his wife" should by deed appoint, and in default of appointment, to the use of the child or children of Charles and Mary Elizabeth Dennis equally as tenants in common in fee, with a limitation over in case any of such children should die under twenty-one without leaving issue.

The settlement contained a power of sale.

Mr. and Mrs. Dennis had two children only, of whom Mrs. Burlton was one.

By an indenture of the 15th of March, 1865, Mr. and Mrs. Dennis appointed one moiety of the lands comprised in the settlement, or the proceeds of sale thereof, after their own life interests, to the use of Mrs. Burlton for life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, with remainder to the use of such person or persons as she should by will or codicil appoint, and, in default of appointment, to the use of her children living at the date of that indenture as tenants in common in fee, with a gift over in the event of all of such children dying under twenty-one without leaving issue.

The power of sale given by the settlement having been exercised, a sum of £4,700, part of the proceeds, came into the hands of the plaintiff and the defendant, J. Turner, as trustees in respect of the moiety appointed by the indenture of March, 1865, and in December, 1877, they lent that sum to the defendant, G. W. Mitchell, upon the security of a bond and equitable mortgage. Turner having absconded, this action was brought against him and Mitchell for an account of what was due upon the loan, and for foreclosure or sale. Mitchell alleged in his defence that he had repaid to Turner £2,700 out of the £4,700, and by a counter-claim against the plaintiff, Turner, Mrs. Burlton and three of her children who were in existence at the date of the deed of March, 1865, he alleged that the sum had been so repaid at the request of Mrs. Burlton, and had been applied by Turner at the like request for the maintenance, education, and advancement of those three children, and he contended that Mrs. Burlton was absolutely entitled to the £4,700, on the ground that the appointment of March, 1865, to the children of Mrs. Burlton living at the date of such appointment was void.

The question of its validity was argued before Kay, J., who held that the rule that an estate cannot be limited to an unborn person for life followed by an estate to a child of such unborn person, is a rule existing independently of the rule against perpetuities; that the settlement must be treated, for the purpose of deciding the present question, as made before the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Dennis; and that consequently the appointment of March, 1865, which must be read as part of the settlement, was invalid so far as it purported to give the property (in default of Mrs. Burlton appointing it by will, the power to do which, was admittedly bad) to her children then living, and also so far as it purported to restrain her from anticipation.

From that decision the said three children of Mrs. Burlton appealed.

Marten, Q.C., and W. Baker, for the appellants.—The appointment in favour of these children is effectual, and is not affected by the interposition of a void power of appointment. The learned judge decided the case on the authority of the dicta of Mr. Joshua Williams, but there is no sufficient authority to show that the rule in question, if it is a rule at all, has any existence independently of the rule against perpetuities. The rule against a "possibility upon a possibility" is obsolete except so far as it is merely a branch of the rule against perpetuities. Secondly, even assuming there is such a rule against a general limitation of that nature, in the present case the limitation is not general, but is restricted to children born at the date of the appointment. Mr. Joshua Williams is the first and only authority who without qualification asserts the existence of the rule: Williams' Real Property, 15th ed., pp. 321—3 and 647; 16th ed., pp. 314, 315, 624. Other authorities deny its existence: Lewis on Perpetuities (1843), pp. 419, 420, and Supplement (1849), pp. 97, 112, 136, et seq.; Cases and Opinions (Mr. Booth's and Mr. Yorke's opinions on the will of Charles Baker), pp. 432, 434, et seq. The rule is not there stated as an absolute one, and, secondly, it is stated as a rule against a general limitation to unborn sons of unborn sons. It does not say a gift is invalid when made to issue to be born within the proper period, merely on the ground that they are the issue of an unborn person who takes an estate for life. In the case of Hay v. The Earl of Coventry, 3 T. R. 83, decided by Lord Kenyon, there was nothing to limit the time of birth. Such a limitation as that in the present case is good if it does not violate the rule against perpetuities: Brudenell v. Elwes, 1 East, 442; Cattlin v. Brown, 11 Ha. 372, at p. 375; Mogg v. Mogg, 1 Mer. 654, at p. 664 (where Mr. Preston said that a remainder to issue (as purchasers) of an unborn child, following a gift to the unborn child for life, is not good unless it is to take effect within a limited time); Routledge v. Dorril, 2 Ves. 356, 366; Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 393, and p. 397, paragraph 8; Cole v. Sewell, 4 Dr. & War. 1, at p. 32; 1 Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., pp. 279, 281; 2 Jarman (Appendix), p. 845; Tudor's Leading Cases on Real Property, 3rd ed., notes on Cadell v. Palmer, p. 473, et seq.; Davidson's Conveyancing, 3rd ed., vol. 3, part 1, pp. 336—338. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Jarman, 3rd ed., p. 262, note y, where something is said as to an observation made by Lord St. Leonards on Cadell v. Palmer in the last sentence on p. 324 of Sugden's Law of Property.] Our third point is that, although for most purposes the appointment must be read into the original settlement, yet it takes effect as a springing use, and Mr. Joshua Williams himself states the law as to springing uses as entirely independent of this artificial rule—they take effect by virtue of the Statute of Uses. This old rule is, moreover, a restrictive rule merely—not one in reliance on which titles have been accepted—it is simply a matter of the opinion of conveyancers, so that no harm could be done by a formal recognition of its disappearance. Nothing was settled before Cadell v. Palmer. In every case decided against these limitations, they were bad under the rule against perpetuities.

They also referred to In re Frost, Frost v. Frost, antè p. 264.

Farwell, for Mrs. Burlton.—The rule relied on by the learned judge is perfectly well settled. The modern rule against perpetuities was invented by way of analogy to the common law rule against a possibility upon a possibility: Porter v. Bradley, 3 T. R. 143; In re Ridley, Buckton v. Hay, 27 W. R. 527, 11 Ch. D. 645, at p. 649. The old rule has not disappeared: Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., p. 393. In Cole v. Sewell it was pointed out that the rule against perpetuities had no application to limitations by way of legal remainder. Therefore the old rule must apply to such cases. In Hay v. Earl of Coventry Lord Kenyon said the law was clearly settled that an estate for life might be limited to unborn issue, provided the devisor did not go farther and give an estate in succession to the children of such unborn issue. In Brudenell v. Elwes, 1 East, at p. 454, he said the same thing. [CotTON, L.J.—Mr. Marten pointed out that the remainder there was clearly bad under the rule against perpetuities.] In all these cases in which there were legal remainders, what Lord St. Leonards said in Cole v. Sewell, as to the rule against perpetuities having no application to such estates, is a complete answer to that argument. In Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G. 145, at p. 170, he said the rule was too well settled to be broken in upon. In Fearne's Contingent Remainders, 10th ed. (1844), p. 565, chap. 4, on executory devises, section 21, Mr. Butler's note states the rule as an existing one. Again, on p. 251, note C., he refers to the rule against a possibility upon a possibility as existing. The rule was a common law rule, and never had any application either to equitable estates or to personalty, because there are at law no such estates as remainders in personalty. In Cattlin v. Brown the dictum simply approved a statement of Mr. Preston in Mogg v. Mogg, and applied it to equitable estates. Mogg v. Mogg was also a case of equitable and not legal estates. Routledge v. Dorril was a case of personal estate. The law never recognized a remainder in personal estate, and this is purely a rule of law. The rule is an old rule of the common law which has never been abrogated, and could not be, except by the Legislature.

He also referred to Burton's Compendium, 7th ed., p. 256; Joshua Williams on Real Property, 11th ed., Appendix F., p. 521; 15th ed., p. 647; Sugden's Law of Property, pp. 120, 121; Cadell v. Palmer, 1 Cl. & Fin. 372; Preston on Abstracts, vol. ii. pp. 114, 166; Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 502—3, s. IV.; and Hockley v. Mawbey, 1 Ves. jun. 143.

Renshaw, Q.C. (Swinfen Eady with him), for the defendant Mitchell.—That the power to Mrs. Burlton to appoint by will is bad, is not disputed. Where a power to appoint by will is void for remoteness, the limitations over in default of appointment are bad too: Wollaston v. King, 17 W. R. 641, L. R. 8 Eq. 165.

Alexander Young, for the plaintiff.

W. Baker in reply.—In Porter v. Bradley Lord Kenyon said the time allowed by law in the case of an executory devise was borrowed by analogy from legal formal limitations—namely, for a life or lives in being, with a remainder in tail to unborn children, who cannot bar it till twenty-one. That shows the rule against perpetuities is really only the adaptation of the common law rule. The perpetuities rule is first crystallized in Cadell v. Palmer, since which the old rule has never been recognized. [CotTON, L.J. — Because the rule against perpetuities has sufficed for all the cases that have arisen.] The opinion of Jessel, M.R., was in our favour: In re Ridley, Buckton v. Hay. The case of Hockley v. Mawbey also disposes of the old rule—it lays down that an appointment in exercise of a power to appoint as the donee pleases among issue, however remote, is good as to issue living at the time of appointment if made during the donee's life. Is there any difference in principle between dividing an estate between two persons both now living, giving Blackacre to one and Whiteacre to the other, and dividing it in such a way as to give a life estate to one and a remainder to the other? The case of In re Ridley shows that the rule against perpetuities, which only took its present shape in 1833, was intended to apply to legal contingent remainders as well as to springing uses and executory devises. The rule that you cannot limit an estate for life to an unborn person with remainder to issue of that unborn person is simply a branch of the rule against perpetuities, but there is no rule which makes such a limitation void where it includes a proviso that the issue are to be born within the time allowed by the rule against perpetuities. As to the case of Wollaston v. King, Mrs. Burlton has released that void power of appointing by will, and the gift in default, is not dependent on that void power, but is by way of substitution for it.

CotTON, L.J.—This is an appeal against a decision of Kay, J., declaring that certain limitations of legal estates introduced into a settlement made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Dennis are void, and that they are void, not on the ground of remoteness, but because they are of a kind which the law does not allow. The limitations in question are to an unborn child of the marriage for life and then to her unborn children. It is said that that does not transgress the rule against perpetuities, and that there is no other rule which prevents such a limitation from being good. Kay, J., has decided, rightly as I think, that there is a rule which prevents such a limitation from being good. That rule is sometimes described as a rule against making a remainder depend upon the event of a double possibility, or a possibility on a possibility, but it is, I think, better defined as a rule against legal limitations of land by way of remainder or otherwise (after an estate for life to an unborn person) to the issue of that unborn person, so that such issue should take as purchasers. Then it was said that though there was that old rule formerly, it had long ago been done away with and superseded by the modern rule against perpetuities. In my opinion, it is impossible for us to come to the conclusion that it has been done away with.

It was conceded that the old rule existed long before the modern one against perpetuities came into existence. Can one say it has been superseded? Mr. Joshua Williams says it is still existing; other text-book writers say it is not. One must see what views have been expressed by judges and other authorities bearing directly or indirectly on the question. What one finds is this. We have Mr. Butler's note in Fearne's Contingent Remainders, in which he says the rule has not been superseded, and though there has been a good deal of argument on the other side, based on the statements of text-writers and certain dicta of judges, and considerable doubt is expressed by various text-writers on the subject, yet, in my opinion, the rule must be considered as still existing, and as preventing the limiting of estates in a way which infringes it, though not offending against the rule against perpetuities.

Lord Kenyon refers to it in the case of Hay v. Earl of Coventry. He says: "It is not necessary for me to say what effect that would have had in the present case if that point"—whether an estate for life could be given to unborn issue—"had remained undecided; because the law is now clearly settled that an estate for life may be limited to unborn issue, provided the devisor does not go farther and give an estate in succession to the children of such unborn issue." But it was contended that was really only because such a limitation to unborn issue generally would necessarily be void under the rule against perpetuities. But we find this old rule referred to by judges in other cases as still existing, long after the rule against perpetuities was established. In 1852 we find Lord St. Leonards, in Monypenny v. Dering, saying: "Then the rule of law forbids the raising of successive estates by purchase to unborn children—that is, to an unborn child of an unborn child. With this rule I have never meant to interfere, for it is too well settled to be broken in upon." Now he said that at a time when, according to the argument for the appellants, the old rule had ceased to exist or had been superseded by the rule against perpetuities.

Then we have Mr. Butler's note in Fearne, where he distinctly lays down that there had not been any superseding of the old rule. He says: "The cases of a possibility upon a possibility may be considered as exceptions from the rule. They proceeded on a different ground, and gave rise to this important rule, that, if land is limited to an unborn person during his life, a remainder cannot be limited so as to confer an estate by purchase on that person's issue." There he recognizes the two rules as both then existing. Then we have the passage in Mr. Burton's Law of Real Property which was read by Mr. Farwell:—"Life estates may by law be given in succession to any number of persons in existence, and ulterior estates in succession to their children yet unborn. . . . But no remainder can be given to the child of a person who is not in existence." So he, too, does recognize the old rule as still subsisting. Now, although there has been a very ingenious and learned argument to show that the old rule has been done away with or superseded by the modern rule against perpetuities, and a passage in Cole v. Sewell was read by Mr. Marten, in which Sir E. Sugden said that the effect of the modern rule against perpetuities has been to render the old rule obsolete, yet by that, Sir E. Sugden only means that it is not now necessary to refer to it, because the modern rule is generally sufficient to meet the necessities of the case, and he nowhere lays down that the old rule is no longer in existence. But then, if Mr. Marten refers to that passage as in his favour, I prefer what Lord St. Leonards said on the bench at a later period (Monypenny v. Dering), which shows he did not consider that the old rule had been superseded or done away with. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of Kay, J., was right, and this appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I have no doubt that the observations of Mr. Joshua Williams on this subject are correct from beginning to end, and I do not think I could express my own view better than by reading what he says. But I am in a difficulty, as it is obvious he was, to understand the old rule or doctrine as to a possibility upon a possibility, and if anyone will turn to the passage in Coke upon Littleton where it is discussed, I hope he will understand it better than I do. I do not understand it now, and never did. But still it has given rise to an intelligible rule. Mr. Butler, in his note in Fearne's Contingent Remainders, at p. 565, says: [His lordship read the passage read by Cotton, L.J., and continued:—] That is intelligible, and there is also a passage to the same effect on pp. 502, 503. I always understood that it was a settled rule of law, and I am not aware of any authority or dictum which in any way impugns it. Then it is contended that the old rule is antiquated and obsolete, and that it has been merged in or superseded by the modern rule as to perpetuities. I think the same note of Mr. Butler is an answer to that. It points out that the old rule has nothing at all to do with perpetuities, the rule against which was invented later. When springing uses and executory devises were invented, it became necessary to consider how far they could be allowed, and so the rule against perpetuities was introduced to impose bounds upon the limitation of future estates. In my opinion the old rule has never been abrogated, and the principle of it seems to me to be grounded on very good sense. After all the practical question is whether, upon the grounds now put forward, we ought to allow land to be tied up for a longer term than has been generally allowed. But in my opinion, so far from lending our assistance to support ingenious devices to tie it up as long as possible, our inclination ought rather to be to discountenance such a proceeding as a retrograde step. I think the time has long gone by for supporting devices tending to the indefinite tying up of land.

I am clearly of opinion that the decision of Kay, J., was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—That there was an old rule that an estate could not be limited to unborn children of an unborn person is admitted, and could not in fact be denied. But it is said that it has been superseded by the rule against perpetuities. No direct authority for that assertion, however, has been brought before us, nor could any such authority be found. Certain dicta by text-book writers of more or less doubtful import and authority, were brought to our notice. In the year 1789, however, the old rule was recognized as existing by Lord Kenyon in the case of Hay v. Earl of Coventry, and again in the year 1852 it was recognized as still existing by Lord St. Leonards in the case of Monypenny v. Dering; and it is to be noted that both these cases were decided after the rule against perpetuities was in existence. No doubt, therefore, these rules are two independent and co-existing rules. The origin of the rule against perpetuities was the rise or invention of executory devises and springing uses, against which the old rule afforded no sufficient protection. I am clearly of opinion that this decision was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

TURNOCK v. SARTORIS. (a.)

Arbitration—Agreement to refer—Application to stay proceedings—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), s. 11.

A lessor covenanted with the lessee to lay down all apparatus necessary for supplying with water a reservoir of the lessee's, and to cause to be delivered such a quantity of water as would enable the lessee to furnish his works with the supply necessary for the purposes of his business, such supply not to exceed a certain limit. The lease contained a clause for referring to arbitration any dispute "touching these presents or any clause, matter, or thing herein contained, . . . or any matter in any way connected with these presents, . . . or the rights or liabilities of either party in connection with the premises."

Several years afterwards, and during the continuance of the lease, an agreement in writing was entered into between the plaintiff and the lessor, the effect of which was to some extent to modify the rights of the parties under the lease and to impose fresh liabilities on the lessor; there was, however, no arbitration clause in the agreement.

The plaintiff (an assignee of the original lessee), some time after the date of the agreement, commenced an action against the lessor, and, by the statement of claim, alleged breaches by the defendant of the stipulation contained in the agreement and also breaches of the covenant contained in the lease, and claimed damages "by reason of the matters aforesaid."

The defendant, before putting in a statement of defence, took out a summons for a stay of the action, and that all matters in dispute should be referred to arbitration.

Held, that the arbitration clause in the lease did not cover matters arising under the subsequent agreement, and that, even if it did, the judge had properly refused to refer the action under this clause, as the action raised questions as to the construction of the agreement and its effect on the previous lease, which could not come within the powers of the reference under the clause.

Held, also, that it would not be right to separate the litigation into two actions by referring to arbitration the questions arising under the lease, and allowing the action to proceed only as to matters not arising under the lease.

Decision of North, J., affirmed.

Appeal from North, J.

By a lease dated June 21, 1870, the predecessor in title of the present defendants demised to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, a factory for the manufacture of tin plates, and the lessor covenanted to lay down all apparatus necessary for supplying with water a reservoir (to be constructed by the lessee); and by means of such apparatus to cause to be delivered into the reservoir such a quantity of water as would enable the lessee to furnish the manufactory and works with the necessary supply of water for the purposes of the business, such supply not to exceed 110,000 gallons per day. The lease contained a clause which provided "that if any dispute, question, difference, or controversy shall arise between the said parties to these presents, their respective heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, touching these presents or any clause, matter, or thing herein contained, or the construction hereof, or any matter in any way connected with these presents, or the operation hereof, or the rights, duties, or liabilities of either party in connection with the premises, then and in every such case the matter in difference shall be referred to two arbitrators or their umpire, pursuant to, and so as with regard to the mode and consequence of the reference, and in all other respects to conform to the provisions in that behalf contained in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, or any then subsisting statutory modification thereof."

The lessee constructed the reservoir, and prior to 1880 assigned his interest in the lease to the plaintiff.

In 1884 disputes arose between the plaintiff and the lessor as to the quality and quantity of water supplied; and in 1885 an agreement in writing was entered into between the plaintiff and the original lessor whereby it was agreed that the lessor should obtain at his own expense the requisite easements for laying down new pipes by a new and less circuitous route; that the new line of pipes was to be kept in repair by the plaintiff; that the plaintiff was to undertake the whole charge of the waterworks upon certain terms specified in the agreement, if so required by the lessor, and that if the plaintiff was so required by the lessor, then that the lessor was to be freed from any liability under the covenant in the lease as to the supply of water, provided that the lessor should be liable to maintain such a supply of pure water as would enable the plaintiff to convey to the factory a quantity not exceeding 110,000 gallons per day.

There was, however, no arbitration clause in this agreement.

The present action was instituted in April, 1888, against the lessor, and he having died before trial, the action was in February, 1889, revived against the present defendants as executors and trustees of the lessor.

The 8th paragraph of the statement of claim alleged that since the agreement of 1885 neither the lessor nor the defendants had obtained, nor attempted to obtain, the requisite easements for laying down the new pipes; that the lessor had failed to furnish the plaintiff's reservoir so as to enable the plaintiff to furnish, and that the lessor neglected himself to furnish, the works with a necessary supply of water, though such necessary supply would never have exceeded 110,000 gallons per day.

The 10th paragraph of the statement of claim alleged that, by reason of the insufficiency of the supply of water to the plaintiff's works, the plaintiff had suffered, and still continued to suffer, considerable damage in the manufacture of tin plates. The claim was for an inquiry "as to the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the matters aforesaid," and for judgment for the amount that might be certified as the result of such inquiry, if the defendants admitted assets, and if they did not, then for administration of the testator's estate.

The defendants, before putting in any defence, issued a summons asking that all further proceedings in the action might be stayed pursuant to section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

North, J., refused to stay the action, and dismissed the summons.

The defendants appealed.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and S. Woolf, for the appellants.—Though the 8th paragraph of the statement of claim alleges a breach of the agreement of 1885, yet no relief is claimed in respect of that; the only relief claimed is in respect of the allegation in paragraph 10 of breach of the covenant contained in the lease itself. At all events we are entitled to have the question of the breach of covenant in the lease referred to arbitration. The lease and the agreement should be read together, and the arbitration clause is therefore applicable to both: Wade-Gery v. Morrison, 37 L. T. N. S. 270, 26 W. R. Dig. 10. The arbitrator can decide what questions are within the reference: Willesford v. Watson, 21 W. R. 350, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 473. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., referred to the observations of Jessel, M.R., in Piercy v. Young, 28 W. R. 845, 14 Ch. D., at p. 208.]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and H. Terrell, for the plaintiff, the respondent, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the refusal of North, J., to stop the action and send the matters in dispute to arbitration. Two questions seem to me to be involved—first, whether the matters in dispute come within the clause of arbitration, and, secondly, if that be so, whether there has been a proper exercise of his discretion by the judge in saying that the matters ought not to be referred.

The lease under which the plaintiff claims, contained a covenant by the lessor, whom the defendants represent, to supply a certain quantity of water to the demised premises. Disputes having arisen as to the supply, in 1885 an agreement was entered into (which in my opinion cannot be read as part of the agreement contained in the original lease) imposing on the lessor fresh liabilities, and to some extent modifying the previous rights of the parties.

In my opinion the present action is for breach both of the covenant in the lease and of that contained in the agreement of 1885. Mr. Crackanthorpe argued that the action was brought only in respect of breaches of the covenant contained in the lease; in my opinion, however, that is not so. Paragraph 8 of the statement of claim distinctly refers to breaches of the contract contained in the agreement, and although paragraph 10 seems to refer only to breaches of the covenant in the lease, yet the plaintiff expressly claims damages sustained "by reason of the matters aforesaid," so that he cannot be precluded from claiming damages in respect of all matters previously referred to in the statement of claim, and the claim cannot, therefore, be confined to breaches of the covenant contained in the lease.

Then it was said that the arbitration clause in the lease would include and apply to matters of dispute arising under the subsequent agreement. In my opinion that is not so. [The Lord Justice read the clause, and proceeded:—] The words are, "any dispute . . . touching these presents," that is, the lease; "or any clause, matter, or thing herein contained," that is, contained in the lease; "or any matter connected with these presents, . . . or the rights, duties, or liabilities of either party in connection with the premises"; that, to my mind, refers simply to questions arising under the lease alone, and I therefore hold that the clause does not include the matters arising under the subsequent agreement.

The case of Wade-Gery v. Morrison was entirely different from the present case. In that case there were two contemporaneous documents, one of which contained, and the other of which did not contain, a stipulation for reference to arbitration; the learned judge decided that those two documents should be treated as together forming one agreement, and therefore that the clause as to reference to arbitration was to apply to matters arising under either of the two documents which together made up the agreement.

Then it was said that, at all events, the question arising under the lease ought to be referred to arbitration, leaving the action to proceed only as to matters not arising under the lease. I do not think that would be right. It cannot be right to cut up this litigation into two actions in that way.

But even if the arbitration clause could be construed so as to include all the matters in respect of which the plaintiff claims damages, yet I think it would be a right exercise of discretion on the part of the judge to refuse to refer it, because there are questions arising as to the construction of the agreement, and its effect on the previous lease, which could not come within the powers of the arbitrators.

Whether or not it will be reasonable, when the plaintiff knows what the defence put in by the defendants is, to refer the whole matter is another question. The appeal therefore fails.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The only word I will add is to recommend that, as soon as the defence has been put in, the parties should consent to the cause being tried by an official referee. I think the case is one which it is the duty of the solicitors on both sides to agree to refer, otherwise there will be a double expense and a double litigation.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me to be reasonably plain that the arbitration clause does not cover all the matters in dispute in the action.

After what has been said, especially by Bowen, L.J., I cannot help adding a word or two on the subject. I view with considerable regret the number of cases in which the court is called upon to try matters twice over—viz., to try the question whether there ought to be an inquiry as to damages, and then to try the matter again upon an inquiry as to what the damages are. I think, so far as possible, those double inquiries ought to be avoided.

Appeal dismissed.

ROCKE v. MCKERROW. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Trial with jury—Application to set aside judgment—Judgment entered upon further consideration—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 39, r. 1; ord. 40, rr. 4, 5.

At the trial of an action with a jury, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing the damages. The judge, upon further consideration, held that there was no evidence of liability on the part of the defendant, and entered judgment accordingly.

Held, that an application to set aside the judgment so entered must be made to the Divisional Court, and not to the Court of Appeal.

In an action to recover damages for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment tried before Stephen, J., with a jury, the learned judge left the case to the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff for £80. The learned judge, having reserved the case for further consideration, held that there was no evidence of liability on the part of the defendant, and gave judgment accordingly.

The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Gully, Q.C. (Hopkinson with him), took the preliminary objection that the appeal lay to the Divisional Court under ord. 39, r. 1, as the trial had taken place with a jury. It is the same as if the judge had directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant: Etty v. Wilson, 3 Ex. D. 359, 27 W. R. Dig. 160; Davies v. Felix, 27 W. R. 108, 4 Ex. D. 32.

He also referred to ord. 58, r. 5.

Ambrose, Q.C. (W. S. Robson and Compton Smith with him), for the plaintiff.—The case comes within ord. 40, rr. 4, 5. Rule 4 provides that "where at or after a trial by a judge, either with or without a jury, the judge has directed that any judgment be entered, any party may apply to set aside such judgment and to enter any other judgment, upon the ground that, upon the finding as entered, the judgment so directed is wrong." By rule 5 an application under rule 4 shall be to the Court of Appeal. The application here is to set aside the judgment and to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the verdict of the jury.

Gully, Q.C., in reply.—Ord. 40, r. 4, does not apply where the finding of the jury is not accepted by the judge. It applies to a special verdict where the judge accepts the findings and enters judgment upon them. Here the judge set aside the verdict.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—We are all of opinion that the appeal has been brought to the wrong court, and therefore we cannot hear it. The appeal ought to have been to the Divisional Court.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—After consideration I have come to the same conclusion. Supposing the judge at the trial directs the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, the only way of questioning that would be by an application to the Divisional Court for a new trial on the ground of misdirection. Supposing, again, the judge leaves the question to the jury, and before it is answered he changes his opinion and directs the jury to find for the defendant, there again that would be a case of misdirection, and the application must be to the Divisional Court. In the present case the judge left the question to the jury and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. Upon further consideration, however, he came to the conclusion that he was wrong in leaving any question to them at all, and he thereupon directed judgment to be entered for the defendant. That, in my opinion, was not a case of entering judgment upon the findings of the jury as correct. The judge did not assume that the question was properly left to the jury and properly answered, and enter judgment accordingly. He came to the conclusion that he was wrong in leaving the question to the jury, and he set aside their verdict and entered judgment for the defendant just as if he had never left the question to them at all. In reality it amounted to the same thing as if he had directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. The application ought, therefore, to have been to the Divisional Court.

Fry, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is not within ord. 40, r. 4. That rule applies where the findings of the jury are assumed to be correct, and judgment is entered upon them, and an application is made to set aside the judgment on the ground that upon the findings the judgment has been wrongly entered. In other words, that, the finding standing as it is, the judge has drawn a wrong inference from it, and has entered judgment wrongly.

Appeal dismissed.

In re An Arbitration between the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co. and the Trustees of Gower's-walk Schools. (a.)

Railway company—Land injuriously affected—Obstruction of windows—Ancient lights—Measure of compensation—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 6, 16.

The owner of certain ancient lights pulled down the old buildings and erected others, of which some of the windows corresponded, and others did not correspond, with the ancient lights. Before any right to the access of light had been acquired by the new windows, a railway company, under its statutory powers, erected a building on adjacent land belonging to them which obstructed the light of all the windows.

Held, affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 332, 24 Q. B. D. 40), that compensation must be given in respect of all the windows obstructed, and not merely in respect of those which corresponded with ancient lights.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Mathew and Wills, JJ.), reported ante, p. 332, 24 Q. B. D. 49.

In 1884 the trustees of the Gower's-walk Schools removed them to a site in Lambeth-street, Whitechapel, upon which some buildings were standing which were pulled down and the schools erected. Some of the window spaces in the new building included substantially some of the windows in the old building, all of which were ancient lights, but other of the new windows did not correspond with any of the old window spaces.

In 1886 the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co. under their special Act, which incorporated the Railways Clauses and Lands Clauses Acts, erected on the land on the opposite side of the street to the schools, a warehouse which obstructed the light coming to the schools.

The trustees claimed compensation in respect of the whole of the windows. The company contended that they were only entitled to compensation in respect of such of the windows as corresponded with ancient lights. The arbitrator assessed the compensation at £1,450 if the trustees were entitled to compensation for the whole, and at £725 if they were only entitled to compensation in respect of ancient lights, and stated a case for the opinion of the court. The court held that the trustees were entitled to compensation in respect of the whole of the windows obstructed, and gave judgment accordingly.

The railway company appealed.

R. S. Wright and Charles Haigh, for the appellants.—Compensation can only be given for damage in respect of which an action could have been brought: Metropolitan Board of Works v. M'Carthy, 23 W. R. 115, L. R. 7 H. L. 243, unless land of the claimant has been taken: Reg. v. Chester Clerk of the Peace (Stockport case) 12 W. R. 762; Cowper Essex v. Acton Local Board, ante, p. 209, 14 App. Cas. 153. What is taken may be only an easement, as in Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418, but in this case nothing has been taken, and therefore the rule in M'Carthy's case must prevail.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and Houghton, for the respondents.—It is impossible for the building to obstruct the ancient lights without also affecting the windows which are not ancient lights. Wherever an owner of land has his interest injuriously affected by an act which can only be legally done under a statutory power, he is entitled to compensation for all the damage he sustains by the exercise of the statutory power, even although no part of his land is taken, and although the damage is not damage for which he could recover in an action at law.

R. S. Wright, in reply, cited Ricket v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 15 W. R. 937, L. R. 2 H. L. 175.

Dec. 19.—The following judgments were delivered:—

Lord Esher, M.R.—In this case the defendants were authorized by statute to erect a large warehouse close to one side of a street. On the other side of that narrow street stood the plaintiffs' schoolhouse, and in that schoolhouse there were several windows, some of which were, and some of which were not, ancient lights. The warehouse undoubtedly diminished the light coming to all those windows, and the defendants became liable to indemnify the plaintiffs for any damage properly suffered by the injurious affecting of their property. If they were only bound to compensate the plaintiffs for the injury to their ancient lights, the arbitrator has fixed one sum; if, however, they were bound to indemnify them for the diminution of light coming to all the windows, whether ancient lights or not, the arbitrator has fixed another sum. It is not denied that they were liable to compensate the plaintiffs for the injurious affection of the ancient lights, but the question is, whether they are liable to pay the larger sum for the interference with the light of the other windows which are not ancient lights. I confess that I at one time entertained considerable doubt on the question. If none of these windows had been ancient lights, the plaintiffs would not have been able at common law to sue adjoining owners who had interfered with the access of light to those windows. Ought they, therefore, under the Act of Parliament, to be compensated for the injury done to the modern windows. Supposing that the railway company had not had the Act of Parliament, but had been ordinary owners, and had erected this warehouse on their land, what would have been the effect of a common law action brought against them by the plaintiffs for the injury to their ancient lights? The interference with the ancient lights would have been a wrongful act, and where a man does a wrongful act he is liable for all the direct damage caused by that act. Therefore, since the inevitable consequence of putting up such a warehouse would be not merely to obstruct the access of light to such of the windows as were ancient lights, but also to the modern windows, I am of opinion that even in a common law action the plaintiffs would have been entitled to compensation for the whole injury done to their building by the wrongful act of the defendants, and that that would include the damage done to the new windows as well as that done to the old. If that is so, it is obvious that compensation must be given under the Railways Clauses Act to the same extent. But if that is not so, and in a common law action the plaintiff could only have recovered for the injury to the ancient lights, then what are his rights under section 16 of the Railways Clauses Act? Is he entitled to compensation for anything for which in a common law action he could not have recovered damages. The section speaks of "full satisfaction for all damage." Supposing that it ran "shall make satisfaction for damage by them sustained." That would carry all legal damage, and therefore, if "full satisfaction for all damage" means nothing more, the words "full" and "all" are tautologous. Nevertheless, had it not been for a superior authority, I confess I should not have thought that the Act meant to give compensation for anything more than actual legal damage, but in the case of Cowper Essex v. Acton Local Board the House of Lords have laid down the principle which must guide us. In that case some land had been taken from Mr. Cowper Essex, and what was done on that land injuriously affected the value of the adjoining land, which also belonged to him. The House of Lords, as I understand them, said that Mr. Cowper Essex was entitled to compensation for something more than the legal damage which he had sustained. The Lord Chancellor says:—"When part of a proprietor's land is taken from him, and the future use of the part so taken may damage the remainder of the proprietor's land, then such damage may be an injurious affecting of the proprietor's other lands, though it would not be an injurious affecting of the land of a neighbouring proprietor from whom nothing has been taken for the purpose of the intended work." That is to say, that, under the section which we are now considering, there may be an injurious affecting, for the purpose of compensation, by something which would not, in an action at law, give rise to damages. That case affirmed what are known as the Stockport case and the Duke of Buccleuch's case. In the present case it is true no land of the plaintiff's was taken by the defendants, but how can that signify? If the case once comes within the statute, then it seems that the words "full satisfaction for all damage" are to include, not only legal damage, but all the damage which the property has in fact sustained. Therefore, even though no land is taken, yet, if there is an injurious affecting, the case comes within the statute just as much as if land had been actually taken, and the interpretation put on the section by the House of Lords must be put on the one case just as much as the other. Therefore, even though this damage to the new windows could not be recovered for in a common law action, yet I think compensation must be made for it under the section. In my opinion the defendants are liable to pay to the plaintiffs the larger sum found by the arbitrator, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The key to the case is found in considering what the railway company have in fact done. They have erected a large building, and in so doing have infringed the rights of the owners of the schools by darkening their ancient lights, and, as a necessary consequence, have diminished the value of those schools. That is the necessary physical consequence of their wrongful act. On what principle ought the company not to pay compensation for this? They cannot reduce their liability for what they have actually done by saying that they might have blocked up the access of light to the plaintiff's modern windows. No action will lie against the company because they have acted under their statutory powers, but they are bound, under section 16 of the Railways Clauses Act, to make to the plaintiff full compensation for all the damage they have done in the exercise of those powers—that is to say, they must make up the difference in value between the land as it was and as it now is. I can see no authority to the contrary, and all the authorities appear to me in favour of that proposition. No doubt in the Cowper Essex case and in the Stockport case section 63 of the Lands Clauses Act was in question, but the difference is not important, whether land is taken and other land of the same proprietor injuriously affected, or whether the land is injuriously affected without any land being taken. The moment there is an injurious affecting for which compensation is payable, full compensation for all damage must be made. That seems to me to be the short answer to this case.

Lopes, L.J.—Having regard to the authorities and to section 16 of the Railways Clauses Act, I do not consider this case a difficult one. It must be borne in mind that, as a matter of fact, it is physically impossible to obstruct the access of light to the new windows without also interfering with the ancient lights and vice versâ. If an unauthorized individual had attempted to erect this warehouse without any Act of Parliament, the owners of the school would have been entitled to an injunction to restrain him from interfering with their ancient lights. Now, the owners of the school are compelled by Act of Parliament to submit to the erection of the warehouse, and have lost their legal remedy. The result is that the light both of its old and its new windows has been diminished, and the value of the property has been deteriorated. The company are bound to make full satisfaction for all the damage they have caused to the plaintiffs, and therefore I think the larger sum is payable. I think that the principle which may be deduced from the authorities is this, that directly a party brings himself within the statute and is entitled to compensation, then he becomes entitled to receive full compensation for all damage, and not only for the strictly legal damage which he has sustained.

"THE CITY OF LINCOLN." (a.)

Ship—Collision—Measure of damages—Loss of instruments of navigation—Subsequent loss of vessel.

A barque, having been run into by a steamer, which was solely to blame, lost in the collision her instruments of navigation. She made for a port of safety, but, while on her way thither, without any negligence or want of skill, ran aground and was lost.

Held, that this was a reasonable and natural consequence of the collision, and that the owners of the steamer were liable for it.

Appeal from the decision of Butt, J., reversing the registrar's report.

On the 7th of November, 1888, the barque Albatross was run into by the steamer City of Lincoln in the North Sea, The City of Lincoln being alone to blame for the collision.

The starboard quarter of The Albatross was cut off by the blow, and she lost her steering compass, log, and log glass, and large, and coasting, charts. Her master, however, made for the Thames, steering by another compass which he found, but being unable to calculate his distance he ran the barque aground, and she had to be abandoned.

The registrar held that the grounding was not caused by any negligence on the part of those on board The Albatross, and that the owners of The City of Lincoln were liable. Butt, J., reversed the report, holding that the persons in charge of The Albatross had been negligent.

The owners of The Albatross appealed.

Barnes, Q.C., Stubbs, and Stokes, for the appellants.—The loss of The Albatross was caused by the wrongful act of The City of Lincoln, since it was the direct consequence of that act.

They cited Jones v. Boyce, 1 Stark, 193; Wilson v. Newport Dock Co., L. R. 1 Ex. 177; The Pensher, Swa. 211; The Countess of Durham, 9 Monthly Law Mag. 357, Part 2, 279; The Notting Hill, 32 W. R. 764 9 P. D. 105; The Argentino, 37 W. R. 210, 14 App. Cas. 519; The Mellona, 3 Wm. Rob. 7.

Sir W. G. F. Phillimore and J. P. Aspinall, for the respondents.—The intervention of the acts of those on board The Albatross breaks the chain of consequence, and The City of Lincoln is not therefore responsible for her loss.

They cited The Flying Fish, Br. & L. 436, 13 W. R. H. L. Dig. 11; Adams v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 17 W. R. 884, L. R. 4 C. P. 739.

Barnes, Q.C., replied.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the bad navigation of The City of Lincoln not only damaged The Albatross, but also deprived her captain of his charts, compass, and log. I think he was right, however, in resolving to make for the Thames. He laboured under great difficulties, and we are advised that he was not negligent in anything that he did. But even where there is no negligence there may be intermediate circumstances which prevent the ultimate damage from being the direct result of the wrongful act. In this case, however, I think that the loss of the ship was caused by the captain's having been deprived of the means of finding out where he was, and that deprivation was the direct result of the wrongful act of The City of Lincoln. The owners of that vessel are, therefore, responsible for the accident which subsequently happened in consequence of that deprivation. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The view taken by the registrar was correct. We are advised that there was no negligence on the part of those on board The Albatross, and, therefore, on the facts, we differ from Butt, J. Then comes the question whether the loss of The Albatross was too remote a consequence of the collision to render the owners of The City of Lincoln responsible for it. The rule is well laid down in Mayne on Damages, 4th ed., pp. 44, 45: "Damage is said to be remote when, although arising out of the cause of action, it does not so immediately and necessarily follow from it as that the offending party can be made responsible for it. . . . The first, and in fact the only, inquiry in all these cases is whether the damage complained of is the natural and reasonable result of the defendant's act. It will assume that character if it can be shown to be such a consequence as, in the ordinary course of things, would flow from the act." That rule was adopted by Lord Herschell in The Argentino. What, then, is the meaning of "the ordinary course of things"? In my opinion it includes reasonable human conduct. That was the principle acted upon in Jones v. Boyce, which I have always thought to be sound law. In this case I think that the captain of The Albatross acted reasonably and without any negligence. The loss of the ship was caused by the bad state she was in and by the deprivation of her charts, logline, and compass. I think, therefore, that the case falls within the rule I have laid down, and that the owners of The City of Lincoln are responsible for the loss of The Albatross.

LOPES, L.J.—The case may be thus stated:—By the misconduct of the defendants the plaintiffs' ship was placed in a position of the utmost peril, and this was caused entirely by the defendants' fault. To save their ship, and to minimize as far as possible the loss to the defendants, the plaintiffs endeavoured to reach a place of safety, and while so doing, without any negligence or any want of skill, and also without any independent intervening cause, the ship runs aground and is lost. Under those circumstances, in my opinion the defendants are liable for that loss. The original fault was theirs, and they are responsible for what followed. They are responsible for the natural consequences, not only of the collision, but of the deprivation of The Albatross of the usual means of navigation. If there had been negligence or want of skill on the part of those in charge of The Albatross the result would be different, but we are advised that there was none. Nor was there any intervening interposition, but the loss of the ship was the direct consequence of the collision and the deprivation of her instruments of navigation. I therefore agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Emeris v. Woodward. (a.)

Compromise of action—Application to set aside—Summons—Jurisdiction.

An agreement for the compromise of an action cannot be set aside by a summons in the action; a fresh action must be brought for the purpose.

Adjourned summons.

The plaintiff in this action claimed an order that the defendant, who was an executor, should execute transfers to the plaintiff of three mortgages in pursuance of an alleged agreement.

On the 2nd of August, 1887, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant for the compromise of the action on certain terms therein mentioned. This agreement was made subject to its being approved by the judge before whom another action, which had been brought to administer the testator's estate, was pending, and that approval had been obtained.

On the 4th of February, 1889, the plaintiff took out a summons entitled in both actions, asking that so much of the agreement of the 2nd of August, 1887, as provided that the defendant should forthwith make and execute (inter alia) an assignment to the plaintiff of a mortgage dated the 30th of December, 1878, might be varied as in the summons mentioned.

On the 16th of July, 1889, the plaintiff took out a second summons asking to be at liberty to amend the first summons by adding thereto the words "or that the said agreement may be set aside in toto, or that the plaintiff may be at liberty to continue the action of Emeris v. Woodward, or to take such proceedings against the defendant as he may be advised."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and B. Eyre, for the plaintiff.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the defendant.—We have a preliminary objection to make. We say that a compromise of an action cannot be set aside upon a summons. The plaintiff should have brought a fresh action to set aside the compromise.

They referred to Gilbert v. Endean, 27 W. R. 252, 9 Ch. D. 259; Pryor v. Gribble, 23 W. R. 642, L. R. 10 Ch. 534; Scully v. Lord Dundonald, 27 W. R. 249, 8 Ch. D. 658.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and B. Eyre, for the plaintiff.—This objection ought to have been taken in chambers. At any rate, if it was taken in chambers, the defendant, by filing affidavits in answer to the plaintiff's affidavits, has waived such objection.

North, J.—In my opinion the objection must prevail. The plaintiff's proper course, in my opinion, is to bring a fresh action to set aside the compromise; he cannot by a summons set aside the agreement and reopen the controversy. It is said the defendant has, by his conduct, waived the objection. It is clear, I think, that such an objection could be waived by conduct. But the chief clerk's notes show that the objection was raised in chambers at an early stage, and that it was clearly pointed out to the plaintiff that he ought to bring a fresh action. In my opinion the defendant has done nothing to waive the objection. Knowing of the objection the plaintiff chose to put in his evidence, and after that it was incumbent on the defendant, for his own protection, to put in and complete his evidence in answer. I must dismiss both the summonses with costs.

Chan. Div. North, J. — Feb. 12.

Marquis of Northampton v. Pollock. (a.)

Mortgage—Mortgagor and mortgagee—Redemption—Agreement excluding right to redeem in particular event—Validity—"Once a mortgage always a mortgage."

A. mortgaged his reversionary interest in land contingent on his surviving B., to secure an advance of £10,000. The mortgagees were to effect a policy of assurance for £34,000 on the life of A. against that of B., and, if they paid the premiums, to add them to the debt. The policy, in the event of A. predeceasing B., was to belong to the mortgagees absolutely. On A.'s death in B.'s lifetime, A.'s administrator brought an action to redeem the policy.

Held, on the principle that "Once a mortgage always a mortgage," that the condition that the policy should belong absolutely to the mortgagees was void, and that the plaintiff was entitled to redeem on the usual terms.

Argument of a point of law raised by the pleadings under ord. 25, r. 2.

This was a redemption action, in which the point was raised, whether an express agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagees, that the title of the latter to a portion of the mortgaged property, on the happening of a certain event, should become absolute, was binding on the mortgagor.

In the year 1879 the National Life Assurance Society advanced to Earl Compton a sum of £10,000 on the security of a mortgage in Scotch form (dated the 26th of May, 1879) of a reversionary interest in freehold property in Scotland, to which he was entitled as tenant in tail in remainder expectant on the death of his father, the plaintiff. By an agreement of even date between the same parties, it was provided that the society should insure the life of Earl Compton against that of his father in the sum of £34,000, and that they should pay the premiums during the first five years, and afterwards should continue to do so if Earl Compton failed to pay them, and that the payments made should be added to the debt. In the event of Earl Compton paying the mortgagees the whole sums due to them in the lifetime of his father, the mortgagees were to assign the policy to Earl Compton, but in the event of his death in the lifetime of his father, the mortgagees should prepare an account of what was due to them, and, after paying themselves out of the policy moneys, pay over any excess to the representatives of Earl Compton. By an agreement dated the 14th of June, 1879, after reciting that the prior agreement did not accurately state the terms on which the advance was made, it was agreed that, in the event of the death of Earl Compton before his father without repayment of the mortgage debt, the policy moneys should belong absolutely to the mortgagees.

Accordingly the defendants, who were the trustees of the society, took out a policy in the society's office. The policy was duly kept up, but nothing was ever paid as premiums, interest, or otherwise by Earl Compton up to his death in 1887, in the lifetime of his father. The plaintiff, as his administrator, sought by this action to redeem the policy and obtain payment of the amount assured, less the mortgage debt, interest, premiums, and other charges due from the deceased. The defendants by their statement of defence alleged that it had been expressly agreed between themselves and the mortgagor that, in the event which had happened, the sum secured by the policy should belong absolutely to the society; that the agreement was not within the evil aimed at by the old rule, "Once a mortgage always a mortgage"; and that it was no hardship on the mortgagor, who had received £10,000 and paid nothing, but that this was an attempt to obtain a still further sum from the mortgagees.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and R. Winslow, for the plaintiff.—This transaction is a mortgage, and the agreement set up by the defendants that the policy should, in a certain event, belong to them is a breach of the equitable rule, "Once a mortgage always a mortgage." A mortgage cannot be made irredeemable: Howard v. Harris, 1 Vern. 194; Jennings v. Ward, 2 Vern. 520; Toomes v. Conset, 3 Atk. 261; Spurgeon v. Collier, 1 Eden. 55. It makes no difference that the policy was effected in the names of the trustees of the society: Drysdale v. Piggott, 4 W. R. 773, 8 De G. M. & G. 546; Lea v. Hinton, 5 De G. M. & G. 823, 3 W. R. Dig. 24; Courtenay v. Wright, 9 W. R. 153, 2 Giff. 337; Morland v. Isaacs, 3 W. R. 397, 20 Beav. 389. Earl Compton was liable to pay the premiums on the policy, the taking out of which was part of the mortgage agreement, and no bargain that the policy should become the absolute property of the mortgagees was binding: Freme v. Brade, 6 W. R. 739, 2 De G. & J. 582; Holland v. Smith, 6 Esp. 11.

They also cited Brown v. Price, 6 W. R. 721, 4 Jur. N. S. 882; James v. Kerr, 37 W. R. 279, 40 Ch. D. 449; Williams v. Owen, 5 Myl. & Cr. 303; and Goodman v. Grierson, 2 Ball & B. 274.

E. Beaumont (Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., with him), for the defendants.—The plaintiff cannot set aside part of the agreement and insist on the rest. This policy was never Earl Compton's. He never paid anything. In the cases cited in which there were policies there was no contract about them. His only right to the policy was in the event of making certain payments: Brown v. Freeman, 4 De G. & Sm. 444. [North, J., referred to Foster v. Roberts, 9 W. R. 605, 29 Beav. 467].

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., replied.

North, J.—I think in this case the plaintiff is entitled to relief.

An arrangement is made between Earl Compton on the one hand, and the insurance office on the other, through the medium of certain persons, trustees for them, that he is to receive an advance of £10,000, that a policy is to be effected, which is effected in the names of those trustees, and it is to be with any office this society may select. They select their own office, and it is effected therefore in the names of the trustees of that office. The arrangements for effecting the policy provided that the premiums for the first five years were not to be paid by Earl Compton, but by the insurance office, and there were certain provisions with respect to redemption. The policy or policies were to be on the life of Earl Compton, who was entitled to a reversionary interest in certain real estate, and, in the event of his surviving his father, the advance is charged upon that reversionary interest, and the object of the policies is to provide a fund out of which the lenders may be safe in the possible event of their security not taking effect by the death of the borrower in the lifetime of the father. The office is to find the money for the premiums for the first five years, and it was part of the bargain made between the parties that that should be done. In my opinion the result of the transaction must be taken to be exactly the same as if this office had selected another office as that in which the policies should be effected. If they had been effected with another office, on the death of Earl Compton this office, or its trustees, would have received the total amount insured, and have had the £34,000, or whatever the sum was, actually in hand. They chose, however, themselves to effect the risk in their own office. It was unfortunate for them, because the risk has turned out to be a bad one, Earl Compton dying young; but it is only one of many transactions of the same sort in which they engage, upon the result of the whole of which, unless they are very unfortunate, there will be a profit. This therefore is not, from their point of view, an isolated transaction at all, and I must hold their position therefore to be the same as if, instead of effecting it with their own office, the insurance had been effected actually with another office. In that case, on the death of Earl Compton this money would have been received, and the question would be to whom the surplus belonged after applying it for the purpose for which it was effected—viz., securing the insurance office everything that was due to them under the security for principal, interest, and costs and premiums.

This transaction was from beginning to end, in my opinion, a mortgage transaction and nothing else. What the rights of the parties in the policies may be is not concluded by that; but looking at the whole transaction I have not the least doubt that it was, and intended to be, a borrowing of money by Earl Compton, which he covenanted to repay, for which he gave security, and for which the lenders of the money had the security either of the land or the proceeds of the policies as the event might turn out, and they were intended to be repaid in that way.

Then there are certain provisions made as to redemption, and then there is this peculiar provision only found in the instrument bearing date the 14th of June, in which there is a memorandum of what was the bargain between the parties from the first. Unfortunately the original bond did not correctly express that bargain, and the minute of arrangement which was drawn for the purpose of correcting it, was itself insufficient to substitute what was right for what was wrong. It merely substituted one wrong thing for another, and it was not until the last memorandum of the 14th of June that there was really expressed what was the bargain of the parties at the time the advance was made. That bargain is contained in these words in the witnessing part:—

"Now these presents witness that, in consideration of the said advance being made to the said Earl Compton, it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the said parties hereto that in the event of the said Earl Compton predeceasing his father, the Marquis of Northampton, without having paid all principal moneys, interest, and costs due to" the defendants, "under or by virtue of the bond in the said recited agreement mentioned, that then and in such case the policy or policies, and all moneys thereby secured, shall belong absolutely to the trustees." In other words, the policies were to belong to the society.

Now Earl Compton, in point of fact, never did pay any premium. According to my view of the agreement the society were bound to effect the policies under the contract between them, and they were bound to find the premiums for the first five years, and although they may not have been bound to do it afterwards they, at any rate, had the option of doing it, and had the right to charge the premiums so paid with interest against the security, the policy moneys or the land, as events might turn out, and in point of fact they did make the advance, and the policies were kept up, and the money would, if it had been in another office, actually have been received, and being effected with the same office it must be taken to be now in their hands. It is said that there is a distinction by reason of the fact that Earl Compton never himself did advance any part of the premiums, and Mr. Beaumont very fairly admitted that he would have been in a difficulty if even one premium had been paid by Lord Compton. I do not wish to take what he admitted as prejudicing his clients at all, because it was said there was another way out of the difficulty in that case; but the distinction of the case between Earl Compton having advanced something and having advanced nothing was admitted, and the fact that he had not actually paid anything was relied on here. In my opinion that does not make any difference. If the bargain had been that he, from the first, was to pay the premiums, if he went to the office and said: "I have not the money here, will you advance it for me, I will repay you," and they had done it, it would have been a payment by him, and, I think, instead of going through that form, where it was agreed between them that the premiums should be provided by the office for him, and they should be his creditors for the amount, his position in respect to the policies was exactly the same as if, instead of that agreement, he had actually found the money.

Under these circumstances, I take it there was a mortgage transaction between the parties as part of which policies are effected on the responsibility and on the credit of Earl Compton, although, in point of fact, the cash for the purpose as between the two must be taken to be advanced by the society. In point of fact it never was advanced at all, because the whole arrangement is a book-keeping matter, but, in my opinion, he was liable to them for the premiums exactly in the same way as if he had paid the cash; and he had the same rights in respect of the policies as if he had, instead of borrowing the premiums from them, paid them cash for it. Under those circumstances it is a mortgage transaction which has to be worked out in some way or another. It seems to me that, that transaction standing, the legal right of the society will be to sue Earl Compton's representatives for the advance that was made. Mr. Beaumont says that the insurance society have never contemplated doing anything of the kind, but I cannot test the rights of the parties by any intention they may have, if it is distinct from or raises any question as to the legal rights of the parties, and it seems to me, as the bargain stands, they would have a right at this moment (if it is binding) to sue for the return of the money, and, in point of fact, if the contract is not binding, if it was set aside altogether, they would be creditors of Earl Compton's estate for the money so advanced, and have a right to sue him for so much money lent.

Then we come to the terms of redemption. What his representative says, is:—I admit his liability. An account must be taken of what is due, the insurance society must have full credit for everything due to them, if they have really done what is actually entered in their books, but then the question is as to the policies. As to that, the insurance society rely on this particular clause, which says in a certain event the policies are to be the property of the society. It is a very startling clause, because it comes to this, if, in point of fact, Earl Compton had paid the principal, interest, and costs, the policies would be his, but if he paid the principal and interest, but, by reason of a bill of costs not having been delivered, costs had not been paid, the policies would become distinctly out and out, the property of the insurance company. In my opinion a provision of that sort in a mortgage transaction is not one the law recognizes, and would not give effect to, and the result is that I must treat it, as not giving them an absolute title, but giving them a title to the policies as part of their security and nothing else. The case Mr. Beaumont puts, of the policies being entirely outside the transaction, does not seem to me to be the fact? There is a bargain existing between the parties, and the policies are part of the transaction, and I think the right to the surplus arising from them belongs to the mortgagor or his representatives, after all the liabilities have been paid. I quite feel what Mr. Beaumont says about the hardship of asking the society, who have paid Earl Compton £10,000 and have never had a farthing from him, to pay him something more; but that hardship disappears altogether when one recollects that this was a transaction which was one of many, and if they had effected the policy in another society they would have had money in their hands to repay themselves the amount advanced for yearly premiums and interest upon them, and it is only after that has been done that the parties can see what their rights are.

NEWMAN v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Practice—Discovery—Interrogatories—Security for costs—Payment of deposit—Discretion to dispense with payment—Ord. 31, rr. 25, 26.

The court or a judge has a discretionary power to dispense with payment of the deposit imposed by ord. 31, r. 26, on a party seeking discovery.

Appeal from an order made by Day, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff brought an action under Lord Campbell's Act to recover damages in respect of the death of her husband, which she alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants.

The plaintiff applied for leave to administer interrogatories to the defendants without giving security for costs by paying the deposit prescribed by ord. 31, rr. 25, 26.

The master made an order giving the plaintiff leave to interrogate the defendants, and dispensing with the payment of any deposit.

On the defendants appealing, Day, J., reversed the order of the master.

By ord. 31, r. 25, "In every cause or matter the costs of discovery, by interrogatories or otherwise, shall, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge, be secured, in the first instance, as provided by rule 26 of this order, by the party seeking such discovery."

By rule 26, "Any party seeking discovery by interrogatories shall, before delivery of interrogatories, pay into court to a separate account in the action, to be called 'Security for Costs Account,' to abide further order, the sum of £5, and if the number of folios exceeds five, the further sum of 10s. for every additional folio. Any party seeking discovery otherwise than by interrogatories shall, before making application for discovery, pay into court to a like account, to abide further order, the sum of £5, and may be ordered further to pay into court as aforesaid such additional sum as the court or a judge shall direct."

C. G. Ellis, for the appellant.—There is a discretionary power to dispense with security in proper cases. Rule 25 says security is to be given "unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge." Rule 26 merely prescribes the method in which security is to be given, and must be read subject to rule 25. In Boarder v. Lindsay, Gracie, & Co., 34 W. R. 473, a divisional court held that security could not be dispensed with. The ratio decidendi of that case seems to be that rule 26 is absolute, and is unqualified by rule 25. This view had been previously taken by a divisional court in Aste v. Stumore, 32 W. R. 219, 13 Q. B. D. 326; but in the Court of Appeal Brett, M.R., and Bowen, L.J., expressed disapproval of that view, although it was not necessary to decide the point.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

E. R. Turton, for the respondents.—Boarder v. Lindsay, Gracie, & Co. is an express decision that there is no discretion to dispense with the deposit. It has not been overruled, and ought to be followed.

DENMAN, J.—I think that where two members of the Court of Appeal say they do not agree with a view taken by the Divisional Court the matter is put at large, and we are entitled to act in accordance with our own opinion. My opinion is that there is a discretionary power in the court or a judge to dispense with the deposit in a proper case. Otherwise the words in rule 25, "unless otherwise ordered," have no meaning and are idle. This is quite consistent with rule 26, which applies to the mode in which security shall be given.

The appeal must be allowed.

MAYOR v. COLLINS. (a.)

Practice—Interrogatories—Power to interrogate infant.

An infant will not be ordered to file an affidavit in answer to interrogatories.

This was an action for libel in which the plaintiff was an infant suing by his next friend. The master made an order allowing the defendant to administer interrogatories to the plaintiff. On appeal to Pollock, B., at chambers, he referred the question to the court.

Aspland, Q.C., and Blake Odgers, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff cannot be interrogated. Under the old chancery practice the guardian of an infant could not be compelled to answer interrogatories: Savage v. Carroll, 1 Ball & B., p. 548; Lucas v. Lucas, 13 Ves. 274; Holden v. Hearn, 1 Beav. 445; and the infant could not be called upon to answer for himself: Attorney-General v. Lambirth, 5 Price, at p. 398. The practice has not been altered by the Judicature Acts: Ingram v. Little, 31 W. R. 858, 11 Q. B. D. 251; Dyke v. Stephens, 33 W. R. 932, 30 Ch. D. 189. An infant cannot be bound by admissions which are not for his own benefit: Rhodes v. Swithenbank, 37 W. R. 457, 22 Q. B. D. 577. There is no distinction between infants of tender and mature years: Morgan v. Thorne, 7 M. & W., at p. 408.

He also cited Eccleston v. Petty, Carthew, 79; United States Company v. Wagner, 15 W. R. 1026, L. R. 2 Ch. 582; ord. 16, rr. 16—21; ord. 19, r. 13; ord. 34, r. 4; and referred to Daniel's Chancery Practice, 4th ed., p. 165.

Hansell, for the defendant.—The order of the master ought to be affirmed. There is nothing to show that it was a rule before the Judicature Acts that an infant could not make admissions if he made them himself: Taylor on Evidence, 8th edition, sec. 740; Daniel's Chancery Practice, 5th ed., p. 153. An infant can be examined and cross-examined in the witness-box, and there is no reason on principle why he should not be put under discovery: O'Neill v. Read, 7 Ir. L. R. 434; Shaw v. Wilder, 2 Molloy, 532.

Aspland, Q.C., replied.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the order for interrogatories must be disallowed. I cannot read the cases cited by Mr. Aspland without coming to the conclusion that the practice of interrogating an infant defendant was utterly unknown in the Court of Chancery. The very fact that under the old chancery practice discovery was sought from the next friend, shows that there was no power to interrogate the infant himself. The rule as to infant defendants applies equally to infant plaintiffs. The Judicature Acts have made no difference in the practice. They would have contained express provision if it had been intended that interrogatories to infants should be allowed. So great a change would not have been carried out sub silentio. The defendant has failed to prove that the change has been made either directly by statute or by the rules, nor has he produced a single case where interrogatories have been administered to an infant. This being so, we cannot accept the argument which he has attempted to draw from the reason of the thing. We can only take the practice as we find it.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that I was at first startled by Mr. Hansell's point as to the position of an infant who could go into the witness-box and give evidence, and be cross-examined, but must not be put upon discovery. I am convinced, however, that such has always been the practice. Neither the Judicature Act nor the Common Law Procedure Act have altered it.

Practice—Application for judgment on specially indorsed writ—Delay—Statement of defence delivered—Right of plaintiff to apply after defence delivered—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 14, r. 1.

An application by a plaintiff for judgment under ord. 14, r. 1, may be made after the statement of defence has been delivered, but when so made, the onus is cast on the plaintiff of explaining the delay, as the proper time for such application is before the defence is delivered in the usual way, though the delivery of the defence is not an absolute bar to a subsequent application under the order.

Appeal from an order of Field, J., at chambers.

An action was brought to recover a sum of £129 17s. 6d. for principal and interest on a bill of sale, and the writ was specially indorsed. The writ was issued in February, 1889, but the defendant did not appear until October. The defendant, having obtained additional time for delivering a defence, delivered his statement of defence on the 6th of November, and on the 19th of November the plaintiff took out a summons under order 14 for leave to sign final judgment for the amount claimed. This summons was heard before a master on the 25th of November, and an objection was then taken, on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiff's application was too late, as the defence had already been delivered.

The master overruled this objection, holding that it was not necessarily too late to apply under order 14 after a defence had been delivered, and he heard the application on the merits, when he gave the plaintiff leave to sign judgment for the amount claimed, unless the defendant brought the whole amount into court within ten days.

Field, J., reversed this order, without going into the merits of the case, on the ground that the plaintiff was too late in applying after a defence had been delivered, and he gave the defendant unconditional leave to defend.

The plaintiff appealed.

Herbert Reed, for the plaintiff.—It is said, in the first place, that a plaintiff cannot apply, under order 14, after a defence has been delivered; if this were so it would be within the power of the defendant to defeat the operation of order 14 altogether by setting up a wholly frivolous defence—as, for example, if a plaintiff sues on a deed, a defendant might put in a defence that the deed was not his deed, a sham defence which he would not be able to sustain by oath under order 14, and in that way he would defeat the plaintiff's claim under the order. Again, a defendant might, immediately after the service of the writ upon him, rush in a defence, and so defeat the plaintiff's claim. It never could have been intended that the delivery of a defence could have so defeated the plain intention of the order. As to the point of the delay, there has only been a delay of one month after the appearance by the defendant, and it would be very arbitrary to say that a month's delay shall prevent the plaintiff from applying under the order.

Wilfred B. Allen, for the defendant.—If a plaintiff applies under order 14 he must do so punctually; this has always been the practice at chambers, and the plaintiff must make his application within a reasonable time after appearance, but before any defence has been delivered. Rule 6 of the same order says that a defendant may get leave to defend; "leave to defend" here means leave to deliver a defence, which shows that the order contemplates that an application under order 14 is to precede defence. If a frivolous defence be put in the plaintiff ought to proceed, not under order 14, but under ord. 25, r. 4, under which rule he can have such frivolous defence struck out and obtain judgment. There are some Irish cases referred to at p. 274 of the Annual Practice—Hackett v. Lalor, 12 Ir. L. R. 44, 31 W. R. Dig. 158; Stewartstown Loan Co. v. Daly, 12 Ir. L. R. 418, 32 W. R. Dig. 167; and Sketchley v. Corrigan, 12 Ir. L. T. R. 50—where a plaintiff was not allowed to proceed under the order after a defence had been delivered.

Reed, in reply.—These Irish cases are not in point, as there the plaintiff had himself done something which disentitled him from proceeding under the order; in the one case he had joined issue on the defence, and in the other he had delivered a statement of claim.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by

POLLOCK, B.—In this case the learned judge at chambers overruled the master's order, and gave the defendant unconditional leave to defend. That order of Field, J., proceeded on the construction of rule 1 of order 14, and the learned judge thought that the plaintiff was bound to make his application under the order, before the defendant had put in any defence. We took time to consider the question, partly because we wanted to find out the practice of the other judges in the matter, and partly because of the case cited to us that it was peremptory under order 14, if a statement of defence was delivered, to refuse the plaintiff's application for judgment under that order. As far as I can learn, Field, J., appears to have adopted the view that, in the absence of fraud or misconduct, the intention of the order was that the plaintiff should make his application after service of the writ, but before delivery of the defence. We do not think the rule is so absolute as that, though, no doubt, the intention was that the plaintiff should make his application before the statement of defence was delivered in the usual course. The learned judge also says that there may be peculiar circumstances, such as misconduct on the part of the defendant, or where the defendant at once delivered a defence, where that rule would not apply. Some other learned judges and masters have a different practice, and they think that the plaintiff's application should be made within a reasonable time, and they think that in some cases the defendant may by his defence disclose facts which show that judgment should be given against him.

We adopt this view, and we think that it is not compulsory that the application should be made before defence, though the intention of the rule is that the application must be made within a reasonable time, and that will in general be before the defence, though that rule is not an absolute or compulsory one, and does not absolutely preclude the plaintiff from making his application after the delivery of the defence.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the plaintiff was not necessarily too late, and, if the facts warranted that view, the master was right in the order he made. We think that where a defence has been delivered in the ordinary way and at the usual time, if the plaintiff afterwards applies under the order, the onus is cast on him of explaining the delay and showing why he had not applied earlier.

Case remitted to chambers for rehearing, with the intimation that the onus is on the plaintiff to explain the delay.

PREECE v. HARDING. (a.)

Municipal election—Petition—Persons reported guilty of corrupt practices—Jurisdiction of High Court to deal with commissioner's report—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 92, 93, 100—Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 70), s. 23, 3rd schedule, part 2—Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 51), s. 38.

When a commissioner appointed to try a municipal election petition has reported persons guilty of corrupt practices, the High Court has no power to interfere with his report on the ground that the notices prescribed by section 38 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, which is incorporated in part 2 of schedule 3 of the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, were not given to the persons so reported.

This case arose out of an election petition brought against two persons who had been elected councillors for the Ledbury Ward in the City of Hereford. Mr. Mansel Jones, the commissioner appointed to try the petition, had reported certain persons as guilty of corrupt practices. These persons then obtained a rule calling upon Mr. Mansel Jones to show cause why so much of the schedules to his report as contained their names should not be struck out, amended, or set aside, on the grounds, first, that the applicants, before being reported by the election court, did not receive any such notice as is required by section 38 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, which section is incorporated in part 2 of the 3rd schedule to the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884; secondly, that the applicants were given no opportunity of being heard by themselves; or, thirdly, of calling evidence to show why they should not be reported.

This was the argument of the rule.

R. S. Wright (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Gresham Wells with him), showed cause.—This court has no jurisdiction to interfere. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 92, sub-section 6, gives the election court the same power as a judge of the High Court trying a parliamentary election petition. These powers are the same as those of a judge of assize: Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), s. 29. There are express provisions in the Acts of 1882 and 1884 as to the jurisdiction of the High Court with respect to a municipal election petition: sections 100, 93, sub-section 8. Except in the cases expressly provided for, there is not intended to be any appeal.

He cited Ex parte Ayres, 54 L. T. N. S. 296, 34 W. R. Dig. 66; Reg. v. Mayor of Maidenhead, 9 Q. B. D. 494, 30 W. R. Dig. 79; Stevens v. Tillett, 19 W. R. 182, L. R. 6 C. P. 147; Reg. v. Hall, 7 Q. B. D. 575, 29 W. R. Dig. 81; Ex parte Fernandez, 9 W. R. 832, 10 C. B. (N. S.) 3.

Lewis Coward, for the petitioners.

Channell, Q.C. (Gwynne-James with him), for the applicants, supported the rule.—The election court had no jurisdiction to report the applicants unless the notices prescribed by the Act had been given. It is in effect a branch of the High Court—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 100, sub-section 4—and if it makes a mistake in the exercise of its powers this court can set it right.

The judgment of the COURT was delivered by MATHEW, J.—We are of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The applicants have admitted that this court can exercise no appellate jurisdiction over the commissioner, and therefore it follows that if the commissioner has said that certain persons shall be scheduled upon any ground, we are not entitled to inquire upon what evidence he proceeded. But it has been argued that, having regard to section 100 of the Act of 1882, the commissioner is practically constituted a branch of the High Court, and that, as he has exceeded that which he was delegated to do, it is the duty of this court to correct his error. This is, however, an application to this court to exercise functions which we have never known it to exercise. There is no reason to conjecture, from anything that appears in any of the Acts which have been referred to, that it was intended that we should treat the commissioner as a branch of the High Court or exercise any supervision over him. If we have no power to review his decision on any of the very important questions of fact intrusted to the decision of the commissioner, it cannot be supposed that it was intended that we should have the power to review his decision on such a matter as this. We need not, therefore, go into the question of whether there was or was not evidence before him on which he might have acted. We assume that no notice was given to these persons in order to decide the question of our jurisdiction, and we are satisfied that we have no jurisdiction.

Rule discharged.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.) Feb. 14, 17.

Ex parte BARNETT.
In re TAMPLIN & SON. (a.)

Bill of sale—"True owner"—Partnership—Bill of sale executed by one of two partners over partnership property—Validity—Undivided moiety—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), s. 5.

The words "true owner" in section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, are used in their natural, and not in an artificial sense, and a man does not cease to be the true owner of personal chattels within the meaning of that section because they may be subject to some lien or equitable right.

In 1885 the bankrupts commenced to carry on business in partnership, and in 1888 a bill of sale was executed by the elder partner, with the consent of the younger, upon partnership property as security for an advance for partnership purposes. This bill of sale was set aside by the county court judge, on the ground that the grantor was not the "true owner" of either the whole or a moiety of the goods specified in the schedule within section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and the bill of sale holder was ordered to repay the value of the goods to the trustee in bankruptcy.

Held, that the county court judge was wrong in ordering the bill of sale holder to pay back the whole of the money; that the grantor was the true owner of his moiety of the goods; and that the bill of sale holder was entitled to retain one-half of the money realized.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Williams in the county court at Pontypridd, by which he declared that the title of one Louis Barnett under a bill of sale to certain goods specified in the schedule thereof was bad, and directed him to pay the value to the trustee in bankruptcy.

The bankrupts, E. & E. W. Tamplin, were father and son, who carried on business together as butchers at Llantrissant, the business being commenced by the father in 1884, and the son joining him in 1885. In 1888 the elder bankrupt obtained from Barnett, who is a money-lender, the sum of £60 as a loan upon certain goods, for which he executed a bill of sale. A receiving order was subsequently made against the bankrupts, and the trustee in the bankruptcy applied to set aside this bill of sale on the ground that the goods covered by the bill of sale were partnership goods, and that the grantor, not being the "true owner" within the meaning of section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, of either the whole or a moiety of the partnership property, the bill of sale was wholly invalid.

The bill of sale holder now appealed from the order of the county court judge setting aside the bill of sale.

Bigham, Q.C., and Glascodyne, for the bill of sale holder.—The trustee alleges that the two bankrupts were partners, and that the goods were partnership goods. But there is no evidence that the goods specified in the bill of sale were partnership goods; and further, even if they were, the bankrupts and their trustee in bankruptcy would be estopped from setting up any such defence. Both the bankrupts were aware that the money was being lent on these goods for partnership purposes.

Channell, Q.C., and Benson, for the trustee in bankruptcy.—There is ample evidence that the goods were partnership property. There can be no possible doubt as to a partnership having existed between the bankrupts, and there is nothing to show that it did not include these goods, as the county court judge has found. The moment you arrive at the fact that the goods were partnership property you come to the Bills of Sale Acts. Section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, provides that a bill of sale shall be void, except as against the grantor, in respect of any personal chattels specifically described in the schedule thereto of which the grantor was not the "true owner" at the time of the execution of the bill of sale. Apart from the Act, the bill of sale being executed by one partner with the consent of the other for the benefit of the partnership would probably be good, but under the Act the grantor was not the "true owner" at the time of the execution of this bill of sale. [A. L. SMITH, J.—Was he not the true owner of an undivided moiety?] He was only owner of a share. He was not the "true owner" of the goods.

They referred to Ex parte Owen, In re Bowers, 20 L. J. Bkcy. 14; Skipp v. Harwood, 2 Swanst. 586; Tuck v. Southern Counties Deposit Bank, 37 W. R. 769, 42 Ch. D. 471.

Glascodyne, in reply, referred to Fox v. Hanbury, Cowp. 445; Fennings v. Lord Grenville, 1 Taunt. 241; Richards v. Johnston, 4 H. & N. 660, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 13; Richards v. Jenkins, 35 W. R. 355, 18 Q. B. D. 451.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the order of the county court judge should be modified. The two bankrupts appear to have been carrying on business together as butchers, and were made bankrupt in that business. The business was begun by the father in 1884, and the son joined him in 1885. In 1888 they were in want of money, and thereupon the father applied to the appellant to advance money on a bill of sale, and a bill of sale was prepared by which certain property, alleged to be partnership property, was charged with the repayment of £69 borrowed by the father.

Now the first contention raised was that there was not, in fact, a partnership between the father and the son, or, if so, that it did not extend to the goods which were the subject of the bill of sale. We have had great difficulty in ascertaining what really took place before the county court judge. Undoubtedly no one is at liberty to stand by and not take a point in the court below and then come and take it in the court of appeal, when if it had been gone into in the court below evidence could have been given to meet it. In the present case I hardly think the point was taken with the particularity necessary in cases of this kind. It is not sufficient to say merely that such a point is taken, leaving the court to find out the ground on which it was taken, and leaving counsel on the other side to see how he can meet it. When the objection is taken it should be taken before the court and argued, and not reserved for the court of appeal. It must be taken and argued, and the points supporting it must be brought to the knowledge of the judge and the counsel on the other side. I can quite understand how, in the present case, this contention was shortly passed over in the court below. The county court judge had come to the conclusion in another case that there was a partnership, and that these goods were partnership property, and when he came to consider this case he would have in his mind the facts previously before him, and counsel who knew that would not deal so strongly with the case. I think there are circumstances here which would justify the court in coming to the conclusion that there was a partnership. Two points are important on that head—first, that when, in 1885, the son joined the father, the father and son joined in mortgaging some property in order to raise money to put it into the firm; and, secondly, that in 1886 bills were printed the heading of which showed that the business was carried on in partnership. If those facts were made out they would justify the county court judge in saying that there was a partnership, and that this property was partnership property. The evidence of the bankrupts themselves is of no value, and I can quite understand the court placing no reliance on it.

The contention that there was no partnership therefore fails, and that point failing, it is admitted by the respondent that by the common law, and apart from the Bills of Sale Acts, the bill of sale holder would have a good title here. Two partners want money for partnership purposes, and agree to raise this money by mortgaging property to the bill of sale holder, and mortgaging it by holding out that the property was the sole property of the elder. That, it is admitted, apart from the Bills of Sale Acts, would give the grantee of the bill of sale a good title as to the whole. It is not necessary to deal with the doctrine of estoppel at all, because it is a fact that the younger, being a partner, did assent to the bill of sale to raise money for partnership purposes, and that would be strong evidence of authority from him to the elder bankrupt to execute the bill of sale and transfer the joint property to Barnett, and that being so, would be sufficient to give Barnett a good title if the matter had stood at common law.

But the respondent relies upon section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which provides that a bill of sale shall be void, except as against the grantor, in respect of any personal chattels specifically described in the schedule thereto of which the grantor was not the "true owner" at the time of the execution of the bill of sale. The marginal note to that section shows that what was in the mind of the Legislature at the time when it was passed was that a bill of sale shall not affect after-acquired property, but the words of the section are general, and are wide enough to include a case like the present. Then comes the main question in this case—namely, what is the meaning of that section, and to what extent it applies where one of two partners executes a bill of sale of partnership property purporting to convey not his moiety, but the whole of it. I cannot agree that it does empower the owner of any share of the partnership property, however small, to execute a bill of sale of the whole of the partnership property which shall be good under this section against the trustee and the creditors. I think that in section 5 the words "true owner" are used in their natural and not in an artificial meaning. They mean what an ordinary man would understand by them—namely, that a man must at the time be the true owner of the goods he purports to convey. I do not think it follows that because he is the true owner subject to a lien or some equitable right he ceases to be the "true owner" since the words are used in the popular sense. I do not think the existence of a right of that kind prevents the true owner parting with his interest, and that is very much the condition of a partner. The two partners are in want of money for partnership purposes, and if the two partners joined, the bill of sale would be good, and it seems in the same way in the present case, the elder partner is within the meaning of the section the true owner of his moiety, and the younger the true owner of his moiety. If the elder had been conveying his moiety for the purpose of raising money for his own purposes it might be the conveyance of his moiety subject to some equitable right. But nothing of that kind arises here. This was a conveyance by the elder, of the whole, and so of his half, with the intention, both of him and his son, that the conveyance should be an absolute one, and when one alone conveys, even though he conveys the whole, he is still the true owner of his own moiety, though not the true owner of the other moiety. It is no doubt very desirable that the person who is the grantor should be the true owner of the things conveyed, and if a man should give a bill of sale in a name not his own, and put forward some other person as being the owner, section 5 would not be complied with. But where, as here, there are two true owners each the owner of a moiety, when one conveys the whole, so far as the moiety is concerned he is the true owner of that moiety, though not the owner of the other part. The county court judge was therefore wrong in ordering Barnett to pay back the whole of the money, and the proper order would have been that he should retain one-half, and pay over to the trustee the other half.

A. L. Smith, J.—I entirely agree that there was a partnership formed in 1885, and that the goods specified in the bill of sale were partnership property. That being so, the trustee contends that the bill of sale is in toto void by reason of section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. The question is what is the meaning of the words "true owner" in that section. Now supposing, in a case where there are two partners, one partner becomes an execution debtor, what steps can the sheriff take on the part of the execution creditor? The law is that the sheriff goes in and seizes the undivided moiety of that partner. When he proceeds to sell he puts the vendee as tenant in common with the solvent partner and leaves him to find out his own rights. The sheriff goes in at first and seizes the undivided moiety of the debtor partner. That seems pretty clear from Holmes v. Mentze, 4 A. & E., p. 131. Here apart from the agreement the elder bankrupt had an undivided moiety in this partnership property, and he was the true owner of that undivided moiety within section 5 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

Order varied accordingly.

Kennedy v. Lyell. (a.)

Limitations, Statute of—Action to recover land—Possession—Agent—Trustee—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, ss. 2, 3, 8, 9, 14, 34—37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, s. 1—Evidence—Pedigree—Parish registers—Res inter alios actæ.

D. was devisee in fee of certain hereditaments let to yearly and weekly tenants under the will of L. B., who died in 1859. D. and K. were executors of that will, but as such had no interest in the property in question. K., by arrangement, managed this property in the name of "the executors of L. B.," gave receipts for rents, and paid them into an account so entitled. D. died in 1867, intestate as to this property, but no change was made in the management of the property. K. frequently acknowledged that he was acting for D.'s heir down to 1880, when he claimed to be in receipt of the rents and profits for himself.

L., the assignee of the co-heiresses of D., brought this action in 1881 against K. to recover possession of the land, and for an account of the rents and profits.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 35 W. R. 725, 18 Q. B. D. 796) that K. was an agent, whose acts were ratified by bringing this action; that he was never in actual possession, which was in the heirs; that the rents were received in a fiduciary character; and, consequently, that, subject to the existing tenancies and all just allowances, the plaintiff L. was entitled to the judgment claimed.

Scottish parochial registers and certified extracts from them are receivable in evidence in England.

Proceedings in the Sheriff's Court in Scotland held admissible in questions of pedigree.

Appeal and cross-appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), 35 W. R. 725, 18 Q. B. D. 796, where the facts are given at length.

The action was commenced on January 4, 1881, to recover a mill and factory and about seventy workmen's cottages at Manchester, and for mesne profits.

Ann Duncan took the property in question as devisee of Lawrence Buchan, her maternal uncle, who died on July 21, 1859. She and the respondent Kennedy were executrix and executor of Buchan's will. Kennedy gratuitously managed the property for Miss Duncan, received the rents, and carried them to an account at a bank in the name of "the executors of Lawrence Buchan."

At Ann Duncan's death, in November, 1867, the property was let to tenants, one annual, and the others weekly, without writing.

Miss Duncan, having left a will disposing only of her Scotch real estate, advertisements for her heirs were issued, and in England actions were brought against Kennedy. After her death, and until 1880, Kennedy continued to manage the property, giving receipts and paying in the rents as before, the tenants not apparently being informed of her death. Kennedy had stated that he was acting for the heir, and that he was ready to account to him as soon as he was ascertained. In 1880 Kennedy claimed to be in receipt of the rents and profits for himself.

By deed dated December 24, 1880, three sisters, E. Bradock (widow) and C. and J. Cuningham (unmarried), alleged to be the co-heiresses of Ann Duncan, assigned their interest to the appellant Lyell, who brought this action, and, in support of this claim, gave evidence of their pedigree.

Kennedy relied on the Statute of Limitations, and he also now set up a title of his own as assignee of a person who, he alleged, was the true heir of Miss Duncan.

At the trial before Stephen, J., without a jury, in June, 1886, judgment was given for the appellant, it being found that the three sisters were the co-heiresses of Ann Duncan, and that the Statutes of Limitations were no bar.

If the three sisters were Ann Duncan's heirs (Mrs. Bradock being under disability of coverture till 1877) the Statute of Limitations did not apply as to one-third.

The Court of Appeal were of opinion that the three sisters were Ann Duncan's heirs, but that the Statute of Limitations applied as to two-thirds, and gave judgment accordingly.

The appeal which raised the question of the Statute of Limitations was heard first.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Smyly, for the respondent.—The old law as to adverse possession is swept away, and we have merely to consider the interpretation of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27. Agency is only created by contract or ratification; until ratification there is no agency, and the statute may have run in the interval. (1) By receipt of profits for twelve years action is barred; (2) There is no acknowledgment to save the bar, except under section 14; (3) Agency must be by contract or ratification; (4) There can be no ratification unless within statutory period. A mere statement of a legal fact does not alter the case. Kennedy had no answer for twelve years to the heir. Agency, as a fact, discontinued at Ann Duncan's death.

The House took time for consideration.

The cross-appeal was then heard, and involved questions of pedigree, and the admissibility of evidence thereon, which will be found treated at length in the judgment of the Earl of Selborne.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., and Rigby, Q.C. (A. T. Lawrence and Robert Wallace with them), for the respondent in the cross-appeal.—The rules of hearsay evidence are different in Scotland, and the registers of Dissenters are admissible there. In England the entries in the official registers, to be admissible, must be made by the regular custodian. There is no evidence to show these registers are properly kept or kept by the ministers: see Taylor on Evidence, 8th ed., ss. 1591-5, 1774; Doe v. Bray, 8 B. & C. 813; Davies v. Gatacre, 8 Car. & P. 578. There are no signed admissions in this case, and the proceedings in Sheriff's Court are res inter alios actæ.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Earl of Selborne.—The question first in order in this case is that of title, raised by the cross-appeal. I shall throughout speak of Dr. Lyell as appellant and of Mr. Kennedy as respondent, though, in the cross-appeal, those positions are reversed.

I do not think that all the evidence which the courts below thought inadmissible (though, in the court of first instance, it was received de bene esse, and its effect was considered) ought to be rejected. Foreign registers of baptisms and marriages, or certified extracts from them, are receivable in evidence in the courts of this country, as to those matters which are properly and regularly recorded in them, when it sufficiently appears (in the words of Mr. Hubback's learned work on Evidence) that they "have been kept under the sanction of public authority, and are recognized by the tribunals of the country" (i.e., of the country where they are kept) "as authentic records."

I am of opinion that this does sufficiently appear, as to the Scottish parochial registers, speaking generally, from Mr. Dickson's work, from Mr. Bell's Principles, and from the admission of registers, exactly like those now in question, by this House in the Airth Peerage and other cases (see Hubback, pp. 519, 526). Certified extracts from Scottish parochial registers have been produced in this case from the General Register Office in Scotland, where they are now kept, under the statutes 17 & 18 Vict. c. 80, 18 Vict. c. 29, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 85. Those statutes do not make anything evidence, either here or in Scotland, which without them would not have been so. But if your lordships may act upon that judicial knowledge of Scottish law which you possess, as the court of ultimate appeal from all parts of the United Kingdom (and within my experience you have so acted upon your knowledge of English law, when questions of English law have arisen in Scotch appeals), it is certain that these registers would be receivable in Scotland, subject to just exceptions as to particular entries in them, as parochial registers kept under the sanction of public authority, for whatever they may be worth; anything imperfect or unsatisfactory in the way in which they were generally kept affecting only their weight in re dubia, and not their admissibility.

Nor do I think it less certain that they were kept in Scotland under public authority, from a time not later than the first half of the seventeenth century, because there is some obscurity about the origin of the legal obligation to keep them. Entries of matters not properly finding place in the particular registers (as, for instance, the entry of a baptism in the parish of St. Madoes in the register of births and baptisms for the parish of Kinfauns, which is among the extracts tendered in the present case) may be properly rejected, although entries appearing to have been regularly made in the proper registers may be received. The interests of justice would not be promoted if such evidence as this, receivable in Scotland, could not be received in England, in a question of Scotch pedigree, relating to persons and families always resident and domiciled in Scotland. If the law were so, it must prevail; but I am glad to be able to come to the conclusion that it is not so. For the decision of that question the courts below had not equal advantages with your lordships; though, for my own part, I think it might have been possible to come to the same conclusion on Mr. Ritchie's evidence, referring, as he did, to Mr. Dickson's books as of authority in Scotland.

With respect to the proceedings in 1766 in the sheriff's court of Perthshire (which were produced from the proper custody), I consider them also admissible, on the same principle on which answers and decrees in chancery have been admitted by this House in peerage cases as to matters of pedigree, "when the facts of the pedigree were not in dispute, but only incidentally stated" (Phillips on Evidence, vol. 1, 8th ed., p. 232; Hubback, p. 682). This has been done since as much as before the opinion of the judges in the Bambury Peerage case, 2 Selw. N. P., 10th ed., p. 756, with which, and with the judgment in Boileau v. Rutlin, L. R. 2 Ex. 665, it does not seem to me inconsistent. The question in those cases was as to statements in bills; and the latter case was not one of pedigree. In the Shrewsbury Peerage case, 7 H. L. Cas. 33, this House received an Irish answer as to matter of pedigree, though the answer was without oath or signature; Lord Wensleydale (the same judge who decided Boileau v. Rutlin) saying:—"It" (the answer) "must be received as the statement of the party making it; and, being found on the files of the court, it must be presumed that it got there by proper authority." To make an answer evidence, the bill to which it was an answer must always be put in; but the bill itself is not evidence, unless made so by the answer.

In the present case I regard the notarial protest of 1764, and the proceedings in the sheriff's court in 1766, as admissible for the purpose (and only for the purpose) of showing that at that time when there was no question of pedigree in dispute, one James Martin, described as "in Cottarstown of Pitfour," was sued by the Duke of Athol (claiming by assignment from Lady George Murray, of Glencarse) as representative, by right or by wrong, of one Elspeth Duncan, described as "late in Glencarse and afterwards in dwelling in Perth," upon a bill of exchange accepted by that Elspeth Duncan in 1764 for arrears of rent in Glencarse, due by her to Lady George Murray; and that James Martin (not disputing any of those matters), by his defence in the last stage of those proceedings, spoke of that Elspeth Duncan as his mother; and that a decree passed against him for the amount claimed, on proof of service of summons upon him in Cottarstown, the validity of which service he did not, in the subsequent proceedings, call in question.

It was urged that, to make the statement of that James Martin (that Elspeth Duncan was his mother) evidence in favour of the pedigree set up by the respondent, it was necessary, by evidence aliunde, to connect him or his mother with the family of George Duncan, of Waltree; and to this I agree. But all that was necessary, in my opinion, was to give such primâ facie evidence of that connection as might be sufficient, if not met by evidence on the other side. This, I think, the respondent did, by proof aliunde of the marriage of Elspeth, daughter of George Duncan, of Waltree, to John Martin, of the Mill of Glencarse, on the 1st of November, 1728, and of the baptism of James, son of John Martin, of Glencarse, on the 24th of August, 1729, little more than nine months after that marriage. If the matter had stood upon the respondent's evidence only, I should probably have thought the agreement of names and descriptions in the protest and proceedings of 1766 enough to show the identity of the Elspeth of those proceedings with the daughter of George Duncan, of Waltree, and of the James Martin of those proceedings with the person of that name baptized in 1729.

That, however, is not the state of the evidence before your lordships; and I proceed (treating the respondent's evidence, with some exceptions not necessary to be particularly mentioned, as admissible) to consider its value and effect in conjunction with that on the other side.

The appellant proved that there were in and near Perth many Duncans and Martins, and not unfrequently the names Elspeth Duncan and James Martin; many Dowies also, of whom a John and George, "fleshers in Perth," were son-in-law and grandson of George Duncan, of Waltree, and another John and George Dowie (also fleshers in Perth, and father and son, the son baptized in 1723) might also have been living in 1766. The parishes of Kinfauns and St. Madoes, in that neighbourhood, adjoin each other—Glencarse is in Kinfauns; Pitfour, with its hamlet of Cottoun, or Cottarstown, is in St. Madoes. An Elspeth Duncan, "daughter of Patrick Duncan, of Cottoun, in Pitfour," was baptized in St. Madoes parish on the 20th of July, 1703. There is nothing to show that she intermarried, or lived as married, with a person named Martin, or had a son called James Martin; if, however, she had such a son, it would be consistent with the whole evidence that he might have been the defender in the Duke of Athol's suit. In Scotland marriage may be irregular as well as regular; if irregular, it would not be likely to be registered; and the parochial registers, both of marriages and of baptisms, were too loosely kept to give weight to any presumption from their silence. It does not appear that John Martin, the miller of Glencarse, ever held land under Lady George Murray; or that Elspeth Duncan, named in the notarial protest of 1764, lived at the mill of Glencarse. As to the Dowies, the only relation between them and Elspeth Duncan, mentioned in the proceedings of 1766, was that of debtor and creditor. The residence in Cottoun, in 1766, of a son of Elspeth, who was a native of Cottoun, might, perhaps, be more probable than that of the son of the miller of Glencarse; at all events, it would be as likely that an Elspeth Duncan, born in Cottoun, might have lived for a time and held land in Glencarse, as that the son of the miller of Glencarse should, when thirty-seven years old, be found living in Cottoun. I do not think there is any force in the appellant's argument from Elspeth Duncan, the miller's wife, not being named in her mother's will, dated the 17th of August, 1747.

I have endeavoured to give due weight to all these considerations, which show that it is possible that James Martin, the defender to the Duke of Athol's suit, may not have been the grandson of George Duncan, of Waltree; and, after having done so, I still think it probable that, if it were necessary to decide that point, my opinion upon it would not be against the respondent. But this would do the respondent no good, unless he could also identify with that James Martin the person of the same name who married Mary Ducat in 1771, or could otherwise connect the husband of Mary Ducat with the family of George Duncan, of Waltree. He has not attempted any other mode of connection; and for the identification of Mary Ducat's husband with the defender to the Duke of Athol's suit, he relies only on the St. Madoes baptismal register of 1772, decribing James Martin and Mary Ducat, the parents of Christian Martin, then baptized as "in Cottoun." From this, the inference is sought to be drawn, that James Martin, the father of Christian, was the party to the proceedings of 1766; which, if proved, would be subject to the question already discussed as to the family to which the James Martin of those proceedings really belonged. But the identity of the James Martin who married Mary Ducat with that person cannot be shown by the mere fact that the one in 1766 and the other in 1772 were described as "in Cottarstown" or "in Cottoun." It is proved that there were at least two other persons named James Martin baptized in the parish of St. Madoes, in which Cottoun is situate, in 1733 and 1746 respectively; either of whom, for anything that appears, may have been living in Cottoun in 1772, and may have married Mary Ducat in 1771.

If the case rested there the cross-appeal would, in my opinion, fail; but, besides this, there are weighty grounds for the conclusion that the persons whom the respondent has so failed to connect by satisfactory evidence with the family of George Duncan, of Waltree, were really not related to that family. There was neither knowledge nor reputation of such relationship in the line represented by these persons; nor was there on the part of Ann Duncan. Ann Duncan was living in Perth down to 1836; and Christian, the daughter of that James Martin who married Mary Ducat, and her descendants, also lived there or in the immediate neighbourhood. The relationship, if there had been any, was not so distant as to be likely to be forgotten; and, if Ann Duncan was in better circumstances than her supposed relations, it was all the more likely to be remembered and talked about, at least on their part. She was nearly of the same age with John Moneur, son of Christian Martin, baptized in 1772, who lived in Perth at the same time with herself, in the respectable position of rector of the academy there, and died in circumstances which attracted public notice. In the course of the numerous suits relating to the succession of Ann Duncan, advertisements for the discovery of her relatives were repeatedly published in the local and other papers, and the searches and inquiries for them (particularly those of the respondent and his agents) were so exhaustive and unremitting as to make it clear, with more than usual certainty, that everything which was possible has been discovered concerning her family. Under those circumstances I agree with the conclusion of the courts below, that the respondent's case in the cross-appeal fails, and that the title of the co-parceners in the Cunningham line, under whom the appellant claims, has been sufficiently made out, a conclusion at which it is, to me at all events, much more satisfactory to arrive, after admitting and considering the weight of the respondent's evidence generally, than it would have been if I had found myself obliged to exclude it.

Then there arises the question raised by the first appeal, of the Statute of Limitations, as to which Stephen, J.'s judgment in favour of the appellant has been reversed, as to two-thirds of the property claimed, by the Court of Appeal. The action was brought on the 4th of January, 1881, and if the appellant is entitled to say that, down to a time less than twelve years before that date, the rents of the property at Manchester were received by the respondent as agent, bailiff, receiver, or trustee for the heirs-at-law of Ann Duncan, it appears to me to follow that the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, is no bar, either as to the land, which has been, ever since Ann Duncan's death, in the possession of tenants from year to year whose rent has been regularly paid, or as to the rents and profits which the respondent received.

Ann Duncan was entitled at law in fee simple, for her own absolute use and benefit, to the property in question, under the will of a testator named Lawrence Buchan, who died in July, 1859. She and the respondent were executors of that will; but, as such executors, they had neither interest in, nor duty with respect to, the English real estate. Ann Duncan, however, lived in Fifeshire, and the respondent lived at or near Manchester, and by arrangement between them for her convenience, the respondent managed that property in the name of "the executors of Lawrence Buchan," under which designation he received and gave acknowledgments for the rents paid by the tenants, and paid them into an account, so entitled, kept by him with bankers at Manchester, separate and apart from his own private and personal account. That designation and that form of account (though the land was vested in Ann Duncan alone, and not in Lawrence Buchan's executors), was indicative of some sort of trust; it was certainly not indicative of a personal right, claim, or interest on the part of the respondent.

After the death of Ann Duncan, on the 5th of November, 1867, no break or change was made in that course of management. Ann Duncan left a will, in Scotch form, as to her personal estate only; of that will a gentleman named John Todd was executor. It was part of his duty to ascertain the persons entitled to her undisposed of personalty, who would be sought for, according to Scotch law, preferably in the paternal line; and, though Mr. Todd, as executor, had no duty to perform as to the English real estate, it appears, from what is stated in the letter of Messrs. Drummond & Nicholson (Mr. Todd's solicitors at Edinburgh) of the 2nd of December, 1867, to the respondent, and not denied or disputed in the reply of the respondent's solicitors, Messrs. Earle, dated the 11th of December following, that he took sufficient interest in the care and management of the English real estate to communicate on that subject with the respondent; and that the respondent "promised him to look after the English estates." The course of management which had been established in Ann Duncan's lifetime enabled the respondent to go on receiving the rents as before, and he did so. The tenants paid him on the same footing as before; it does not appear that they were aware of Ann Duncan's death; the probable inference from the facts in evidence appears to me to be that they were not. Receipts continued to be given by the respondent, as for "the executors of Lawrence Buchan"; and the rents continued to be paid by him to the separate account with the bankers, entitled as the account of those executors.

For whom, and on whose behalf, were those rents received after Ann Duncan's death? Not by the respondent for himself, or on his own behalf, any more than during her lifetime. He knew, and down to 1880 frequently acknowledged, that they belonged to her heirs. He was, indeed, disappointed that she had not made a will in his favour; but to me it is clear that he knew there was no such will. Taking upon himself so to receive the rents of property which to his knowledge belonged to others, though to persons unascertained, and whom it might take time to ascertain—a circumstance which disabled them from looking after their own interests—I should have said, if there had been no authority, that he was chargeable in a fiduciary character with the rents which he received; just as I should have said the same thing of any solicitor or other agent receiving rents under a power of attorney, and continuing to receive them after the death of his client or principal; the tenants being ignorant of the revocation, and taking receipts as before from the attorney. These are questions of fact and of equity, unaffected by anything to be found in any Statute of Limitations.

The respondent's acts, in so receiving the rents, could not, in my opinion, dispossess the heirs of Ann Duncan, so as to put them to their action, either under the 2nd and 3rd, or under the 8th section of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27. If he received on behalf of the heirs, and if they could and did adopt and ratify his agency, they were in, and never out of, possession. I find nothing in the statute to displace or disturb, under such circumstances, the actual possession by their tenants, which (apart from the effect of the statute in the cases to which it applies) the law would ascribe to them, according to Bushby v. Dixon and other authorities. The respondent had no title to the land; he was never in actual possession of it; and, until he claimed a right to change his position, and to be in receipt of the rents and profits as for himself (which he never did till 1880) I do not see how there could be a right of action against him for recovery of that land. How the matter stood as to the rents which he received I shall presently consider.

Lord Coke's doctrine as to the effect of entry by an unauthorized stranger on behalf of the true owner seems to me applicable, in reason and principle, to such a receipt of rents as that of the respondent in this case down to 1880. "If an infant, or any man of full age, have a right of entry into any lands, any stranger, in the name and to the use of the infant or man of full age, may enter into the lands; and this regularly shall vest the lands in them, without any commandment, precedent, or agreement subsequent" (Co. Litt. 258a.). The law in this case vested not only the lands, but the actual possession of them, in the heirs, unless something was done to displace or interrupt that possession; and that which, in the case of entry, would have the effect ascribed by Lord Coke to the act of a stranger in the name and to the use of the true owner, could not (as it seems to me), in the case of receipt of rents, put the true owner to his action under the statute; but must, on the contrary, operate to confirm and strengthen his legal possession. If there was no interruption of the legal possession of the land by the true owner for more than twelve years before action brought, no acknowledgment under the 14th section of the statute was necessary.

As to the rents and profits received by the respondent, and the accumulated fund which arose from them in the banker's hands, there was a series of declarations, oral and in writing, by the respondent, sufficient in my judgment to establish against him, by his own admission, a fiduciary character. A man who receives the money of another on his behalf, and places it specifically to an account with a banker earmarked and separate from his own moneys, though under his control, is in my opinion a trustee of the fund standing to the credit of that account. For the constitution of such a trust no express words are necessary; anything which may satisfy a court of equity that the money was received in a fiduciary character is enough. It is not requisite that any acknowledgment of such a trust should be made to the cestui que trust or his agent; to whomsoever made it is evidence against the trustee.

Of the respondent's declarations in the present case I will mention some. On the 15th of January, 1869, in reply to a letter from the appellant, who then asserted that he was Ann Duncan's heir (which in fact he was not) the respondent wrote: "I am in receipt of your letter, and can assure you that, if you are Miss Duncan's heir, you will have no difficulty with me. Messrs. Drummond & Nicholson have all the particulars of Miss Duncan's estate, and the rents are all placed in bank as they accrue, and regular accounts kept." Again, on the 18th of the same month: "As an old friend of Miss Duncan's and Mr. Buchan's, I should advise those concerned to avoid litigation as much as possible. The property will be given up to the rightful owners as soon as it can be satisfactorily settled who they are." In the same month the respondent saw Colonel Tulloch, who deposes: "When I spoke with him about Mr. Lyell's claim to the property, Mr. Kennedy said: 'Don't let him make any fuss or claim on the tenants, or the whole thing will go to ruin. I am taking care of the place for the heir, whoever he may be.' He handed me a large book of account and several other books which he said were all in order for examination when the heir, whoever he might be, turned up. He said, 'Leave everything in my hands'; and 'I will take care of everything till the right heir turns up; everything is safe in my hands.'" In February, 1870, the defendant wrote to Messrs. Drummond & Nicholson: "When the claimants to Miss Duncan's estate are ascertained, the property will be found in good repair, the money ready, and the accounts in order." In 1872 (within twelve years of the commencemet of this action) he made claims against Ann Duncan's personal estate in the Scotch administration suit, on the footing of his being manager of this property after her death, and those claims were partly allowed. On the 16th of April in that year he wrote to Mr. Buchan, of Toronto (a relative of Ann Duncan, and a possible heir): "I am acting for the heir-at-law whoever he may be. . . . I claim, on the part of the heir-at-law, that the repairs on the mill property should be charged on the personal property."

It was suggested in argument for the respondent that all this might be explained by his legal liability for rents received by him until the statute had run. But (not to insist on his letter of the 29th of October, 1879, in which he assented to the proposition that he was not capable of setting up the Statute of Limitations against the parties entitled to the property) the declaration to Colonel Tulloch, and the letter of the 16th of April, 1872 (with which all his other letters and acts down to 1880 were consistent), appear to me to repel that explanation.

In order to test the effect in equity of these acts and declarations of the respondent, I will suppose the case of his having become bankrupt at any time before 1880. Would the accumulated fund which had arisen from the rents received after Ann Duncan's death, and was standing to the account of "the executors of Lawrence Buchan," or any part of it, have passed to the respondent's trustee in bankruptcy, as against a claim by Ann Duncan's heirs-at-law? The account was earmarked; none of the moneys credited to it were, or had ever been, the property of the respondent; it did not stand in his name; it was under a title, both primâ facie and when explained by tracing it to its origin, significant of trust. I am of opinion that such an account, even if it had stood in his name, would be within the principle of Pennell v. Deffell, 1 W. R. 499, 4 De G. M. & G. 381; and that no part of it, neither that part received more than six years before the bankruptcy, nor what was received since, would have passed in the case supposed to the respondent's trustee in bankruptcy.

No authority was cited for the respondent to show that he was not chargeable in a fiduciary character under these circumstances, or that as long as he acted as agent and receiver for the heirs (though unascertained) any Statute of Limitations would run against them in his favour. In the absence of authority, I should have been content to decide such a case on principle, but for the principle which I consider applicable to it, Rackham v. Siddall and its sequel, Life Assurance Society of Scotland v. Siddall, 9 W. R. 541, 3 De G. F. & J. 69, seem to me to be authorities as high as any can be, short of a decision of this House. The principle of those decisions, as stated by Turner, L.J., in the latter case, was that a person who had assumed to be a trustee "could not be heard to say, for his own benefit, that he had no right to act as a trustee." Mr. Lewin, in his learned and accurate treatise upon the Law of Trusts, thus puts it (7th ed., p. 191): "If a person, by mistake or otherwise, assume the character of a trustee when it really does not belong to him, and so becomes a trustee de son tort, he may be called to account by the cestuis que trust for the moneys he received under colour of the trust."

Other authorities were cited by the appellant's counsel at your lordships' bar, which, though not decisions, have the weight due to opinions of eminent judges, reasonable in themselves and with nothing against them. In Gawton v. Lord Dacres, 1 Leon. 219, Anderson, J., said, "If one become my bailiff of his own wrong, without my appointment, he is accountable to me." In Shaw v. Keighron, Ir. Rep. 3 Eq. 574, Walsh, Master of the Rolls of Ireland (that case being under the 9th section of the Statute of Limitations), said, "I think it is necessary to go beyond the mere circumstance that someone not entitled to the rent has received and kept it. The section requires not only that the rent should have been received by a person other than the person rightfully entitled, but that it should have been received under some claim of title, and that a wrongful one. For example, if rent were received by a person falsely pretending to be agent to the rightful owner, who never accounted for it, this would not bar the rightful owner. The mere fact that the rent was received and kept by a person other than the right owner no doubt raises a presumption that it was received under a wrongful claim of title; but this is only a presumption, and may be negatived by the circumstances." Under the 9th section, a lessee for years, paying rent to a person "wrongfully claiming to be entitled," is supposed to be in possession: and a title can only be acquired against the true owner by a wrongful receipt of rents. The same words are not elsewhere used; but I am of opinion that what was said by the learned judge is equally true of any other case in which the statute is set up as a bar to the true owner by virtue only of the receipt of rent from tenants in possession. I think that such receipt of rent, in order to exclude the true owner, must always be by a person wrongfully claiming, and not receiving, or claiming a right to receive, on behalf of the true owner. When the true owner can and does ratify an agency undertaken on his behalf, though without his antecedent authority, the case is the same as if he had himself received the rents.

It is unnecessary to consider how the matter would stand, towards either the self-constituted agent or the tenants who paid rent to him, if the agency were (as it might be) repudiated. The true owner must either approbate or reprobate, he cannot do both. That, as was said of the option of a cestui que trust to take to or reject an improper mode of dealing with trust moneys by a trustee in Pennell v. Deffell, is a different matter, with which your lordships have not now to deal. Here the agency has been ratified, if when the action was brought it was capable of ratification, as in my opinion, it was.

The Court of Appeal seems to have considered that in a case in which the assumed agency for the management and receipt of the rents and profits of land was unauthorized by the true owner, it must be adopted and ratified within twelve years from its commencement; and that, otherwise, the true owner would be barred under the 8th section of the statute, as if no rent at all had been received during those years from the tenants (in this case tenants from year to year) in respect of their tenancies. These propositions appear to me to assume the main question as to the statute running during the continuance of the self-constituted agency between the true owner and the person taking upon himself to act as agent. I find nothing to support them in the Statute of Limitations itself; and I do not think them well founded in principle. It is enough, in my judgment, if the agency is ratified within such a time as is reasonable under the circumstances between the true owner and the assumed agent. In this case the ratification took place as soon as was reasonably possible after the co-heiresses had been ascertained, and hardly more than a year after the last of an uninterrupted series of acts by the respondent upon the footing of agency. That, in my opinion, was enough. The present question is not with the tenants; they have regularly paid rent in respect of their tenancies, and they cannot have any claim, under the 8th or any other section of the statute, against the reversioner, if he is entitled to take and does take, the benefit of their payments. Whether he is or is not entitled, as against the respondent, to an account of those rents and to receive future rents, is a question with which the tenants (so long as they are protected against a double claim) have no concern. There is not here a jus tertii complete before ratification, as there was in Lord Audley v. Pollard, Cro. Eliz. 561, and Bird v. Brown, L. R. 4 Ex. 786. Those cases are good law, but I think them inapplicable to a question between the self-constituted agent and the ratifying principal.

I am not sure that the form of Stephen, J.'s order, so far as relates to the recovery of the possession of the land, may not require amendment so as to show that the possession to be recovered by the appellant is subject to the existing tenancies; and I think that in taking the account directed, all just allowances must be made to the respondent. That would be the rule in equity (which, since the Judicature Acts must prevail), however the case might have stood in the old action of account at law. Subject to such formal variation, I think that the order of Stephen, J., was right, and ought to be, in substance, restored; and that the respondent ought to pay all the costs of this litigation, which, in my opinion, nothing but the controversy as to the true heirship to Ann Duncan could at all excuse.

I therefore move your lordships to declare that the recovery of possession adjudged to the plaintiff Lyell is to be subject to the existing tenancies, and that in taking the account directed, all just allowances are to be made to the defendant Kennedy; and with that declaration to reverse the order of the Court of Appeal and restore the order of Stephen, J., and dismiss the appeal of the defendant Kennedy with costs; the defendant Kennedy to pay all costs here and in the courts below.

Lord Fitzgerald.—I have read with care and studied the judgment which has just been delivered, expressed in such carefully considered and measured language by the noble and learned earl, and I entirely concur with that judgment and with its conclusions. I have nothing to add, save this, that the judgment expresses the conclusions at which I, speaking for myself personally, had arrived at the close of the full and lengthened hearing of this cause at your lordships' bar, after listening to, and having had a full opportunity of considering in the course of the case the very learned argument addressed to us, an argument so learned, so full, and so elaborate as to leave nothing to be desired.

Lord Macnaghten.—I, too, have had the advantage of reading and considering the opinion of the noble and learned earl on the appeal and cross-appeal. I desire to say that I entirely concur in that opinion.

I would only venture to add, with regard to the appeal, that it seems to me that the principle which must govern the case may be stated concisely in the words of the late Giffard, L.J. In Burdick v. Garrick, 18 W. R. 387, L. R. 5 Ch. 233, that learned judge expressed himself as follows:—"I do not hesitate to say that when the duty of persons is to receive property and hold it for another, and to keep it until it is called for, they cannot discharge themselves from that trust by appealing to the lapse of time. They can only discharge themselves by handing over that property to somebody entitled to it."

I think that is a sound proposition. I do not think it can make any difference what the nature of the property may be, whether it is a lump sum or whether it is collected in the shape of rents accruing from time to time. I do not think it can make any difference whether the person on whose behalf the property is professedly received is or is not under disability or unborn or unascertained. Nor do I think it can make any difference whether the duty arises from contract or previous request, or whether it is self-imposed and undertaken without any authority whatever. If it is established that the duty has in fact been undertaken, and that property has been received, by a person assuming to act in a fiduciary and representative character, the same consequences must, I think, in every case follow.

Lord Halsbury, C.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of the learned and noble earl, and only desire to say that I entirely concur, both with the conclusions he has arrived at, and with the reasons by which he has arrived at them.

Order appealed from reversed, and order of Stephen, J., restored, subject to a declaration.

The cross-appeal of the defendant Kennedy dismissed, with costs; the defendant Kennedy to pay all costs here and in the courts below.

VIBART v. COLES. (a.)

Administration — Preference of one simple contract creditor of intestate to another—Conflict of rules of law and equity—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25 (11).

After action brought against an administrator by a creditor of the intestate, the administrator paid another creditor in full, and pleaded that he had no assets out of which to satisfy the debt.

Held, that this was a good answer to the action.

Appeal from the decision of Bowen, L.J.

The action was brought against an administratrix to recover a sum of money lent to the intestate by the plaintiff. After action brought another simple contract creditor of the intestate sued the administratrix in respect of his debt, and judgment was given in that action against the administratrix by consent, but the consent order was not filed as required by section 27 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

The administratrix fully satisfied this judgment debt, and then pleaded to the plaintiff's action that she had exhausted the assets of the intestate, and had no assets out of which to pay the plaintiff.

Bowen, L.J., gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., and H. Tindal Atkinson, for the appellant.—The simple contract debt was merged in the judgment debt, and that judgment being void against other creditors for want of proper registration, the simple contract debt is gone, and the defendant ought not to have paid it. Secondly, it is the rule at common law that, after notice of action, an administrator has no right to pay another creditor of the intestate. The rule in equity, which was to the contrary effect, only applies to administration actions.

They cited Gowan v. Wright, 35 W. R. 297, 18 Q. B. D. 201; Ex parte Brown, 17 Q. B. D. 488, 35 W. R. Dig. 20; Tolputt v. Wells, 1 M. & S. 395; Harris v. Harris, 35 W. R. 710; In re Radcliffe, 26 W. R. 417, 7 Ch. D. 733.

Finlay, Q.C., and Forman, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case I think that the judgment of my brother Bowen was right and must be affirmed. The action was brought by a creditor of an intestate against the administratrix. After the action was brought, another action by another simple contract creditor of the intestate was commenced against the administratrix, and in that action judgment was given against the administratrix by consent, but the consent order was not filed. The administratrix has satisfied that judgment debt, and pleads that she has no property of the intestate out of which to pay the present plaintiff. The plaintiff contends that the defendant had no right to pay the judgment debt. No doubt under the Act of 1869 the judgment, for want of the registration of the consent order, is null and void, and it is said that as between the parties the simple contract debt on which that judgment was, so to say, founded, was merged in the judgment debt. The judgment debt is a security of a higher kind, and no doubt that would be so as regards the parties to the original judgment. What, however, is the position of another creditor who is suing the administratrix? The administratrix alleges that she has exhausted the goods of the intestate in satisfying the judgment debt. The plaintiff contends that there was no debt to satisfy, since the judgment debt was void for want of registration, and the simple contract debt had been merged in the judgment debt. It is hardly necessary to state that proposition in order to see its fallacy. The judgment may be void, but that does not do away with the debt on which it is founded. That does not disappear because the judgment may be set aside. The simple contract debt therefore remained, and the administratrix had a perfect right to pay it, even after the action was brought. It is said that at common law the rule was that after action brought there could be no payment by the administrator, of another creditor, but it is admitted that for a very long time the rule in equity had been the other way. The Act of Parliament is perfectly clear and precise that where rules of law and equity conflict, the rule of equity is to prevail. There is here a plain conflict, and therefore the rule of equity must prevail. If we wanted authority, which I do not think we do, for such a proposition, we should find it in In re Radcliffe, where the principle is clearly stated by Jessel, M.R. I therefore think that the plaintiff cannot succeed, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion this case may be disposed of by two propositions. A creditor who alleges that a judgment is void cannot say that the debt in respect of which it is given is swallowed up by it, and becomes void also. Secondly, a rule of law says that an administrator cannot pay one creditor of an intestate in preference to another by whom an action has been brought. A rule of equity says that he can do so. Those rules are, therefore, in conflict, and where rules of law and equity conflict, the Judicature Act provides that the rule of equity shall prevail. I think, therefore, that the payment was a good one.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The arguments on behalf of the appellant are ingenious but untenable. It is said that the judgment debt is void for want of proper registration under the Debtors Act, 1869, but it is not void as between the parties to it, and therefore the judgment was good against the administratrix, though bad against other creditors. But it is said the simple contract debt was merged in the judgment debt, and therefore it also is void as against the creditors. That argument is fallacious. If the judgment was void there would be no merger. As to the other point taken, the provision of the Judicature Act is clear, that the rules of equity are to prevail where there is a conflict. It was said that this rule affects rights, but so do all rules, and there is no exception to the provision of the Act.

Appeal dismissed.

ROBINSON v. JENKINS AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Practice—Interpleader—Choses in action—Shares—Ord. 57, rr. 1, 2.

Shares are chattels within the meaning of ord. 57, r. 1, and therefore an interpleader issue can be directed in respect of them.

Appeal from the decision of a Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.).

The plaintiff purchased 1,000 shares in the Great Sheba Gold Mine (Limited) in April, 1889. The shares were registered in the company's books in his name, and he obtained a certificate from them stating that he was the owner. Afterwards, being desirous to sell them, he instructed the defendants, who were stockbrokers, to sell them for him, and gave to them the certificates and a transfer executed in blank. While these documents were in the possession of the defendants they received notice from one Bebro that he claimed the shares, on the ground that the shares had been obtained from him by fraud by the plaintiff's vendor. The defendants gave the plaintiff notice of this claim, and refused to return the certificate and blank transfer to him. The plaintiff thereupon brought the present action for the return of the certificate and blank transfer. The defendants applied to be allowed to interplead under ord. 57, r. 1.

The master refused to make the order, and on appeal Field, J., at chambers referred the matter to the Divisional Court, who directed the action to be stayed pending the trial of an interpleader issue between the plaintiff and the claimant.

T. W. Chitty, for the plaintiff.—The claim is in respect of shares, and there cannot be an interpleader with regard to them as they are not within the contemplation of ord. 57, r. 1 (a): Walter v. Nicholson, 6 Dowl. 517. The defendants were the plaintiff's agents, and to allow them to interplead in respect of these documents handed to them by their principal would be to allow an agent to set up the jus tertii as against his principal. The claimant only claims the shares which are vested in the plaintiff. He does not ask for the certificate and blank transfer in respect of which interpleader is claimed: Dalton v. Midland Railway Co., 12 C. B. 458; Baker v. Bank of Australasia, 5 W. R. 253, 1 C. B. N. S. 515.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Loehnis, for the defendants.—Shares are chattels, and therefore within the scope of the interpleader order. Although it is not permissible for an agent to set up a jus tertii against his principal, yet he may interplead: Best v. Hayes, 1 H. & C. 718, 11 W. R. C. L. Dig. 71; Tanner v. European Bank, 14 W. R. 675, L. R. 1 Ex. 261; Attenborough v. London and St. Katharine's Dock Co., 26 W. R. 583, 3 C. P. D. 450; Hollins v. Fowler, L. R. 7 H. L. 757, 23 W. R. Dig. 238.

Forbes Lankester, for the claimant.

Chitty replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case Messrs. Jenkins & Roylance have got something in respect of which the plaintiff has brought an action against them, and Bebro has threatened them with an action. They say that they have no real interest in it, and they are indifferent as to which of the claimants they are to give it up to, and therefore they ask the court to allow them to interplead in respect of it. Before the issue, which the parties agreed to settle is drawn up, the plaintiff appeals to this court. The ground of the appeal is that the court had no jurisdiction to order the interpleader issue. First, it is argued that the dispute between the plaintiff and Bebro is as to the shares, and that shares are not things in respect of which an interpleader can be directed. It is admitted, however, that shares are choses in action, but it is contended that they do not fall within the language of order 57, which regulates interpleader. Ord. 57, r. 1, says that relief by way of interpleader may be granted in respect of any "debt, money, goods, or chattels." The argument of the appellant is that we must restrict the meaning of the word "chattels" to tangible chattels. I can see no authority, nor am I inclined to read the word tangible into the order. Choses in action are chattels, and therefore, in my opinion, these shares are chattels in respect of which an interpleader can be ordered. Therefore I think that that point fails. The second point taken for the appellants was this. Even if the blank transfer and certificate, which are in the hands of the defendants, represent the shares, yet no interpleader order can be made in respect of them, because possession of them was given to the defendants as agents by the plaintiff as principal, and therefore the plaintiff has a right to demand them back from the defendants. That objection certainly seemed to me to be formidable for a time, because in an ordinary action by the plaintiff as principal against the defendants as his agents, the defendants would not be entitled to set up the right of a third party to the shares. An agent cannot in such a case set up the jus tertii against his principal. The case is, however, different when the defendants, instead of setting up an adverse claim, ask for an interpleader. That was determined by the cases of Best v. Hayes and Tanner v. European Bank, where the point was expressly raised, and where it was pointed out that in such a case an interpleader order may be made. Even if those cases stood alone, desiring as I do to keep the power of the courts as wide as possible, I should have said that the principle laid down by them was right, and could not be disturbed. The rule and order must be taken to have been made with a knowledge of those decisions. But those decisions have already been approved by the Court of Appeal in Attenborough v. London and St. Katharine's Dock Co., and therefore that point also fails. The third point urged upon us was that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order, because it was impossible to draw up a just and reasonable issue. I do not think that is so. The issue need not be confined to the whole case, and need only contain questions which a judge may require to inform his mind of the facts of the case. That is a common occurrence. Therefore I think that there is no ground for saying that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order. I think the order was rightly made, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—The circumstances of this case no doubt create a little difficulty. The main things in dispute are these shares, which are actually vested in the plaintiff, being registered in his name. But the certificate, which is the primâ facie evidence of title, and the blank transfer have been handed by the plaintiff to the defendants in order that they may sell the shares for him. Their authority to fill up the blank transfer which has been executed by the plaintiff is no doubt drawn from him. The shares are then claimed by Bebro, and the defendants apply to be allowed to interplead, on which the order appealed from has, as I think, been rightly made. It was urged for the appellant that an interpleader cannot be directed in respect of choses in action. I think that such an argument is entirely untenable. The order speaks of "chattels," which is one of the largest terms known to the law, and which certainly includes in its ordinary sense choses in action. Rule 2 of order 57 requires that the applicant for interpleader should satisfy the court that he is willing "to pay or transfer the subject-matter into court or to dispose of it as the court or a judge may direct." Disposition of a chose in action is the equivalent phrase to the payment of a sum of money or the transference of a chattel. Therefore, in my opinion, the order clearly contemplated choses in action as being the subject-matter of interpleader. Then it is said that the shares which are claimed are in the disposition of the plaintiff, and not of the defendants. I think that is special pleading. In claiming the shares against the defendants, Bebro claims everything relating to the shares, including, of course, the certificate and blank transfer.

I must confess I had some misgivings on the question of allowing an agent to set up the jus tertii against his principal, but those misgivings have been set at rest by the cases which have been cited. Obviously it is well that the law should be so settled, as otherwise the defendants would be exposed to the risk of serious damages being given against them in an action for conversion.

Then it is said that it is difficult to settle the form of the issue because the claimant claims the shares, and not the certificate and blank transfer. I think there ought to be no difficulty about it. The interpleader should go as to the certificate and transfer, which will involve the right to the shares. It follows, therefore, that I concur in thinking that the court had jurisdiction to make the order, and that the order was rightly made.

Appeal dismissed.

The following was the form of the interpleader issue as drawn up:—

"Whereas the above-named Marcus Bebro affirms, and the above-named William James Robinson denies, that certain shares, being Nos. 79,951 to 80,950, in a company called the Great Sheba Gold Mining Co. (Limited), and a share certificate relating to the said shares, and a transfer of the said shares (which said certificate and transfer were deposited in court pursuant to the order of the Queen's Bench Division dated the 25th of November, 1889) are the property of the said Marcus Bebro as against the said William James Robinson.

"And it has been ordered by the said order of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, dated the 25th of November, 1889, that the said question shall be tried in London.

"Therefore let the same be tried accordingly."

Poor law — Settlement — Derivative settlement—Child under sixteen—Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

By section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, it is provided that, "if any child in the section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, . . . and it cannot be shown what settlement such child . . . derived from the parent, without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child . . . shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born."

Held (following the interpretation put upon the section by the House of Lords in Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union, ante, p. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465), that this did not apply to the case of a child under the age of sixteen.

A pauper under the age of sixteen having become chargeable, the settlement of his deceased father could not be ascertained, and the settlement which he derived from his mother could not be shown without inquiring into her derivative settlement.

Held, that the section did not prohibit the inquiry, but that he took his mother's settlement, and not his own birth settlement.

Appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Field and Wills, JJ.) on a case stated by quarter sessions.

It appeared that Arthur John Helme was a pauper lunatic, and was the legitimate son of E. W. Helme, deceased, and Mary Elizabeth, his wife, and was born on the 16th of October, 1873, in the township of Everton, in the West Derby Union. E. W. Helme, who died in the year 1877, never acquired any settlement in his own right, and his birth settlement could not be ascertained.

Mary Elizabeth Helme, the mother of the pauper, was born in the parish of Llandisilio in the Llanfyllin Union on May 29, 1841. She was the daughter of one Richard Roberts, who in 1847 acquired a settlement in the Llanfyllin Union. She lived with her father until she was sixteen years of age, when she went to service, and she never acquired any settlement in her own right either before her marriage or since the death of her husband.

Arthur John Helme became chargeable in the Atcham Union on July 26, 1886, being then under the age of sixteen years. The court of quarter sessions for the county of Salop adjudicated his settlement to be in the West Derby Union. The guardians of that union contended that he was settled in the Llanfyllin Union in right of his mother's birth settlement, but the Divisional Court upheld the decision of the quarter sessions, on the ground that it could not be shown what settlement he derived from his mother without inquiring into her derivative settlement, and that, as he had not acquired a settlement for himself, he must be deemed to be settled in the parish of Everton, in the West Derby Union, in which he was born.

The guardians of the West Derby Union appealed.

Jelf, Q.C., F. Marshall, and Rohrweyer, for the appellants.—The decision in Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union, ante, p. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465, has put a new construction on the whole of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act. The third clause, forbidding an inquiry into derivative settlements, has been held in that case not to apply to a child under the age of sixteen years. The words in it "any child in this section mentioned" refer only to children above the age of sixteen. Therefore, in this case, there is no objection to the inquiry into the derivative settlement of the mother, and the pauper must be deemed to be settled in the Llanfyllin Union.

Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., Poland, Q.C., and Cunningham Glen, for the respondents.—No doubt some of the language of Lord Watson in the House of Lords in Reigate Union v. Croydon Union supports the appellants' contention, but it was not material to that decision, and must, therefore, be treated as obiter, nor is it repeated by any other of the lords who gave judgment in that case.

Lord Esher, M.R.—The question in this case is as to the true construction of section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, and as to its application to the facts before us. The section is one which has given the courts a great deal of trouble. It has been considered by various tribunals under various aspects, and judges have been by no means unanimous in the views they have taken of it. Under those circumstances this court expressed the hope, when we heard that several similar cases were going to the House of Lords, that the House of Lords would construe the whole section, and then apply it to the cases, so that the courts might know the view taken by the House of Lords as to the construction of the whole Act. Accordingly, the House of Lords heard all the cases before them most elaborately argued, and then they took time to consider their judgments. After careful consideration, judgment was delivered by four learned lords. The practice in the case of reserved judgments in the House of Lords is well known. Each lord considers the matter separately, and then they interchange their judgments, so that before judgment is delivered each lord has had the opportunity of reading the judgments of all the others. If, therefore, there is anything in the judgment of any one lord with which the other lords do not agree, they say so when they deliver judgment, and if they do not say so they must be taken to agree. In the Croydon and Reigate case, Lord Watson delivered the most elaborate judgment, but there is no doubt that his judgment had been read by all the other lords, and if they had disagreed with it they would have said so when they delivered their judgments. Lord Fitzgerald expressly says that he does agree with it, and the Lord Chancellor must, I think, be taken to do so. Nor does Lord Macnaghten express the slightest difference from the judgment of Lord Watson. In my opinion he adopts and agrees with it, and then he adds another reason of his own for the view he takes of the section. But giving an additional reason is not disagreement with Lord Watson's judgment. Therefore, I think the judgment of Lord Watson must be taken to be the judgment of the House of Lords. It lays down the view that they take of sections 34 and 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, and that view will be adopted by us in all future cases. Lord Watson says in terms that the words "any child in this section mentioned" in the latter part of section 35, do not apply to a child under the age of sixteen, and that such a child is dealt with by the two first paragraphs of the section. It is admitted that if we adopt that view of the section, the present appellants must succeed, but it is contended that we are not bound to adopt that view, because the remarks of Lord Watson were not necessary to the decision of the cases before him. In my opinion it would be disloyal to the traditions and rules of practice of this court if, after having asked the House of Lords to interpret the whole section, we were to disregard that interpretation when it was given. It would be wrong for us to do so. Therefore, I bow to the interpretation put upon the section in the House of Lords. I disregard everything that has been said upon the section prior to that interpretation, and, accepting that interpretation, I hold that this case is decided by it, and that the contention of the appellants is right.

Lindley, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Before these cases went to the House of Lords there were a number of conflicting decisions on the section, which were most difficult to reconcile. Few modern Acts, in fact, have given rise to more discussion than this Divided Parishes Act. Now the House of Lords have intentionally put an interpretation on this difficult section which should be a guide to us and other courts. I think that it would be wrong for us to refuse to carry that interpretation into effect. On that interpretation it is admitted that this appeal must be allowed, and I think that it is our duty to adopt that interpretation, and to say, therefore, that this appeal succeeds.

Lopes, L.J.—I concur. I think the case is entirely governed by the decision of the House of Lords.

Appeal allowed.

Barrett v. Day.
Day v. Foster. (a.)

Patent—Threats for infringement—Action for infringement—Action for injunction to restrain threats—"Person aggrieved" by threats—Stay of proceedings—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 25, r. 4.

D., the patentee of an invention, who had granted F. an exclusive licence to use the invention on payment of royalties, on the 17th of December, 1888, threatened F. with legal proceedings, on the ground that F. was manufacturing articles which infringed the patent without paying royalties therefor, and, on the 24th of April, 1889, commenced an action against F. for an injunction to restrain the manufacture of such articles, except subject to the terms of the licence. F. denied that the articles were an infringement of D.'s patent, and alleged that they were manufactured under B. and E.'s patent, of which F. was also licensee. B. and E., as "persons aggrieved" by D.'s threats against F., their licensee, on the 16th of August, 1889, commenced an action for an injunction to restrain D. from threatening F., and for damages. Summonses were then taken out by D. for a stay of proceedings in the action against him by B. and E., and by B. and E. for a stay of proceedings in the action of D. against F. until their action against D. had been heard.

Held, on the hearing of the two summonses, that the action of D. against F. was an action for infringement brought with due diligence within the proviso to section 32 of the Patents Act, 1883; and that there was no cause of action for the action of B. and E. against D.; and that all further proceedings in that action must be stayed.

Adjourned summonses.

Joseph M. Day, the defendant in the action of Barrett and Elers v. Day and the plaintiff in the action of Day v. Foster, was the owner of a patent granted on the 31st of December, 1885, for "an improved bottle for aerated liquids"; and on the 13th of August, 1886, he granted to Foster, the defendant in the action of Day v. Foster, an exclusive licence to make and sell a portion, called the "trigger opener," of his invention, at a royalty of one shilling per gross, payable quarterly. The licence provided that Foster should not use the "trigger opener" otherwise than in accordance with the licence, and should not at any time dispute the validity of Day's patent.

Messrs. Barrett and Elers, the plaintiffs in the action of Barrett and Elers v. Day, were the owners by way of assignment of a patent called the Barrett and Varley Patent, granted on the 2nd of November, 1887, for "improvements relating to means for facilitating the opening of internally stoppered bottles for aerated and other liquids." It appeared from the evidence that Barrett and Elers granted to Foster an exclusive licence to use their patent in November, 1888; but the formal assignment of the patent to Barrett and Elers was only executed on the 11th of January, 1889, and the licence to Foster was only executed on the 17th of January, 1889.

In 1888 Day obtained information that Foster was manufacturing "trigger openers" for which he was not paying royalty, of a pattern for which Foster had applied for a patent, but which Day alleged were made in accordance with his patent; and Day's solicitor wrote with respect thereto on the 25th of November, 1888. In reply Day's solicitor received a letter from Foster's solicitors stating that Foster would protect himself under his own patent and under a patent of Barrett and Varley, which was the first intimation Day received of the existence of Barrett and Varley's patent.

On the 17th of December, 1888, Day's solicitor wrote to Foster's solicitors as follows: "It was only on Saturday last that my client was enabled to procure a copy of Messrs. Barnett (meaning Barrett) and Varley's specification. It is clearly an infringement upon his patent. I thought it right to have this matter investigated before proceeding. I have now only to notify to you that, in the action against your clients, claims will be made in respect of this patent. I think it is only right to inform you of this before the writ is issued."

Messrs. Gard, Hall, & Rook, Foster's solicitors, also acted for Barrett and Elers, who assisted Foster against Day; and they wrote on behalf of Barrett and Elers requiring Day to withdraw his threats to proceed against Foster or to commence an action to make them good, and calling attention to section 32 of the Patents Act, 1883.

On the 24th of April, 1889, Day commenced his action against Foster, and by his statement of claim, delivered on the 29th of June, alleged as follows:—"The defendant has manufactured and sold trigger openers differing only colourably from those made in accordance with the plaintiff's letters patent, and has refused to pay royalties thereon, alleging as his reason that the trigger openers so manufactured and sold were made according to an alleged invention comprised in certain letters patent granted to Henry Barrett and John James Varley, and are not within the privilege granted by the plaintiff's letters patent or affected by the said licence. The trigger openers made according to the alleged invention of the said Messrs. Barrett and Varley do not differ in any material respect from the trigger openers protected by the plaintiff's said letters patent"; and he claimed "(1) a declaration that the said trigger openers in respect of which the defendant refuses to pay royalties are comprised within the plaintiff's said letters patent, and that the defendant is liable to pay royalties in respect thereof, in accordance with the said licence; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendant from making or vending (except subject to the terms of the said licence) trigger openers made in accordance with the description contained in the specification filed under the said letters patent granted to Barrett and Varley, or only colourably differing from the trigger openers manufactured in accordance with the plaintiff's letters patent; (3) an account of the royalties due to the plaintiff from the defendant under the said licence."

In his defence Foster stated that he had duly accounted for all royalties due to Day under his licence, and admitted that he had manufactured trigger openers under Barrett and Elers' patent, but denied that they were an infringement of Day's patent. This defence was not delivered until the 24th of October, 1889.

On the 16th of August, 1889, Barrett and Elers issued a writ against Day for an injunction restraining him from threatening to take proceedings against persons manufacturing, using, or selling his invention; and on the 24th of October, 1889, they delivered their statement of claim, in which they alleged that Day had threatened Foster with legal proceedings in respect of an alleged infringement, and that they had suffered damage by reason thereof; that they themselves had manufactured articles substantially the same as those manufactured by Foster under Barrett and Varley's patent; that Day had refused to join them as defendants in his action against Foster, or to allow Foster to contest the validity of Day's patent; that Foster's manufacture was not an infringement of Day's rights, because (1) it was not an infringement of Day's patent, and (2) Day's patent was bad; and they claimed an injunction restraining Day from threatening Foster, damages, and costs.

On the 31st of October, 1889, Day took out a summons in the action of Barrett and Elers v. Day, asking that all proceedings therein might be stayed; and on the 2nd of November Foster took out a summons asking that all proceedings in the action of Day v. Foster might be stayed until the action of Barrett and Elers v. Day had been tried. These two summonses now came on for hearing.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 32, provides that "where any person claiming to be the patentee of an invention, by circulars, advertisements, or otherwise, threatens any other person with any legal proceedings or liability in respect of any alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of the invention, any person or persons aggrieved thereby may bring an action against him, and may obtain an injunction against the continuance of such threats, and may recover such damage (if any) as may have been sustained thereby, if the alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase to which the threats related was not in fact an infringement of any legal rights of the person making such threats; provided that this section shall not apply if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for Day.—The action of Barrett and Elers v. Day ought to be stayed, on the ground that there is no cause of action. The action of Day v. Foster, which raises the question of infringement by Foster of Day's patent, is an action honestly brought with reasonable diligence against the person threatened, and satisfies the proviso of section 32 of the Act of 1883: Challender v. Royle, 36 W. R. 357, 36 Ch. D. 425. Therefore, Barrett and Elers have no cause of action against Day. The question raised in Day v. Foster is whether what Foster has been doing is an infringement of Day's patent. In his affidavit Foster states that he is willing to be bound by the decision in Barrett and Elers v. Day. He does this because he is precluded by the terms of his licence from Day from contesting the validity of Day's patent, but its validity can be contested in Barrett and Elers v. Day. Day's patent has been granted for four years, and no one has contested its validity, so that it must be regarded as valid, and Day's claim is a bonâ fide claim: Wren v. Weild, L. R. 4 Q. B. 730, 17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 91; Halsey v. Brotherhood, 29 W. R. 9, 30 Ibid. 279, 15 Ch. D. 514, 19 Ibid. 386. [They also referred to Driffield Linseed Cake Co. v. Waterloo Mills Co., 34 W. R. 360, 31 Ch. D. 638; Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v. Automatic Weighing Machine Co., ante, p. 233, 42 Ch. D. 665.] The action of Barrett and Elers v. Day should be stayed as frivolous and vexatious: Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 25, r. 4.

Moulton, Q.C., and Thomas Terrell, for Barrett and Elers, and Foster.—Barrett and Elers have a good cause of action, as Day's threats against Foster injure them, and Day will not join them as co-defendants with Foster, so as to enable them to contest the validity of Day's patent, although they have also manufactured the articles Day complains of as an infringement of his patent: Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v. Automatic Weighing Machine Co. The action of Day v. Foster is not an action for infringement within the proviso to section 32 of the Act of 1883. It does not take away the cause of action of Barrett and Elers, and their action is not frivolous or vexatious. The case differs from Challender v. Royle. But instead of staying Day v. Foster until Barrett and Elers v. Day is decided, both actions might be heard together.

North, J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—With regard to the validity of Day's patent, it is now four years old, and as no proceeding has been taken by Barrett and Elers, or by Barrett and Varley, or anyone else, to have it revoked, I must for present purposes treat it as valid, according to the judgments in Wren v. Weild, and Halsey v. Brotherhood. Foster does not allege that it is invalid. The law estops him from doing so as a licensee, and, moreover, he has contracted that he will not at any time dispute its validity; and the complaint that Day will not allow Foster to do what he has not attempted to do, and has expressly contracted not to do, is absurd. Then as to the question whether what Foster has done is or is not within Day's patent, that is the very thing which has to be decided, and will be decided in the action of Day v. Foster. If it is not within Day's patent that action will fail; but if it is, there is no reason why it should not be decided against Foster alone. Day could not join Barrett and Elers as defendants in that action, for he has no cause of action against them for what Foster has done. The fact that Barrett and Elers have a patent for a thing which if made, would be an infringement of Day's prior patent, would not justify an action for infringement by Day against Barrett and Elers; that was laid down in the judgments of Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ., in Challender v. Royle. It is true that Barrett and Elers allege for the first time in their statement of claim that they have themselves manufactured and sold articles substantially the same as those claimed by Foster to be manufactured under Barrett and Varley's patent, but they give no details or admissions as to the nature of such articles, or as to the time or extent of their manufacture, and Foster has, ever since November, 1888, had a licence from them, which their counsel tells me is an exclusive one. But, however this may be, there is no possible ground upon which I can hold that Day is bound to combine in one action, his claim against Foster in respect of the manufacture and sale of certain articles, and any claim he may have against Barrett and Elers in respect of the manufacture or sale by them of other articles. Nor can I hold it unreasonable that Day, who is duly prosecuting an action against Foster for what Day alleges to be, but which Barrett and Elers, and Foster, all deny to be, an infringement of Day's patent, should wait the result of that action before commencing proceedings against other alleged infringers in respect of similar infringements. The only ground of complaint, therefore (if any), which Barrett and Elers have against Day is in respect of his solicitor's letter to Foster's solicitors of the 17th of December, and the question is whether that letter gives Barrett and Elers any ground for commencing or further prosecuting their action against Day. It is scarcely disputed that no such action could have been brought before the passing of the Patents Act of 1883. That letter was written to Foster's advisers as a fair warning that Day did not accept the excuse put forward by Foster as a justification of what he had done, and that Day would assert his right by action; and the concluding words of the letter, "I think it only right to inform you of this before the writ is issued," are exactly what it was right Day's adviser should say before entering into litigation. According to the decision in Wren v. Wield, which was approved in Halsey v. Brotherhood, Barrett and Elers could only have succeeded in an action founded upon that letter if they could prove affirmatively that Day's claim was not a bonâ fide claim in support of a right which, with or without cause, he believed he had, but was a malâ fide and malicious attempt to injure them by asserting a claim of right, which he knew to be without any foundation; and no such case is suggested by the pleadings.

The bona fides of Day's action is not challenged, and no attempt was made before me to show that the articles manufactured by Foster are so entirely outside Day's patent that there is no reasonable and probable cause for Day's allegation that such articles are an infringement. But does the 32nd section of the Patents Act, 1883, give Barrett and Elers any right of action against Day in respect of that letter? Judges have frequently expressed strong opinions as to the propriety and fairness of warning an opponent by letter of intended proceedings against him before rushing into litigation, and in Wren v. Wield, and in Halsey v. Brotherhood, before the Master of the Rolls, such remarks were applied to patentees about to sue alleged infringers. But it has been held by Bacon, V.C., in the case of Driffield Linseed Cake Co. v. Waterloo Mills Co., and by Kekewich, J., in the case of Combined Weighing and Advertising Co. v. Automatic Weighing Machine Co., that such a letter by a patentee's solicitor to an alleged infringer or his solicitor, threatening an action for infringement, does give a cause of action under this section, and I fear this will have the effect of preventing a patentee from adopting the course thus pointed out to be fair and reasonable, and that for the future the warning letter will only accompany instead of preceding the writ, and will consequently be useless. But, finding such decisions, I am bound to follow them, and to hold that the letter of the 17th of December gives a cause of action to any "persons aggrieved thereby." That section, however, contains a proviso at the end which qualifies the whole section: "Provided that this section shall not apply if the person making such threats, with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent." If, therefore, Day has, by his proceedings in Day v. Foster, brought himself within that proviso, there is no ground of action against him under section 32. It is said that Day's action is not an action for infringement within the proviso. It is the only action or proceeding with respect to which Day has used any threat, and, unless it is an action for infringement, I do not see how the threat to bring it, gives a right of action under section 32, as that section only applies to cases in which a patentee of an invention has used threats with respect to an alleged manufacture, use, sale, or purchase of an invention which is not in fact an infringement. If the action is not one for infringement of a patent, it is difficult to see how a threat to bring it can be a threat in respect of something done which is asserted to be an infringement of it, which, according to Bowen, L.J., in Challender v. Royle, is requisite to make the section applicable. Again, Foster treats it as an action for infringement, for he sets up, by way of defence, that the articles he has manufactured are not an infringement, and in his affidavit he says that the sole question in Day v. Foster is, whether articles manufactured under Barrett and Varley's patent are or or are not within Day's patent. Also Barrett and Elers, in their statement of claim, say that the proceedings threatened were in respect of an alleged infringement; and plead, by way of reply thereto, that what Foster did was not, in fact, an infringement. I hold that Day's action is an action for infringement within the section. Day is a patentee whose patent is clearly valid against Foster, and Day has, under his patent, the sole right to make and vend a particular article, and he sues Foster for making and selling that article. That certainly looks very like an action for infringement. But it is argued that it is not such, because Foster has a licence from Day to make and sell such articles, and, therefore, cannot be sued for infringement. I do not see how this would prevent the action being one for infringement, though it might give Foster, if that were all, a good ground of defence.

It is argued that Day does not ask for relief on the footing that Foster is making and selling what he has no right to make and sell, but only for payment of royalty upon the footing of the licence. But it is necessary to look at the whole case. The defence that Foster sets up, and that Barrett and Elers also set up for him in their statement of claim, is not that Foster is protected by his licence, but that the licence has nothing to do with the matter, and no royalty is payable under it, because the articles are not made under the licence, and are not within Day's patent; and that is the question to be decided. If Foster fails, it will be because he has infringed Day's rights. He might have had a good defence if he had relied upon the licence, paying the royalty. But he has refused to pay the royalty, and he cannot and does not attempt to say that, if the manufacture would have been an infringement but for that licence, the licence prevents it from being so. The licence is merely a licence to make the articles, paying the royalty; and when Foster repudiates all obligation to pay the royalty he cannot rely upon the licence as a justification for the manufacture. Foster denies that the articles he makes are within the licence, and claims to manufacture them because they are not protected by Day's patent. Day alleges that they are, and claims specifically an injunction to restrain the manufacture thereof, except subject to the terms of the licence—i.e., on payment of the royalty; and if that is not an action for infringement, I do not know what is. It is said, further, that Day's action is not within the proviso, even if it is an action for infringement, because what the section contemplates is an action for infringement commenced after an action for threats under section 32, whereas Day's action commenced before it. If that were so, and Day desired to have the protection of that proviso, he would have had to dismiss the existing action of Day v. Foster, and, I suppose, pay the costs of it, and commence a fresh action against Foster on exactly the same lines, which new action Foster would doubtless have said was not commenced with due diligence after the threat. But I find nothing in the proviso warranting this contention, or pointing to the time when the action for infringement is to be brought, except that it is to be with due diligence. It must be borne in mind to what case the section is addressed — that of a patentee who causes damage by disseminating threats which he does not or will not justify by an action, who is "willing to wound but yet afraid to strike." It is not necessary for me now to express any opinion whether the bringing of an action for infringement with due diligence after the making of a threat renders an action for threats commenced in the meantime wrong from the beginning, as not being founded on any good cause of action, though I do not feel much doubt as to the meaning of the Act. But I do express a decided opinion that, if a threatened action for infringement is commenced and prosecuted with due diligence after such threat, there is no ground upon which an action under section 32 in respect of such threat can subsequently be commenced at all. To put it in another way, if a threat to bring an action for infringement is followed up by the bonâ fide commencement and prosecution with due diligence of the threatened action, there is no "person aggrieved" by the threat, and therefore no person who can bring an action under section 32, although I have no doubt that Barrett and Elers might have been "persons aggrieved" if no action for infringement had been commenced when they brought their action, or within a reasonable time afterwards.

In the present case I am of opinion that the action of Day v. Foster was commenced with due diligence, having regard to the date of the threat, the letters of Foster's solicitors, and the reasonable desire of Day to combine all his complaints against Foster in one action; and especially having regard to the nature of the threat, and to the fact that no action grounded thereon had been commenced when the writ in Day v. Foster was issued.

It was also argued for Barrett and Elers, as well as for Foster, that the action of Day v. Foster is not within the proviso, because it is not one in which the validity of the patent is in question. There is nothing, however, in this, in my opinion. If the action is for an infringement the proviso is satisfied, whatever defence the defendant may set up or omit to set up. It was admitted that the action would have been within the proviso if Foster could have pleaded that the patent is invalid, even though he had omitted to do so. But, in my opinion, it is equally within the proviso, though Foster does not plead invalidity, because he is incapacitated from doing so. If the action were in any sense a collusive one, the case might be different; but it is an honest action, brought hostilely against the only person threatened, being the only person whom Day knew to have infringed. For whatever the truth may be as to any manufacture by Barrett and Elers, it was not referred to in any correspondence between the solicitors, nor at all until the statement of claim was delivered in Barrett and Elers v. Day, and it is not suggested that Day had any materials which disclosed any ground of action against Barrett and Elers. Cotton, L.J., says in his judgment in Challender v. Royle: "It is my opinion, and I ought to express it, that, in order to bring the case within this proviso, the action must be an honest action, an action honestly brought in order to test the validity of the patent or the fact of infringement, whichever may be in question." And again: "In my opinion the proviso is satisfied if an action to test the validity of the patent, or the fact of infringement, is honestly brought with reasonable diligence against the person or any of the persons to whom the threats have been made." In my opinion, Day's action stands the application of this test. I do not forget that Barrett and Elers allege in their statements of claim, after setting out the letter of December 17, 1888, that since writing that letter the defendant has continued the "said" threats, and has brought his action against Foster. In that pleading the phrase "the said threats" means the threat in that letter.

In his affidavit, filed on November 1, Day swears that, except by the letters of November 25th and December 17th, 1888, neither he nor any person on his behalf has at any time made any threat in respect of Barrett and Varley's patent; and although this affidavit was replied to on November 6 by affidavits of Foster and of the secretary of Barrett and Elers, Day's statement on this point is not contradicted. It may be that the non-withdrawal of that threat, coupled with the further correspondence between the solicitors, was in one sense a continuance of it down to the time of bringing the action; but it is obvious that the threat to bring an action came to an end when the threatened action was brought, and there is no suggestion by affidavit or pleading that any threat was ever made, except of bringing the action, or that, subsequently to the date of commencement, any threat was made at all. It follows, therefore, that the action must stand or fall by the letter of December 17th, which, in my opinion, for the reasons I have mentioned, gives no cause of action, unless it can be maintained upon the ground that Day may still fail to use due diligence in the prosecution of his action. But there has not been, in my opinion, any such failure down to the present time, and Day's action is set down and stands high in my list for trial; and, as nothing which Day can do can prevent its coming on in due course, no question as to its due prosecution can now arise.

But there is one other matter which I cannot leave out of sight in considering whether the action of Barrett and Elers v. Day should now be stayed or not, under rule 4 of order 25, as being "frivolous and vexatious." Independently of this order, the court has undoubted jurisdiction to stay all proceedings or dismiss an action when, on the facts proved to the satisfaction of the court, it appears that the action is frivolous and vexatious, as appears from the cases of Willis v. Earl Beauchamp, 34 W. R. 357, 11 P. D. 59; Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, 33 W. R. 709, 10 App. Cas. 210; and Reichel v. Magrath, 14 App. Cas. 665. In my opinion the prosecution of an action is vexatious when it is clear that no relief can be granted at the trial. The only relief sought by Barrett and Elers is an injunction to restrain Day from threatening them, or their licensees or assigns, with reference to alleged infringements, and damages and costs. As regards the threat to bring the action of Day v. Foster, no injunction to restrain such threat could be granted at the trial, nor could have been at any time since the writ in Barrett and Elers v. Day, as no such threat was any longer possible after the action had been brought, and no damages could be recovered in respect of a threat which did not give rise to any cause of action. And, as regards any other threats, none are proved or alleged, nor is there anything from which any intention on the part of Day to make such threats could be inferred; and no injunction can be granted to restrain a defendant from doing an act which it is not proved or even alleged that he ever intended or threatened to do, as appears from Stannard v. Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell, 30 W. R. 693, 20 Ch. D. 190, and Proctor v. Bayley, ante, p. 100, 42 Ch. D. 390; nor could there, of course, be any damages for an act which was never committed. What Barrett and Elers avowedly desire to do is to try whether Day's patent is valid or not. But no such question can arise in their action, under the circumstances I have mentioned, as there is no issue to which it can be relevant, although, no doubt, according to Challender v. Royle and Kurtz v. Spence, 36 W. R. 438, 36 Ch. D. 770, such question might have arisen if any threatening or intention to threaten on Day's part was alleged and proved, and there was an issue to be decided at the trial whether such threatening was justifiable or not. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that there is not, and never was, any cause of action in Barrett and Elers v. Day in respect of which relief can be granted at the trial, and that, this being so, the action is vexatious, and the proceedings therein should be stayed; and I accordingly direct such stay, and that the defendant Day's costs should be paid by the plaintiffs. In deciding that it is vexatious, I do not mean to impute to the plaintiffs that it was commenced for the purpose of annoyance. I have no doubt it was considered a legitimate move in the war game of litigation between the parties. But this is no reason why the defendant should be harassed by the continuance of proceedings which, in my opinion, cannot result in a decision in the plaintiffs' favour.

The summons taken out by Foster in the action of Day v. Foster seeks to have all proceedings in that action stayed until after the trial of the other action. I see no reason whatever for this. No question as to threats or as to the validity of Day's patent can be tried in the action against Foster, but that is the proper action in which to try whether the articles which Foster has made are or are not infringements of Day's patent. The questions in the two actions are entirely different. The affidavit by Foster in support of his summons says that if what he asks is granted he is willing to be bound by the decision in Barrett and Elers v. Day so far as the issues as to validity and infringement are concerned. Inadvertently he lets out that what he is really seeking is to impugn the validity of Day's patent—a thing which he has expressly contracted for valuable consideration that he will not do. I consider such an attempt not creditable, and vexatious in every sense and I dismiss his summons, with costs.

COLQUHOUN (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) v. HEDDON. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Exemption—Premium on policy of life insurance—Insurance in foreign company—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 54—16 & 17 Vict. c. 91.

The provisions in the Income Tax Act, 1853, s. 54, and the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, for the deduction of the amount of the annual premium paid for a life insurance from the profits or gains in respect of which the person insured is liable to be assessed under schedules (D) or (E), do not apply where the insurance is in a foreign insurance company.

Where, therefore, a person had insured his life in an American company,

Held, that he was not entitled to deduct the premiums from the amount of his assessment under schedule (D).

Case stated for the opinion of the court under the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 19), s. 59.

The following are the material facts set out in the case, and the statutory provisions bearing thereon:—

Heddon appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the City of London against an assessment of £262 made upon him under schedule (D) to the Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), for the year ending the 5th of April, 1887, and claimed that he should be allowed, by way of deduction from the assessment, the sum of £6 4s. 2d. paid by him by way of premium on an insurance for £300 effected by him with the New York Life Insurance Co. This company was incorporated by special Act of the Legislature of New York dated the 21st of May, 1841, as a marine and fire insurance company, extended by an Act of State, dated the 18th of April, 1843, to life insurance.

The Income Tax Act, 1853, provides (section 54) as follows:—"Any person who shall have made insurance on his life . . . in or with any insurance company which shall become registered under any Act to be passed in the present session of Parliament for that purpose, and which shall comply with the requirements of such Act . . . shall be entitled to deduct the amount of the annual premium paid by him for such insurance from any profits or gains in respect of which he shall be liable to be assessed under either of the schedules (D) or (E) of this Act, or to have any assessment which may be made upon him under either of the said schedules reduced or abated by the deduction of the amount of the said annual premium from the amount of the profits or gains on which such assessment has been made."

No Act dealing with the registration of insurance companies (such as was contemplated in this section) was passed, but in the same session an Act was passed (16 & 17 Vict. c. 91) which, after reciting section 54, and that it might happen that an Act for the registration of insurance companies might not be passed in that session, provides as follows:—"Any person who shall have made any such insurance or contracted for any such deferred annuity as in the said provision mentioned, in or with any insurance company existing on the 1st day of November, 1844, or in or with any insurance company registered pursuant to the Act of the session holden in the 7th & 8th years of her Majesty, c. 110, for the Registration, Incorporation, and Regulation of Joint-Stock Companies, shall be entitled to all the benefits and advantages which by the said provision are expressed to be given in respect of the like insurance or contract in or with any insurance company which shall become registered under any Act to be passed in the present session of Parliament for that purpose."

The commissioners were of opinion that the New York Life Insurance Co. came within the provisions of this Act, and that Heddon was entitled to a deduction, from the amount of his assessment, of the sum of £6 4s. 2d. premium paid by him. The surveyor of taxes expressed himself dissatisfied with this decision, and required the commissioners to state this case under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and A. V. Dicey with him), for the appellant.—The question is whether or not a person is entitled to deduct the premium paid on his life insurance where he has insured in a foreign company. We say that he is not so entitled. It is evident from the language of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 that English companies only are there referred to. They are divided into two classes—companies registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and companies already in existence on the 1st of November, 1844 (the date when that Act came into operation), and therefore not requiring registration. Foreign companies could not be registered under that Act; it cannot be contended that the provision applies to English companies alone where they have come into existence since the 1st of November, 1844, but to all companies, foreign as well as English, existing before that date. A foreign company is unknown to the English law: Bulkeley v. Schutz, L. R. 3 P. C. 764, 20 W. R. H. L. Dig. 19.

Finlay, Q.C. (Bremner with him), for the respondent.—The words of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91 are clear—"any insurance company existing on the 1st day of November, 1844." The commissioners have found that this is a company which was in existence then, and that is enough. The object of the provision was to encourage thrift, and as long as it is clear that the insurance was made and the premiums paid, the locus of the insurance company is of no importance.

He referred to the definition of "company" in the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), s. 2.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., in reply.—The argument as to thrift is answered by the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 35, which extends the benefits of section 54 to insurances with friendly societies, but only such as are "legally established under any Act of Parliament relating to friendly societies."

POLLOCK, B.—The only conclusion to which I can come is that this appeal should be allowed. The case is no doubt one of importance, for it is common knowledge that there are many insurance companies established in America and elsewhere outside the United Kingdom in which many of her Majesty's subjects insure their lives. The question is governed by statute. It is not disputed that, except for some statutory abatement, this amount ought to be paid. Until the year 1853 it clearly would have been payable. It was in that year that the hardship of taxing the savings of thrift was felt to such an extent that the Legislature said that where a man's thrift had taken the form of life insurance instead of an ordinary investment there should be an exception in his favour to the extent of the annual premium which he paid. The exemption is to be found in section 54 of the Act of that year (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34). [His lordship then read the section, and continued:—] Now it is clear from this section that there was contemplated the passing of some Act dealing with the registration of companies n the then present session of Parliament. Such an Act icould only refer to companies established in England.

But, apart from that, I am quite clear that in an English Act of Parliament "company" means a company established in England and subject to the cognizance of English law. It is a legal entity, the nature of which depends upon the law of that country in which it is established; and in this country "insurance company" means an insurance company within the meaning of English legislation. Then by chapter 91 of the same session further provision is made, and here, again, the same argument arises on the words "insurance company." A date is mentioned—the 1st of November, 1844—and this has obvious reference to the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act of 1844, which makes that the date when registration is to commence. The evident intention was that the company should be an English company and a registered company. The reference cannot be to any company in any part of the world; for who is to say what is a company in a foreign country?

There is another argument which seems to me conclusive—that is, that if Mr. Finlay's view were correct, the extraordinary result would follow that you never could get your deduction where your premium was paid to an unregistered English company; you could get it if the company was a foreign one and unregistered. That amounts, to my mind, to a reductio ad absurdum. On all these grounds I think the appeal must be allowed.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question, to my mind, is, What is the meaning of the words in 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, "any insurance company existing on the 1st day of November, 1844, or" registered under the Act of 1844. Mr. Finlay contends that these words apply to any insurance company without any limitation. In my opinion that is not so. It is clear that when the Income Tax Act, 1853, was passed it was contemplated that an Act should be passed that session with reference to the registration of insurance companies, but no such Act was passed. Then the later Act (chapter 91) was passed. [His lordship read it.] To my mind it is clear that there was some reason for the insertion of these words, "existing on the 1st day of November, 1844," and on turning to the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act, 1844, I see that that Act was to come into operation on that day. That Act only deals with English companies. Therefore I am borne to the conclusion that the intention of the Legislature in chapter 91 of 16 & 17 Vict. was that we ought to construe the section as meaning any insurance company which existed and was carrying on business in England on the 1st of November, 1844, or was registered under the Act of that year. In my opinion this appeal ought to be allowed.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.) Feb. 17, 18.

Ex parte MAY.
In re SPACKMAN. (a.)

Costs—Solicitor—Employment of solicitor to arrange with creditors—Charge for costs—Bankruptcy—Right of solicitor to payment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), section 4, sub-section 1 (a).

On November 9, 1886, the debtor gave to a firm of solicitors, whom he had consulted with a view to a settlement with his creditors, authority to sell certain horses and carriages, and charged the proceeds with the costs and expenses being incurred by him with the firm. On November 22, 1886, an arrangement was come to whereby all moneys received from the sale of furniture and other effects, which constituted practically the whole of the available property of the debtor, was to be retained for the benefit of the creditors, and authority was given by the debtor to pay any such moneys into the bank for this purpose in the names of the solicitors and another person. On December 14, 1886, a receiving order was made against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy on which it was founded being stated to have been committed on December 8, but the county court judge held that the debtor had committed an act of bankruptcy on November 22, and he allowed the costs of the solicitors up to that date only.

Held, that the county court judge was right in holding that an act of bankruptcy had been committed on November 22, and that the solicitors were only entitled to their costs incurred up to that date.

The principle laid down in Ex parte Payne, In re Sinclair, 15 Q. B. D. 616, 34 W. R. Dig. 19, by which a trustee in bankruptcy is not entitled to recover moneys actually paid to a solicitor by a debtor in order to secure his services to defend him at the hearing of a bankruptcy petition, does not extend to a charge on moneys outstanding in the hands of other persons, or to costs incurred in negotiating with creditors with a view of averting bankruptcy proceedings.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Metcalfe, in the county court at Bristol, directing the appellants, Messrs. May, Sykes, & Batten, solicitors, to pay over to the trustee in the bankruptcy the sum of £56, being the difference between the proceeds of the sale of certain horses and carriages formerly belonging to the bankrupt and a certain portion of their bill of costs against the bankrupt.

The bankrupt was the registrar of the county court at Swindon, and in 1886, having got into difficulties, he consulted the appellants with a view to a settlement with his creditors. On November 9, 1886, the bankrupt gave the appellants the following authority and charge:—"Dear Sirs,—With reference to the horses and carriages, &c., sent to your Mr. Batten last week, I hereby authorize you to sell them at Tattersalls as soon as possible, and I authorize you to retain the purchase-money on my account. And I hereby charge such horses and carriages, &c., or the purchase-money thereof, with the costs and expenses being incurred by me with your firm."

On November 22, 1886, Messrs. May, Sykes, & Batten wrote to Messrs. Eyre & Co., the London agents for a Mr. Jones, the solicitor acting for several creditors, a letter, the material parts of which were as follows:—"We have seen Mr. Spackman this morning, and have arranged that all moneys received from the sale of furniture and other effects shall be retained for the benefit of the creditors, and shall not be handed over to Mr. Spackman. We have, moreover, taken his authority to pay any such moneys into the Wilts and Dorset Bank at Swindon in the names of this firm and Mr. Redway, the auctioneer, of Swindon."

On December 14, 1886, a receiving order was made against the debtor, the act of bankruptcy on which it was founded being stated to have been committed on December 3, but the county court judge held that the letter of November 22 was proof of an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and he only allowed the costs of the solicitors up to that date.

Messrs. May, Sykes, & Batten now appealed against that order, on the ground that there was no act of bankruptcy on November 22, and, further, that, even if there were, the case came within the principle laid down in Ex parte Payne, In re Sinclair, 15 Q. B. D. 616, 34 W. R. Dig. 19, and that, the charge being given for the purpose of defending the debtor from possible bankruptcy proceedings, and to keep him out of bankruptcy, they were entitled to all costs incurred up to the date of the receiving order.

Bigham, Q.C., and F. C. Willis, for the appellants.—The only evidence of an act of bankruptcy on November 22 was the letter written by the appellants themselves, and that is not sufficient. It does not show an assignment of all the debtor's property. It is not sufficient that the debtor is assigning something, but it must be practically the whole of his property. Moreover, in any case the principle laid down in In re Sinclair applies. These costs were incurred before the petition in negotiating with creditors in order to avoid a threatened bankruptcy. The reasoning in In re Sinclair is that a man ought to be allowed to use money in his control honestly to prevent an adjudication.

Poole, Q.C., for the trustee.—The furniture and other effects mentioned in the letter constituted practically all the debtor's property. The case of In re Sinclair cannot be extended to such a case as this.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that the county court judge was right. Two points were taken before him—first, whether there was an act of bankruptcy on November 22; and, secondly, if so, whether the case came within In re Sinclair. Now, as to the act of bankruptcy, it appears that all that the bankrupt had which his creditors could get at was certain furniture and other effects, and that, in consequence of the representations of certain creditors, an arrangement was come to on November 22 between the appellants and Spackman by which the proceeds of the furniture and other effects should be retained for the benefit of the creditors, and not handed over to Spackman. The letter goes on, "We have, moreover, taken his authority to pay any such moneys into the Wilts and Dorset Bank at Swindon in the names of this firm and Mr. Redway." Authority was given to certain persons—namely, the appellants and Mr. Redway—to receive the proceeds of the furniture and other effects representing the whole available property, and pay that into the bank for the benefit of the creditors, and not put it at the bankrupt's disposal. It seems to me that that is an assignment of property for the benefit of creditors within section 4, sub-section 1 (a), and therefore was an act of bankruptcy.

The other point also is one which appears to me to have no substance. In the case of In re Sinclair it was held that where a man goes to a solicitor and asks that solicitor to represent him and to act for him upon the hearing of a petition for adjudication, and pays a sum of money to the solicitor in order to secure his services, the payment being bonâ fide made and the services bonâ fide rendered, that money so paid for good consideration could not be recovered by the trustee on the ground that the solicitor had received it after he was aware of an act of bankruptcy. The case was likened to that of a debtor who his creditors know has committed an act of bankruptcy going to one and paying ready money for an article of necessity. It is now sought to extend that, not merely to the case of money in the hands of a debtor and parted with in consideration of present services or goods presently purchased, but to extend it to all moneys outstanding in the hands of other persons and which undoubtedly would become the property of the trustee. That appears to be unwarrantable, because a man who takes a charge under those circumstances knows very well the money is the money of the trustee, and that the party charging has no right to do so. A man who comes with ready money offers something which, although primâ facie it is the property of the trustee, may not be so, because the debtor may have had presents of money for the purpose of obtaining someone to defend him or to provide himself with the necessities of life. On the other hand, if that principle is to be extended not only to payments in ready money, but also to charges on estate in the hands of other persons, it is difficult to see where a limit is to be placed. We have had occasion to say more than once that where a man has committed an act of bankruptcy and also executed a deed for the benefit of his creditors—the execution of which is an act of bankruptcy—when that takes place it is the duty of the trustee under the deed to wait to see if any creditor would take advantage of the act of bankruptcy, and that he ought not to deal with the estate until he is satisfied on that point by the three months having elapsed, and if he deals with the estate he must repay any moneys so received, however bonâ fide he may have acted. It seems to me here, also, impossible to say that what the appellants did was a necessity within the rule laid down in In re Sinclair. They were engaged in doing the same thing as a trustee under a deed of arrangement. They were trying to make arrangements to avoid bankruptcy, and to withdraw the estate from the Bankruptcy Court, and we never held that a man engaged in so doing is justified in charging the estate with costs incurred in that way. It would be still more monstrous if solicitors who are not trustees under a deed and must be presumed to know the law should be allowed to spend the money of the trustee in trying to get the creditors together and avoid proceedings when it would not be allowed in the case of an ordinary trustee. This case does not fall within the principle of In re Sinclair, and for my part I am not prepared to extend that case in either of the directions contended for, beyond the limit laid down there.

Donatio mortis causâ—Banker's deposit note payable on demand with cheque to bearer indorsed on it—"Not transferable"—Donor dying before money drawn out—Duty of executors.

Four days before his death, D., being ill, gave his sister-in-law a banker's deposit receipt for £580 and interest. On the deposit receipt was a memorandum intimating that it was not transferable, that the amount was repayable on demand, and that, when the money was withdrawn or the interest paid, the depositor must sign the cheque on the back of the receipt after affixing a penny stamp, and that, if part were withdrawn, a new receipt would be given for the balance. A form of cheque was indorsed on the back of the receipt, which form was filled up for £580 and signed by the donor, but the document was not presented for payment at the bank till after his death, when the bankers said their authority to cash it was at an end.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that there was a good donatio mortis causâ of the deposit receipt and the money represented by it, and that the form of cheque (the filling up of which was merely a convenient means of obtaining, and preserving evidence of, the payment of the money) was not such an essential part of the document as to prevent it being made the subject of a good donatio mortis causâ, and that any difficulty arising from the non-negotiable character of the instrument was removed by the case of Duffield v. Elwes, 1 *Bli. Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This appeal raised the question whether a deposit note, or receipt for a sum deposited at a bank, with a form of cheque indorsed on it, which was intended to be filled up and signed when the depositor wished to withdraw the money, and which had in fact been so filled up and signed by the depositor, could be the subject of a good donatio mortis causâ.

The document was in the following form :—

That was followed by the subjoined memorandum printed or lithographed in red :—

"This deposit receipt is not transferable. The amount is repayable on demand, but will bear no interest unless it remains undisturbed for one month. The rate of interest is subject to alteration, of which notice will be given by advertisement in the Times newspaper. When the money is withdrawn or the interest paid, the depositor must sign the cheque on the back hereof, first affixing a penny draft stamp. If part only is withdrawn, a new receipt will be given for the balance."

On the back of this document was the form of cheque, filled up, stamped, and signed by the depositor, as under :—

London, January 11th, 1888.

To the London and Westminster Bank (Limited),
Lambeth Branch.

Pay to self or Bearer Bearer Five Hundred and Eighty Pounds and Interest.
With Interest.

JAS. DILLON.

The word bearer occurring the second time, and also the words with interest, were written in manuscript by the depositor when he signed the cheque, the formal parts being printed.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DRANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Dillon, being ill in bed, sent for his sister-in-law, Miss Duffin, who came on the 11th of January, 1888, and attended to him. According to her evidence, which the court believed, the facts of the case were, that after she had been with him some little time, he took out the deposit note, and sent her for a stamp and writing materials, saying he was going to give it to her conditionally—if he got well, that is, she was to give it back to him—and that he filled in the cheque with the date and amount, "£580 and interest," and the above words, signed it across the stamp, and gave it to her.

Mr. Dillon died on the 15th of January, 1888, and Miss Duffin, who stood in the relation of deceased wife's sister to him, claimed that he had given her the deposit note as above mentioned for her own benefit in the event of his dying, and to be restored to him in case he should recover.

The bankers, upon the document being subsequently presented for payment said, that their authority to cash the cheque ended with Mr. Dillon's death.

This summons was taken out by a residuary legatee to decide the question whether there was a good donatio mortis causâ, and Miss Duffin was made defendant.

Kekewich, J., held that there was a good donatio mortis causâ.

The plaintiff appealed

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Methold, for the appellant.—If there was a gift intended here, what was given was not a good subject for a donatio mortis causâ. What was given was a cheque—a cheque payable to bearer. That is not a good subject of donatio mortis causâ. The money could only be drawn out by filling up and signing the form of cheque on the back of the receipt. That made the deposit equivalent to an ordinary drawing account. There is a long series of authorities which have held that there cannot be a good donatio mortis causâ of a cheque not presented in the donor's lifetime: Hewitt v. Kaye, 16 W. R. 835, L. R. 6 Eq. 198; In re Beak's Estate, Beak v. Beak, L. R. 13 Eq. 489, 491, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 4. In Clement v. Cheesman, 33 W. R. 40, 27 Ch. D. 631, Chitty, J., took exactly the same view as to the donor's own cheque, though he held that a cheque paid to him by another man stood on the same footing as a bill of exchange, and was a good subject of donatio mortis causâ. There have been two cases, and two only, in which a deposit receipt has been held to make a good donatio mortis causâ, and, as they were both decided by courts of first instance, this court can review them, if necessary. The two cases are Amis v. Witt, 33 Beav. 619, and Moore v. Moore, 22 W. R. 729, L. R. 18 Eq. 474, in which, at p. 485, Hall, V.C., referred to Amis v. Witt as deciding the question for him. The form of the deposit note is not given in either of those cases, and in the former no reasons are given for the decision. In Witt v. Amis, 9 W. R. 691, 1 B. & S. 109, a policy of life assurance was held a good donatio mortis causâ; as standing on the same footing as a bond. In In re Mead, Austin v. Mead, 28 W. R. 891, 15 Ch. D. 651, there was a deposit note with a form of cheque on the back which had to be filled up and signed, just as in the present case. In Moore v. Darton, 4 De G. & Sm. 517, the donor had done all she could to complete the gift—the debt was not assignable at law, it was not payable on demand, but required six months' notice. [COTTON, L.J.—Does not In re Mead depend on the fact that there was no intention there to give the deposit note? LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Veal v. Veal, 8 W. R. 2, 27 Beav. 303.] That case was treated by Fry, J., in Mead's case as governing the case of bills of exchange, but not that of a deposit note like the one here. This deposit note is of no use without the cheque. [LINDLEY, L.J.—What would have been the effect if the cheque had been on a separate paper? Bramwell Davis referred to In re Taylor, Taylor v. Taylor, 56 L. J. Ch. 597, 35 W. R. Dig. 92; In re Farman, Farman v. Smith, 57 L. J. Ch. 637, 36 W. R. Dig. 81; and Cassidy v. Belfast Banking Co., 22 L. R. Ir. 68, 36 W. R. Dig. 88.] [COTTON, L.J.—Is there any case which shows that the authority of the bank to cash the cheque is revoked by the death of the donor where the donee is his executor?] The cheque was to be given back to him if he recovered, so could not have been meant to be cashed in his lifetime. In re Mead is not sufficiently distinguished from this case by the mere fact that the cheque was only for part of the deposit. A gift of a fourth share in a horse has been held good.

They also contended that, on the evidence, there was no sufficient proof that there was a gift intended.

Warmington, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the respondent.—A good gift can be made by indorsement of a deposit note, because it is not then distinguishable from a promissory note, which makes a good donatio mortis causâ. It is the same with a cheque payable to the deceased, which is merely an order to a banker to hold certain moneys to the credit of the deceased. If a promissory note is a good subject of donatio mortis causâ, why is not this? Though there is no case binding on this court, yet there is a current of decisions in favour of deposit notes being good as gifts of this sort: Witt v. Amis. [COTTON, L.J.—That is not satisfactory, because no reasons are given.] Cassidy v. Belfast Banking Co. is not distinguishable from the present case. [COTTON, L.J., referred to Duffield v. Elwes, 1 Sim. & St. 239, 1 Bli. N. R. 497.] In Rankin v. Weguelin, 27 Beav. 309, bills of exchange were, again, held good as a donatio mortis causâ. [LINDLEY, L.J.—It does not appear there when the bills were indorsed—whether by Colonel Weguelin, or by his executors.] In Veal v. Veal it is clear there was no indorsement. This deposit note is clearly a receipt for money, and also a promise to pay, because it is payable on demand. There would be a good donatio mortis causâ if the deposit note were given, quite apart from the cheque on the back. Duffield v. Elwes shows that executors are bound to indorse the note or do whatever is necessary to enable the donee to get the money. The provision as to signing the cheque is merely to protect the bank, as it gives them a receipt. In order to decide against us a considerable body of authority would have to be overruled: Amis v. Witt; Moore v. Moore. In re Mead is really in our favour. There the money was only withdrawable after seven days' notice. If it had been payable on demand, Fry, J., would have held it a good donatio mortis causâ, but he held there was there only a cheque drawn upon the total amount deposited, which, according to the authorities, would not be a good donatio mortis causâ. In In re Taylor Stirling, J., held that a deposit note was good as a donatio mortis causâ. In In re Farman North, J., held that such a gift was good, even without corroboration of the donee's evidence. Amis v. Witt has got into the text-books, and, having been accepted by the profession generally, the law as laid down in it should not now be disturbed. In the Irish case the judges thought the words "not transferable" immaterial, and that they were void at law if the intention was to make the money inalienable. In In re Hughes, 36 W. R. 821, Cotton, L.J., treated a deposit note as forming a good donatio mortis causâ. In this case the document was a deposit note, and not a cheque. The cases where the cheque was payable to the donor are in our favour: Clement v. Cheesman. This is a deposit note with something more, which is a mere form.

Methold replied.

COTTON, L.J.—I will deal first with the point raised as to the evidence brought forward to substantiate the case of the lady who claims to be entitled to this deposit note by donatio mortis causâ. There is, on that point, the evidence of the lady herself, and if that is correct there can be no doubt the deceased did hand over to her what I will call the deposit note. Kekewich, J., relied on the accuracy of her statement. It is said she made a mistake as to the exact time the gift was made. But there is nothing more usual than for a person speaking with general accuracy, and, as to other matters, with complete accuracy, to make a slight mistake as to the time of an occurrence in a matter of this sort. In my opinion it would be wrong, when Kekewich, J., who saw this lady and heard her evidence, believed her story, for us, on the grounds put forward, to treat her as an unreliable witness. Then it is said her evidence ought to have been corroborated, but I do not think, as the law now stands, that that is necessary. Besides, in my opinion there is corroboration here, in the sense that the document produced bears the signature of the deceased. For what possible reason should he have signed this just before his death, unless he meant to give it to her? It was contended that she was his executrix, and that it was to enable her in that capacity to get the money more easily, but I think that, having regard to what we know about the facts of the case, that could hardly have been the reason. In my opinion the circumstance strongly corroborates her evidence.

Then, as to the other point, could this document be a good subject of donatio mortis causâ? I will first deal with those matters in which the present case differs from other cases which have been cited in argument. I was surprised that no evidence was brought by either side to show what the usual practice of bankers is with regard to these deposit notes. In my opinion the object of requiring the cheque at the back to be signed before the money is drawn out is simply in order that by retaining it as a receipt, evidence of the money having been paid may be preserved in a convenient form. The intention is not to intimate that they will not pay back the money at all unless the cheque is signed. I think they would have no power to withhold the money altogether in case their requirements were not complied with, but they rightly require some reasonable explanation to be given to justify them in paying the money without the production of the document filled up in the prescribed manner. Still, I do not think this provision has the effect of making this money stand in the same position as a balance on an ordinary drawing account. If, therefore, the means exist of making a good donatio mortis causâ of the money deposited, I do not think this memorandum is sufficient to prevent it.

It is said this is the first time this question has come before the Court of Appeal. Now, I do not rely so much on the cases, because we are asked, and have power, to review them—one and all; although there are a large number. There is, moreover, one case which was decided by the Court of Appeal in Ireland which agrees with the cases which say that a deposit note can be made the subject of a donatio mortis causâ. But, to deal with the question on principle, why should not this document be a good subject for a donatio mortis causâ? It is true that, the cheque not having been presented before the death of the donor, it would not confer on the donee a good title at law to the money. But why is there not a good donatio mortis causâ putting aside the cheque altogether? The case of Duffield v. Elwes assists us as to that. It shows that the executors of the deceased donor would be considered as trustees for the donee, so as to be bound to do what was necessary to enable her to obtain the money. Then the judgment of Knight-Bruce, V.C., in Moore v. Darton shows what kind of instruments may be the subjects of donatio mortis causâ, and in that case the delivery of a receipt was held, under the circumstances in which it was handed over, to confer on the donee a good title by donatio mortis causâ to the debt evidenced by it. Applying the reasoning of that decision, and the indorsed cheque in the present case being, in my opinion, merely a means of enabling the donee to draw out the money, I think there was here a complete and effectual gift or transfer of the debt of which this deposit receipt formed the documentary evidence.

What took place here was, therefore, in my opinion, sufficient to make a good donatio mortis causâ of the deposit note and the money payable on it. But it is said this instrument is not negotiable apart from the cheque, and that was not cashed in time. Well, then, as regards any difficulty occasioned by the negotiable character of the instrument, what, as bearing on that, does Duffield v. Elwes say? In that case Lord Eldon laid down that the executors of a donor become trustees for the donee, and that they are bound to do everything which may be necessary in order to enable the donee to get the money. No doubt that is anomalous, as it would not be so with respect to a donatio inter vivos—that is, a gift made in the donor's lifetime. The court does not give any assistance to mere volunteers in such cases, so that it is an anomaly peculiar to the case of a donatio mortis causâ. It is true that here the assistance of the court might not be necessary, the donee herself being one of the executors, but I do not rely on that. The same view was taken in the Irish case by the Court of Appeal in Ireland, though in that case the executor, and not Cassidy, would have been the proper plaintiff. That, in my opinion, gets over any difficulty arising from the non-negotiable character of the instrument. I think, therefore, that the appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am also of opinion that the decision of Kekewich, J., was correct on both the points raised in this appeal before us. We were asked to overrule the judge's decision upon the evidence. That would be a very difficult thing to do when he has seen and heard the witnesses, and we have not. I am bound to say for myself that, having attended to the evidence which has been read, I fully belive the lady's story.

Then it is said that, even assuming the deceased intended to make a donatio mortis causâ, this deposit note cannot be made the subject of such a gift. One would like to know why not. I can see the difficulty—the note is not a negotiable instrument, and cannot, therefore, be sued on in the donee's own name. But that point was set at rest ages ago. Sir J. Leach decided in Duffield v. Elwes that the court would not assist a donee under such circumstances to obtain payment of the gift, but that decision was reversed on appeal and the reasoning of the judge condemned, and Lord Eldon said that the principle that a court of equity will not assist a volunteer does not apply to these gifts mortis causâ. Then why cannot this deposit note be made the subject of a good donatio mortis causâ? It is said there cannot be a donatio mortis causâ of a cheque payable to bearer. I will assume that that proposition is correct, though I think it may some day require consideration. But that does not affect the present question, because, although there is a form of cheque payable to bearer on the back of the deposit note, that is a mere means of getting payment of the money deposited, and I am perfectly convinced that a perfectly valid donatio mortis causâ can be made of this deposit note. The authorities are all in favour of that view, but we were asked to review these cases. That, however, would be a very strong thing to do at this time of day, and I cannot see that it would yield any advantage whatever, to counterbalance the disadvantage of upsetting what has now been regarded as settled for so long a period. I agree that this appeal fails.

LOPES, L.J.—The first point here is whether this donatio mortis causâ was proved. In my opinion the judge was quite right in holding that the story told by this lady was the correct one. It is true that there was a certain slight discrepancy in what she said, but I think the learned judge was quite right in holding that the gift was established.

Then there is the further question to be considered whether this deposit note is a good subject of donatio mortis causâ. The law (though I am not so familiar with it as my learned brethren) seems to be well established. It seems clear that a promissory note is a good subject of donatio mortis causâ. It is also clear that an ordinary deposit note is a good subject. But exception is taken to the deposit note in this case on the ground of the cheque upon the back of it. In my opinion that does not in any way alter the case. I think it is merely intended to afford the bank a convenient means of preserving evidence that the money has been paid. With respect to the intention of the donor, it is clear to me that he intended to give the donee the means of getting the money. In my opinion the decision of the learned judge was quite correct, and this appeal ought to be dismissed.

COTTON, L.J.—I meant to mention, with regard to the case of In re Mead, that I became quite convinced in the course of the argument that there was no intention in that case to give the donee the whole of the money secured by the deposit note, but merely to give her a cheque, drawn upon the money deposited, for a portion only of that money. That distinguishes it from the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

BARLOW v. ROSS. (a.)

Right to light—User for ten years—Extinguishment—Prescription Act—Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36), s. 20.

The plaintiff built a house in 1867. In 1877 the land adjoining it was acquired by a local authority under the provisions of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1875. In 1888 their lessee (the defendant) erected on the land buildings which obstructed the access of light to the plaintiff's house. Upon an action brought to recover damages for the obstruction,

Held, that the defendant was protected by section 20 of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1875, since the plaintiff had in 1877 an inchoate right over the land acquired by the local authority, which was extinguished by the section, and in respect of which compensation was payable.

Appeal from the decision of Hawkins, J.

In 1867 the plaintiff erected a building at Birmingham. In 1877 the land adjoining this building was acquired by the Corporation of Birmingham under the Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 36) for the purpose of carrying out a scheme of improvement.

In 1886 they let the land immediately opposite the plaintiff's building to the defendant, and in 1888 he pulled down the old buildings which were standing and erected a new building, which materially obstructed the access of light to the plaintiff's building. The present action was then brought to recover damages for the obstruction, and was tried before Hawkins, J., and a jury. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £100, but Hawkins, J., entered judgment for the defendant, on the ground that he was protected by section 20 of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1875.

The plaintiff appealed.

William Graham, for the appellant.—At the time the land was purchased by the corporation the plaintiff had acquired no right to the light and was not entitled to any compensation. The right could only be acquired by twenty years' user under the Prescription Act. There was, therefore, at that time no right which could be extinguished by the operation of section 20.

He cited Ladyman v. Grave, 19 W. R. 863, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 763; Scott v. Pape, 34 W. R. 465, 31 Ch. D. 554; Plasterers' Co. v. Parish Clerks' Co., L. R. 6 Ex. 630; Mitchell v. Cantrill, 36 W. R. 229, 37 Ch. D. 56.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Methold, for the respondent.—The corporation were compelled by law to carry the scheme into execution, and to allow the plaintiff's contention would prevent them from doing so. The right of the plaintiff in 1877 was an inchoate right and was extinguished by the section: Duke of Bedford v. Dawson, L. R. 20 Eq. 353, 24 W. R. Dig. 236; Clark v. London School Board, 22 W. R. 354, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 120.

Graham replied.

By section 20 of the Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1875, "Upon the purchase by the local authority of any lands required for the purpose of carrying into effect any scheme authorized by a confirming act, all rights of way . . . and all other rights and easements in or relating to such lands or any part thereof shall be extinguished, and all the soil of such ways . . . shall vest in the local authority, subject to this provision, that compensation shall be paid by the local authority to any persons or bodies of persons proved to have sustained loss by this section."

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case raises what is in some respects a very important point. The Artizans' Dwellings Act, 1875, was passed for the improvement of towns in respect of artizans' dwellings and general sanitary regulations. It invests the local authorities of towns—in this case the Corporation of Birmingham—with very large powers, but it carefully respects the rights of individuals with the exercise of which those powers might interfere. A scheme of improvement under the Act must be referred to a Government department, and opportunity is given for any objections to it being made, either before that department, or before a committee of Parliament. The confirming authority, the Local Government Board, have then to consider the scheme and to embody it in a provisional order, which is to be laid before both Houses of Parliament, and nothing can be done in pursuance of the scheme until all those steps have been taken. Thus every opportunity is given to persons prejudicially affected by the scheme to make their opposition known. But after the scheme becomes law it becomes incumbent on the local authority to see that it is carried into effect. They are not to carry it out themselves, but they are to see that it is properly done. Inter alia, power is given to them to say what sort of houses are to be erected within the area of the scheme, and it is their duty in effectuating the scheme to see that any interests with which the carrying out of the scheme interferes are properly compensated. In the present case it is said that the powers of the local authority are controlled by the rights of the plaintiff. Although a large area of land was bought under the Act, and although all rights in or relating to that land were, by operation of section 20, extinguished, yet it is said that this only included rights which were in existence at the date of the purchase, and that the plaintiff's right to light, which was not then in existence, was not affected by the section. That is to say, that if at the time of the purchase there were several persons like the plaintiff who were in process of acquiring similar rights, but had not yet acquired them, and the corporation were unable to block their light until a period of twenty years had elapsed, then, as regards the carrying into effect of that part of the scheme, their powers are entirely at an end, and they can only go to Parliament for further powers. That would, I think, be a startling conclusion. No doubt the primâ facie meaning of the word "rights" is existing rights, and it does not in its ordinary meaning include such an interest as that possessed by the plaintiff when the land was taken, an interest which did not become a right until the time limited by the Prescription Act had elapsed. That is conceded, and if we had to deal with a different Act of Parliament, and could see that to give the word its ordinary meaning would not interfere with the scope and object of the Act, we should so interpret it. But here it is plain from the object of the Act that if this interpretation were given, in many cases that object would be entirely defeated, and the whole scheme of improvement might be made inoperative. An obstinate man who objected to be compensated might, if he chose, stand on his rights and force the local authority to seek fresh compulsory powers from Parliament before they could proceed with the scheme. Unless it were absolutely necessary so to construe the section, I should shrink from a construction which would have such results. I think, therefore, that "rights in or relating to the land" in the section, must include not only existing rights, but nascent, growing, or inchoate rights which are capable of being measured by a money compensation. The Act provides for compensation being made for any loss sustained by reason of the section, and I think that if we are to give that wide construction to the word rights we must place a similarly wide interpretation on the word loss, and hold that it includes anything, which is measurable in money, by which the full exercise of the powers of an owner are limited by anything which the local authority have power to do under the Act. This is, I think, a fair case for compensation, because the plaintiff has been prevented by the Act of Parliament from obtaining a valuable right which but for the operation of the Act he would have obtained. It is therefore a subject for compensation, but not for an action for damages. It follows I think that the judgment of Hawkins, J., was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff brought an action for interference with light to which he had acquired a legal title by an unobstructed user for twenty years. In answer to his claim it is said that the application of the Prescription Act has been defeated by the enactments in the Artizans' Dwelling Act, 1875, and that, the defendant being not only entitled, but bound, to do what he has done, the plaintiff cannot maintain an action for damages, although he is entitled to compensation. The plaintiff contends that he is not entitled to compensation because, at the time when this adjoining land was taken he had no right over it in respect of which he could be compensated. On the other hand, it is said that, even if he is not entitled to compensation, nevertheless, he cannot sue the defendant for damages. The case, therefore, turns on the meaning which we are to give to the word "rights" in section 20. According to the ordinary meaning of language, no doubt the plaintiff's interest at the time the land was taken was not an existing right. But in this case we have to apply the well-known rule that, although we are bound to give the language of an Act of Parliament its ordinary meaning, yet, if there are circumstances in the Act which show that the words were used in a sense larger than their ordinary meaning, we are bound to give them that extended construction. It therefore becomes necessary to examine this Act of Parliament to see whether the plaintiff can or cannot maintain his action. On carefully looking at the Act, and at the recitals to the Act, it appears to me that it became the duty of the authority to carry out the scheme as soon as it had been properly authorized. In order to carry out a scheme of improvement it is almost a necessity that there should be higher and larger buildings. The local authority had the right to prescribe the elevation of the buildings, and the defendant was only allowed to take the land in question on condition of his putting up buildings in conformity with the scheme. This, to my mind, affords strong ground for saying that, even if the plaintiff could not get any compensation, nevertheless he cannot sue for damages. But I should not like so to decide. The courts have always set their faces against any interference with a man's interest without due compensation. It is plain that if the plaintiff is to have the right which he claims, he could prevent the local authority from carrying out the scheme, but, if he is to lose the right, one would expect that he should have compensation. It cannot have been intended that where, as in the present case, the plaintiff had, at the time the land was taken, an inchoate right, and the local authority were unable to bar that inchoate right before it became, by virtue of the lapse of time and of the Prescription Act, an existing right, the owner of that right should be able to obtain an injunction to prevent the local authority from doing the very thing which they were bound by Act of Parliament to do.

I think, therefore, that the effect of section 20 is that the land purchased is a clean piece of land free from any rights of any kind whether existing or inchoate. I think that if a person has at the time of the purchase property in such a state that if things remained unaltered he would in process of time acquire a right, he has an inchoate right which is extinguished under the section, and for which he is entitled to receive compensation. I have considerable doubts whether, if no house had been built on the land for instance, the owner would still have an inchoate right to light, but if nothing had to be done to acquire the right but allow the years to elapse, then I think there is an inchoate right. I think that the plaintiff is still entitled to compensation, but he is not entitled to damages, and the appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—In 1867 the plaintiff completed the erection of his house. In 1877 the Corporation of Birmingham purchased the land opposite to it for the purposes of their scheme of improvement. In 1886 they let it to the defendant under terms which required him to erect upon it certain buildings which were erected by him in 1888, and which interfered with the access of light to the plaintiff's house. The present action is then brought, and the defendant sets up that the right acquired by the plaintiff was extinguished in 1877 by the operation of section 20. The plaintiff replies that in 1877 he had acquired no right, having only had ten years' user of the light, and that his right did not come into existence till 1887. The question, therefore, turns on the words of the section. Primâ facie it appears only to refer to existent rights. But when the object of the Act of Parliament is considered, it is plain that the word rights was not intended to be limited to its ordinary meaning. The local authority intrusted with the duty of seeing the scheme carried out are a public body and not a private profit seeking association. They are bound to do certain things for the public interest. The elevation of buildings must be within their power, and therefore the Corporation of Birmingham had a public duty to prescribe the elevation of buildings erected under the scheme. To do so they must be independent of any rights as to the lights of adjoining property, whether those rights had accrued or were accruing, and therefore inchoate at the time of the purchase of the land. Otherwise they would be fettered in a manner highly inconvenient and practically inconsistent with the objects of the Act. A large interpretation must therefore be put upon the section, and it must be held to include the right to count the years of user which already had run when the purchase was made. The liability to compensate must be read as co-extensive with the rights extinguished. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Practice—Appeal—Criminal cause or matter—Contempt of court—Publication of comments calculated to prejudice fair trial of a civil proceeding—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), ss. 19, 47.

An application made by a party to a civil action then pending, against a stranger to the action, for attachment for contempt of court committed by the publication in a newspaper of comments calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the civil action, is a "criminal cause or matter" within the meaning of section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and no appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from a judgment imposing punishment for such contempt, made on such application, by a judge of the High Court.

Reg. v. Barnardo, Tye's case, 37 W. R. 789, 23 Q. B. D. 305, distinguished.

Appeal from Butt, J.

The point raised and decided in this appeal was that an application for attachment for a contempt of court, consisting in the publication by a newspaper of comments calculated to prejudice the fair trial of a civil action then pending, is a "criminal cause or matter" within the meaning of section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873,* and, therefore, that no appeal lies from a judgment inflicting punishment for such contempt, made on such application, by a judge of the High Court.

After the institution of a divorce action by a husband against his wife, but before the trial, an article containing comments calculated to prejudice the fair trial of the action was published in a newspaper.

An application for attachment for contempt of court was made by the petitioner in the divorce action, against a Mr. Tuohy, who was not a party to the divorce action, but who was alleged to be a person responsible for the publication of the newspaper. The application was intituled with the title of the divorce action, and was also intituled "In re Tuohy."

Butt, J., on the hearing of the application, made an order imposing a fine of £100 on Mr. Tuohy for contempt of court, committed by the publication of the newspaper containing the above-mentioned article, for which publication Butt, J., held Mr. Tuohy to be a person responsible.

From this order Tuohy appealed.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., Asquith, Q.C., and Beskill, for the appellant.—The other side intend to take a preliminary objection as to the appeal being heard, on the ground that the order appealed from was an order "in a criminal cause or matter," and, therefore, that no appeal lies, having regard to section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873. But that section does not mean that no appeal shall lie, when the act which originates the proceeding in which the order is made is a crime, but it means that no appeal shall lie when the cause or matter, in which the order is made, is in the nature of a criminal proceeding: Per Cotton, L.J., in Reg. v. Barnardo, 37 W. R. 789, 23 Q. B. D. 305. In the case of Ex parte Alice Woodhall, 36 W. R. 655, 20 Q. B. D. 832, it was held that no appeal lay from a refusal by the Queen's Bench Division of an application for a writ of habeas corpus made on behalf of a person arrested as a fugitive criminal accused of an extradition crime; and that was on the ground that the order appealed from, was an order made determining a question raised in or with regard to proceedings, the subject-matter of which was criminal—viz., the extradition proceedings before the magistrate. In Hunt v. Clarke, 37 W. R. 724, and Reg. v. Jordan, 36 W. R. 797, appeals were heard from orders made on applications with reference to contempts of court very like the present, but no objection to the appeals being heard was taken by counsel, though in Reg. v. Jordan the court, after judgment had been delivered, expressed a doubt as to whether an appeal lay. The order appealed from in the present case is an order made in the divorce action, and is so intituled.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., Inderwick, Q.C., and Lewis Coward, for the respondent.—There are different kinds of orders for attachment for contempt of court, and different kinds of contempt. A contempt consisting of an attempt to interfere with the due course of justice is, in its nature, criminal, and an attachment for such contempt is a criminal process. The distinction between contempts and attachments of this nature, and contempts and attachments of a civil nature, is pointed out in In re Preston, 31 W. R. 804, 11 Q. B. D. 545. Some contempts of court are clearly capable of being regarded as criminal offences, and can be punished as such: In re Pollard, L. R. 2 P. C. 106, 17 W. R. P. C. Dig. 4. A contempt of court consisting of an endeavour to stifle the truth and prevent the execution of justice is a common law misdemeanour, 1 Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, ch. 6, ss. 1, 15, and is indictable as such, 2 Hawkins, ch. 25, s. 4; Russell on Crimes, 5th ed., vol. 1, p. 188; Earl Thanet and Fergusson's case, 27 State Trials, 822. Attachment is a process for dealing with a criminal offence awarded by the discretion of the justice upon a bare suggestion and without any indictment; it is properly grantable in cases of contempts against which all courts of record may proceed in a summary manner according to their discretion: 2 Hawkins, ch. 22, p. 206. The chief reason for giving the courts power to deal with contempts in a summary manner, is to secure prompt redress. The present appellant is not a party to the divorce proceedings, and the order against him is not an order directing him to do anything in the action, but it is solely to punish him for a gross interference with the administration of justice in the divorce action then pending before the court. The proceeding against the appellant is outside the divorce action altogether. The question as to what is a criminal cause or matter under section 47 was argued before the House of Lords on the appeal from the judgment of the

* The material part of section 47 is as follows:—"No appeal shall lie from any judgment of the High Court of Justice in any criminal cause or matter, save for some error of law apparent upon the record as to which no question shall have been reserved for the consideration of" the Court of Crown Cases Reserved.

Court of Appeal in Ex parte Bell-Cox, 36 W. R. 209, 20 Q. B. D. 1, but the judgment of the House of Lords has not yet been given.

They also referred to the Crown Office Rules, 1886, rr. 261, 271, 272.

Asquith, Q.C., in reply.—Though contempt of court is, in a sense, an offence, and though attachment is a punitive proceeding, and to that extent of a criminal nature, yet that does not constitute the proceeding in which the order now appealed from was made, "a criminal cause or matter" within the meaning of section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873. Section 100 of that Act defines the meaning of the word "cause" in that Act, as including "any action, suit, or other original proceeding between a plaintiff and a defendant and any criminal proceeding by the Crown"; and the word "matter" is defined as including "every proceeding in the court not in a cause." The application for attachment in the present case, is a proceeding in the civil action in the Divorce Division. The application is, in fact, made by the petitioner in the divorce action, and is intituled in that action, and the complaint is with reference to that action. The attachment proceedings were not independent proceedings instituted by the court itself, or by the Crown. No court or judge other than the judge who was trying the divorce action could have entertained the application for attachment. [COTTON, L.J.—Suppose a judge engaged in trying a cause is insulted or abused, could not an application to commit for contempt be made to and dealt with by some other judge?] I submit not. There is no instance of a proceeding by way of indictment for contempt of court, and the passages cited from Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, are merely dicta. The case of In re Freston is really in my favour. [Sir E. Clarke mentioned Skipworth's case, L. R. 9 Q. B. 230.]

COTTON, L.J.—The question raised in this case has never yet been the subject of decision, and as the question is an important one, and has been fully argued before us, I think we ought not to delay giving our judgment upon it.

The appeal is from an order of Butt, J., which inflicted a fine of £100 on the present appellant, and in default of payment attachment.

A preliminary objection has been taken to the appeal being heard, on the ground that by section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873, no appeal lies. [The Lord Justice read the section, and continued:—] Now is this a judgment in a criminal cause or matter. In my opinion it is.

It is quite true that motions very like that in the present case have at times been made, but the point now raised has never yet been dealt with, though in one case (Reg. v. Jordan) the other branch of the Court of Appeal did suggest a doubt (after the appeal had been heard) whether any appeal lay.

The present proceeding is for a contempt of court.

Of course, there are many contempts of court that have nothing criminal about them, as, for instance, where a man does not obey an order of the court, made in some civil proceeding, to do or to abstain from doing something—as in the case of an injunction against a defendant—and then a motion to commit him for contempt is made, and an order made thereon; that is really only to get something done in the course of the suit, and is not a criminal proceeding.

In the present case, however, though the notice of motion is intituled in the matter of the divorce suit (for the purpose of convenience), yet it is also intituled in the matter of an original application against Mr. Tuohy, and the essential part of the motion is the application to commit Mr. Tuohy for contempt.

It was argued that the application was made in the divorce suit, and was a proceeding in that suit, but the application was to commit, for a contempt consisting of an attempt to pervert the proper course of justice, by preventing this divorce suit being properly tried. That is contempt of a criminal nature, and is a criminal act. Authorities have been cited which showed that anything done to prejudice the judge or the jury in the trial of an action, was a criminal act, and the instances which are given, all refer to the same thing—viz., an attempt to pervert the due course of justice.

In the present case it is true the application for committal was made—not by the Attorney-General—but by the petitioner in the divorce suit, but it is conceded that the act done was a wrongful act, for there could otherwise have been no fine imposed, and therefore, in my opinion, though the application was made by the petitioner in the divorce action, yet it is in no way a proceeding in that action, but it is an independent application to prevent the course of justice being perverted.

It is quite true that in some cases (Reg. v. Barnardo was one), where a motion to commit very like the present was made, the court held that the proceeding did not come within section 47. Much stress was naturally laid on my own judgment in that case. I said: "Section 47 does not mean that no appeal shall lie when the act which originates the proceeding in which the order was made is a crime, but it means that no appeal shall lie when the cause or matter in which the order was made is in the nature of a criminal proceeding." Well, what was the proceeding there? It was to obtain something being done in the civil proceeding before the Queen's Bench Division. That is what I referred to in my judgment in that case.

But in the present case the whole proceeding was to punish the wrong done by the present appellant, and not to obtain anything being done in the civil action before the Divorce Division. It was a proceeding, therefore, outside the divorce action, and its object was only to obtain that fair trial which every suitor has a right to, and not to obtain the performance of any order made in the divorce action. In my opinion, therefore, section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873, does prevent us hearing this appeal.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In my opinion we have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal. The question turns on the true construction of two sections of the Judicature Act, 1873—viz., section 19 and section 47. [The Lord Justice read these sections, and continued:—] Does the present case come within section 19 or within section 47? In my opinion it comes within section 47.

This is really an appeal by Mr. Tuohy from a summary conviction for a criminal offence. His offence is clearly a criminal offence. I do not say it is an indictable offence, but, whether indictable or not, it is an instance, and the only instance I know of, of an offence punishable at common law by summary process.

As regards the cases, no case has been cited which conflicts with the view we take in our judgment in this case. In the case of Reg. v. Jordan counsel did not take (they purposely abstained from taking) the point now raised. After the appeal in that case had been heard and judgment given, the point occurred to me, and I said I was not satisfied that we had any jurisdiction to hear the appeal. I am now satisfied that we had no jurisdiction to hear it. The case of Reg. v. Barnardo is quite distinguishable from the present case.

There are obviously contempts and contempts; and attachment may sometimes be regarded merely as a civil proceeding. For instance, where an order was made by the Court of Chancery in former days, I can well remember the time when there was no mode of enforcing such an order except by attachment. One must not, therefore, be misled by the words "contempt" or "attachment," but the substance of the thing must be looked at.

In the present case it is a summary conviction for a criminal offence, and, therefore, no appeal lies.

LOPES, L.J.—The preliminary objection raises an important question—viz., whether the order for attachment made in this case is an order made in a criminal cause or matter within the meaning of section 47.

There are different kinds of attachments for contempt. One kind of attachment is to enforce obedience to an order, made in some civil suit or proceeding, against one of the parties to such suit, to do, or to abstain from doing, something, the not doing or the doing of which, is not criminal. That would not be within section 47; and the case of Reg. v. Barnardo is an example of that kind.

Another kind of attachment is in respect of an independent application against a person not a party to the suit, in respect of an act done outside the suit, and which act is criminal. That, I think, is within section 47. The application on which the present order was made is an application by Mr. O'Shea, a litigant in the divorce action, with reference to an attempt made by a stranger to interfere with and pervert the due process of justice in the action, but it is made outside the action. The object of the application was to obtain the punishment of Mr. Tuohy. The proceeding, in which this attachment was made, commenced with the motion against Mr. Tuohy, and ended with the order for his punishment. I am clearly of opinion that that is a criminal cause or matter. As to whether the offence committed by Mr. Tuohy is an indictable offence or not, I desire at present to express no opinion.

In re WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Building society — Advanced members — Borrowing members—Winding up—Liability to contribute to losses—Term of redemption.

Under one of the rules of a building society, deficiencies of income, by which the society might be prevented from meeting its anticipated expenditure and liabilities, were to be apportioned between the investing and borrowing members.

Held, that "liabilities" included the sums due to the investing members in respect of their shares, and that the borrowing members were liable to contribute rateably to any losses thereon incurred by the investing members.

Under another rule of the same society, the property mortgaged to the society to secure advanced shares was to be so secured until the amount of such shares should be repaid to the society, with all fines and other payments incurred in respect thereof.

Held, that, under the last-named rule, a borrowing member was not entitled to redeem his mortgage, except on payment of what might be due from him in respect of his above-mentioned liability.

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Adjourned summons.

A building society, established under the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, which was not registered under the Act of 1874, had advanced and unadvanced members, and had for its object the making of advances to members of the amount or value of their shares for the purposes of erecting or purchasing houses. It was provided that each share should be £120, and that the value of a member's share on his joining the society should be £60, and after that date its value should be determined according to the society's tables. Advances were to be made on the security of property to the satisfaction of the directors. It was provided by rule 18 that, "whenever the value of a share or shares shall be advanced to any member out of the funds of the society pursuant to these rules, the property shall be secured to the society by way of mortgage until the amount of such share or shares shall be repaid to the society with all fines and other payments incurred in respect thereof, and every such mortgage deed shall be made in such form and contain all such covenants, clauses, and provisoes, including a power of sale, as are usually inserted in deeds of the like nature, and as the solicitors of the society shall think proper." The rule with respect to the members' right of redemption was to the same effect, and in the mortgages which were taken by the society from its members as security for advances on their shares the proviso for redemption was framed in accordance with these provisions.

Rule 39, headed "Surplus Profits," provided "that the present and future surplus arising from the transactions of the society, after providing for all liabilities, shall, from time to time, be appropriated equitably and equally between the investing and borrowing members by way of bonus in proportion to the number of shares held by each member and the period subscribed for to the society."

Rule 40, headed "Deficiency of Income," provided that "the directors shall, every three years at least, take into consideration the general affairs and the gross receipts and expenditure of the society at special meetings of their body to be called for that purpose by the manager, and if they shall determine at such special meeting that there is a deficiency of income by which the society may be prevented from meeting its anticipated expenditure and liabilities, the amount of such deficiency shall be equitably and equally apportioned by the directors between the investing and borrowing members, and shall be paid by them severally and respectively forthwith, or by such monthly or quarterly instalments as the directors shall determine, and, if the same shall not be paid accordingly, every member who makes default shall pay the same fines as for an equal amount of subscriptions or repayments in arrear, as the case may be."

Losses having occurred through the fraud of a secretary, a resolution was passed for winding up, and a winding-up order under supervision was made on the 26th of November, 1889. The assets were sufficient to satisfy the outside creditors in full, but not to satisfy the claims of the non-advanced members. The liquidator claimed to make the advanced members contribute a rateable proportion of the loss which might be sustained by the other members, and the present was an application adjourned into court to obtain the decision of the court as to the liquidator's right to do so. No special meeting had ever been held under rule 40, except the meeting at which the resolution to wind up was passed, but his lordship held that to ascertain the deficiency of income was merely a question of machinery, and that the court could not determine the matter. It appeared that certain advanced members had applied to the liquidator in the winding up to accept payment of the subscriptions and other payments due on their shares and for a reconveyance, but he refused, on the ground that, even after the outside creditors were satisfied, the securities covered any sums payable by the advanced members in respect of their proportion of the losses.

Romer, Q.C., and Baker, for the liquidator.—Primâ facie the advanced members are not liable; Brownlie v. Russell, 8 App. Cas. 235, 31 W. R. Dig. 28; Tosh v. The North British Building Society, 35 W. R. 413, 11 App. Cas. 489; those cases, however, were decided on their special circumstances, but here, on the rules, advanced members are liable.

Byrne, Q.C., Wurtzburg, and T. B. Napier, for the advanced members and for a member who sought to redeem.—Advanced members are only liable to the claims of outside creditors. In re The Doncaster Permanent Building Society, 15 W. R. 102, L. R. 3 Eq. 158, not to claims by other members. In this case the claim is not within rule 40.

Romer, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—It is admitted that the assets of this society, after the outside creditors have been satisfied, may not be sufficient to repay the investing members the full amount of their shares, and the question now raised is whether this loss is to be borne by them exclusively, or whether the advanced members are liable to contribute rateably thereto so as to make the loss fall on both classes of members. To put a simple case by way of illustration, I will assume there to be only a single member of each class, and the assets after all liabilities have been discharged to amount to £100, and that the investing member is entitled to demand payment of a full share of £120, the question then being whether the other advanced member is liable to bear with the investing member this loss of £20. Now it is well established that in these societies advanced members are not liable to contribute to a loss such as this is, unless there be a contract between the members to that effect, and in the present case it is on the terms of rules 39 and 40 that this question must be determined. [His lordship then referred to the constitution and objects of the society, and continued:—] Now under rule 39 it is clear that profits are to be credited in a due proportion, both to the investing and to the advanced members. The effect of so doing in the case of the investing members is this, that supposing there to be no subsequent losses they will in a lesser time and with diminished payments have made up the amount of their shares. And, similarly, the advanced members who are paying their subscriptions on the footing of their mortgage deed will be relieved pro tanto from these payments.

Now the rule is headed "Surplus Profits," and it is in these terms. [His lordship read the rule and continued:—] The term "liabilities" here clearly includes the amounts due to the investing members. The balance-sheets of the society all state this as being so, and correctly; the first item of liability being always the value of shares not advanced upon. Of course there is nothing put down in respect of the advanced members' shares inasmuch as those have been paid. And in each of the balance-sheets down to 1886 there is inserted among the liabilities "profits due to members" not attributing this item to them rateably, but taking it as a gross sum due to them in a body. I have, therefore, no hesitation in holding under this rule that in estimating profits the sums payable to investing members must be treated as a liability.

But if the rule stood alone it is plain that the advanced members would still not be liable to contribute to this loss, for the agreement to divide profits is not sufficient to make them liable for losses. But then comes rule 40, which must be read in connection with rule 39. The rules in many societies are not expressed as carefully as is desirable, and they are often difficult to construe, and this rule is itself open to some such observation upon it. [His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] This language has been criticized in argument, especially the term "deficiency of income," which was apparently argued to be something distinct from "capital." But there is no such contrast in the rule, where "income" means merely all that comes into the society. This is clear from its very nature, for the subscriptions consist partly of principal and partly of interest, and there is in these societies no such distinction between capital and income as exists in companies which have a fixed capital—no distinction, that is, between the tree and its fruits. Under this rule the directors are to consider every three years whether the income will be sufficient to meet the expenditure and liabilities anticipated within that period, and to make provision accordingly. In my opinion any loss owing to which assets might be insufficient to meet the claims of investing members, would have to be included among such liabilities, and by the rule this is to be borne, not by the borrowing members alone, but by both classes equitably apportioned between them. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the liquidator's contention on this point is correct, and that the advanced members are liable to contribute to any losses sustained by the investing members in respect of their shares.

The other question is this. The advanced members are prepared to pay off all the society's claims under their security. But the liquidator contends that their securities include the just proportion of the loss of the society to which the advanced members is bound to contribute. This is contested by the advanced members. But this question is really disposed of by rule 18, in conformity with which the mortgage deed was framed. For it throws on the security, not merely the instalments and fines, but "other payments incurred," which is equivalent to saying "liabilities for payments." This is a liability accrued at the date when the advanced member seeks to redeem; it is, therefore, included in the security which cannot be redeemed until the payment is made. The exact amount due is not yet ascertained, but certum est quod certum reddi potest. I hold, therefore, that the advanced members cannot redeem their mortgages, except on payment of what may be due from them towards the losses sustained by the investing members, but I see no objection to the liquidator allowing them to redeem forthwith on their paying into court a sum provisionally assessed in respect of this liability.

HENDON LOCAL BOARD v. POUNCE. (a.)

Local government—Urban sanitary authority—Bye-laws—Entrance to new street—Width—"Construction" of new street—Validity of bye-laws—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 157.

One of the bye-laws of a local board, which had been allowed by the Local Government Board, provided as follows:—"Every person who shall construct a new street shall provide at one end at least of such street an entrance of a width equal to the width of such street and open from the ground upwards."

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that, upon the right construction of this bye-law, it prevented a landowner from constructing a new street and building upon his own land until he had provided an entrance to the new street of the requisite width; that the bye-law was not ultrà vires, and that it applied not merely to the making of the roadway, with sewers and footpaths, but also to the construction of the houses on each side and the gardens attached to them; and consequently, that, if the landowner could not provide the requisite entrance, either over his own land or by arrangement with some other landowner, then he could not utilize his land by constructing a new street and building houses upon it.

Baker v. Mayor of Portsmouth, 25 W. R. 677, 3 Ex. D. 4, followed.

Motion.

The action was brought by the Hendon Local Board, acting as the urban sanitary authority, against J. H. Pounce, an owner of land within the plaintiffs' district, and H. Cooper, a builder, and the relief claimed by the writ was an injunction to restrain the defendants from constructing a new street, called Ravenshurst-avenue, within the plaintiffs' district, until an entrance to such new street, of a width equal to the width thereof, was provided, and to restrain the defendant H. Cooper from building upon the land abutting upon the new street until such an entrance had been provided.

The plaintiffs' bye-laws, which had been allowed by the Local Government Board, provided as follows:—

1. "In the construction of the bye-laws relating to new streets and buildings the following words and expressions shall have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them, unless such meanings be repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the context or subject-matter in which such words or expressions occur; that is to say (inter alia):—

"'Width,' applied to a new street," means the whole extent of space intended to be used, or laid out so as to admit of being used, as a public way, exclusive of any steps or projections therein, and measured at right angles to the course or direction, or intended course or direction, of such street." . . .

4. "Every person who shall lay out a new street shall so lay out such street that the width thereof shall be forty feet at the least." . . .

6. "Every person who shall construct a new street shall provide at one end, at least, of such street an entrance of a width equal to the width of such street, and open from the ground upwards."

In December, 1886, J. H. Pounce—who was the owner of a field bounded on the north by a row of houses called Market-place abutting on an old road called Church-lane, running east and west and communicating with Church-lane by a passage about 17 feet wide running from north to south between two of the houses, on the south by a footway called Chapel-walk about 10 feet wide running from east to west, and on the east by houses built on land belonging to J. B. Mathews, which was bounded on the north by Church-lane and on the south by Chapel-walk—applied to the plaintiffs for permission to lay out a new street, forty feet in width, to be called Ravenshurst-avenue, to extend from the passage running from Church-lane into his field across his field in a southerly direction to Chapel-walk, in accordance with a plan deposited with his application. There was to be no access into Chapel-walk, and the only entrance to the proposed new street was by the passage leading into Church-lane, which passage was only 17 feet wide or thereabouts.

His plan was not approved by the plaintiffs on the ground that the proposed new street would violate their bye-laws.

J. H. Pounce then amended his plan by making, at the southern end of the proposed new street, an extension, forty feet in width, at right angles to the proposed new street from west to east, up to a piece of vacant ground belonging to J. B. Mathews which communicated with a street called John-street running parallel with the proposed new street across land belonging to J. B. Mathews, and terminating with Chapel-lane. The extension would not, however, join John-street unless it was carried over the intervening piece of vacant ground, which could not be done without the consent of J. B. Mathews.

On the application by J. B. Mathews to the plaintiffs in October, 1881, for permission to construct John-street, it had been made a condition by them that the piece of vacant ground forty feet in width should be left so as to form an entrance of that width to Pounce's land in case that land should at any time thereafter be built upon.

The report of the committee of the plaintiff board upon the amended application by J. H. Pounce was as follows: "Your committee, having fully considered the application and the minutes of the board of the 22nd of October, 1881, with reference to John-street, whereby it was stipulated that the two plots in John-street nearest Chapel-walk should be left vacant, in order to provide for any future new road down Chapel-walk of a width of forty feet required by the bye-laws, and, as Mr. Pounce's application proposes to construct a portion of such new street over the before-mentioned vacant plots into his proposed new street (Ravenshurst-avenue), your committee consider that if the proposed new street is laid out and constructed, as shown on the plans deposited by Mr. Pounce for the whole length between Church-lane and John-street, and of a width of forty feet from the old road at Church-lane end to John-street, and before any houses are allowed to be built in such street your committee would recommend the board to assent to Mr. Pounce's application."

In January, 1887, the plaintiffs resolved "that Mr. Pounce's plan be passed, subject to the conditions mentioned in the report."

J. H. Pounce accordingly commenced the construction of Ravenshurst-avenue, and made sewers and drains along it, and kerbed and paved the footpaths, and metalled the roadway of the part adjoining the passage leading into Church-lane. He also entered into an agreement with H. Cooper to let the land abutting on the new street for building.

H. Cooper then applied to the plaintiffs for permission to build houses abutting on Ravenshurst-avenue; but the plaintiffs rejected his application, on the ground that the new street had not been constructed in accordance with the resolution of the plaintiffs or with their bye-laws, as it had not been carried over the vacant piece of land belonging to J. B. Mathews so as to be connected with John-street.

H. Cooper, however, with the assent of J. H. Pounce, commenced building houses on the land abutting Ravenshurst-avenue, and continued to do so notwithstanding a notice from the plaintiffs directing him to stop building. The plaintiffs accordingly commenced the present action.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs for an interim injunction in the terms of the claim by their writ.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Yate Lee, and R. Cunningham Glen, for the motion.—The building of houses abutting on the street is an infringement of the 6th bye-law, which applies to buildings on each side of a new street: Baker v. The Mayor, &c., of Portsmouth, 25 W. R. 677, 3 Ex. D. 4. The defendants must provide an entrance of the same width as the street before building houses abutting upon it.

Everitt, Q.C., and Vernon R. Smith, for the defendants.—The right construction of the 6th bye-law is, that a person constructing a new street must provide an entrance of a width equal to the width of the street as far as his land extends. It does not apply to the case where his land is approached by an entrance narrower than the new street, which entrance is over another person's land. It does not compel him to provide an entrance of a width equal to the width of the new street when the entrance is through the land of another person, over whom he has no control. This construction would make the bye-law ultrà vires and void as being unauthorized by section 157 (2) of the Public Health Act, 1875. The defendants have provided an entrance, as far as their land is concerned, of a width equal to the width of the new street, and are, therefore, entitled to construct the new street. The case of Baker v. The Mayor, &c., of Portsmouth is not in point, but refers to the power of a local board to provide for the pulling down of buildings erected in violation of their bye-laws.

NORTH, J., stated the facts, and proceeded :—If the defendants had done what the local board assented to, when they approved conditionally of the new plan, there would have been an entrance forty feet wide at the end of Ravenshurst-avenue, adjoining John-street, which would have been acceptable to the local board, and their approval would have been given. But the defendants cannot take advantage of that, because that has not yet been done, and therefore the time has not come at which the defendants can rely on the conditional approval so given by the board. At present the defendants have merely commenced making the new road called Ravenshurst-avenue at the northern end, and the rest of it is not made at all. It is, as I understand, marked out, and some sods may have been taken off, but nothing like constructing a road has taken place, except at the northern end. The road has only been constructed at the northern end, and, according to the plans which have been handed to me, some houses, about ten in number, have been, or are going to be, built, on one side at least, if not on both sides of the road. That cannot be justified by what it is proposed to do at the south end of the new road, inasmuch as it has not yet been done. The only question is, whether it can be justified by what has been done at the north end of Ravenshurst-avenue. [His lordship referred to section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the bye-laws 4 and 6, and continued :—] The 4th bye-law applies to Ravenshurst-avenue, and makes it essential that it shall be at least forty feet wide from one end to the other.

Then the 6th bye-law provides for something else. It does not refer to the new street, because the whole width of the new street from beginning to end has been fixed by the 4th bye-law at forty feet. The 6th bye-law provides that there is to be "an entrance" forty feet wide. That does not mean that a part of the new street is to be forty feet wide, because the whole street is to be of that width, but it means that the mode of access to the new street so made is to be of a width equal to the width of the new street. The object of that is plain. It would be of no use to have a new street forty feet wide throughout if at the end of that street the access is only by a narrow space fifteen or twenty feet wide. Therefore, it is required that a person who proposes to construct a new street shall, before he is allowed to make it, provide an entrance to it of equal width with the street. It appears to me, therefore, that, so long as the access from Ravenshurst-avenue to John-street is not made, the defendants are not entitled to make any part of their new street until they have provided an entrance to it at the north end forty feet wide. In my opinion, therefore, they are wrong in attempting to proceed with the erection of houses abutting upon the proposed new street until an entrance to it forty feet wide has been provided. One way of doing this is by making the street throughout to John-street, and if the defendants had done that there would have been provided at one end an entrance forty feet wide, and they could go on with the construction of the new street ; but, if they do not choose to do that, then they must provide an adequate entrance at the other end, by enlarging the narrow part to the proper width.

It is said that it would be unreasonable to suppose that the bye-law compels them to do this on someone else's land. It does not do anything of the sort. As I construe it, all that the bye-law does is this—it prevents the landowner from building upon his own land until he has provided an entrance to it of the specified width. He may be able to provide the entrance over another man's land by arrangement with him, but if he cannot provide the requisite entrance, either over his own land or by arrangement with some other landowner, then the only result is that he cannot utilize his own land by constructing a new street and building houses upon it. The bye-law does not require him to do anything upon another man's land ; it only says, you cannot construct a new street on your own land unless you provide an adequate entrance to it. That disposes of the first point raised—viz., that the defendants have complied with the bye-laws, because this new street is forty feet wide. They have complied with the 4th bye-law, but they have not complied with the 6th, because they have not provided an entrance to the new street of the same width as the street itself.

Then it is said that this bye-law is invalid, as being ultrà vires. Of course, if it were, it would not be enforced. But, in my opinion, it is not ultrà vires, and I think that is decided by the case of Baker v. Mayor of Portsmouth. The question there arose upon a similar bye-law made by a local board under section 34 of the Local Government Act of 1858, and it was decided that the power given by that Act to make bye-laws with respect to the level, width, and construction of new streets included not merely the making of the street proper, that is, the roadway, with the sewers and footpaths, but also the making of the houses on each side, and the gardens between them and the road itself. It is clear, therefore, that this bye-law is not ultrà vires.

Then it is said that the bye-law is unreasonable, and therefore invalid. It is difficult to see how it can be unreasonable if it is intrà vires. But, in my opinion, there is nothing unreasonable in it. It would be absurd to say that the board were right in insisting on the road being forty feet wide if they are not to gain the advantages which a road of that width would give. The object is, for sanitary reasons, to admit light and air, and to allow the wind to sweep freely along the road. A road of that width is much more healthy than a narrower one, and, of course, the benefit of a road of that width will be only partially secured if it is closed in at each end, or, at any rate, one end, by an entrance so narrow that a free draught of air through it is prevented. I can see nothing unreasonable in saying that the person who constructs a new road shall provide an entrance as wide as the road itself, and it is quite clear that in the present case the board are not acting unreasonably, because they are willing to allow the road to be made with access to John-street. In my opinion, the plaintiffs are in the right, and I think the bye-law applies to the buildings on each side of the new street as well as to the street or roadway itself. The injunction, therefore, must go against the builder, as well as against the owner of the land, until the trial of the action or until further order.

KEELING v. SMITH. (a.)

Will—Construction—Condition—Marriage with consent of trustees.

Where a testator attaches, as a condition to the enjoyment of property given by his will, that the beneficiary shall, if he marry, do so with the consent of his trustees, but prescribes no particular form of consent, the court will treat such consent as a matter of substance rather than of form, and will hold that the condition has been satisfied if the consent has been substantially given.

Daley v. Desbouverie, 2 Atk. 261, followed.

Adjourned summons.

Theophilus Smith, who died on the 22nd of September, 1882, by his will, dated the 11th of December, 1882, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to three trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and for investment, and directed them to hold such investments upon trust as to one moiety thereof to pay the income arising therefrom to his son, H. W. Smith, during his life or until marriage, and, after the marriage of his said son, "with the consent of at least two of the trustees for the time being thereof, then I declare that my trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of the said moiety or equal part in trust for my said son absolutely." The testator provided that if his said son should die without having been married, then his trustees should stand possessed of such income and the investments for the time being representing the same upon the same trusts as were thereafter declared concerning the other moiety. And the testator directed that the other moiety should be held upon trust for his two grandchildren, Eliza E. Walters and H. A. Walters, as therein mentioned.

H. W. Smith married, and the question was whether he had done so with the consent of two of his father's trustees so as to become entitled to a moiety of the residuary estate.

The circumstances under which the marriage took place were the following:—

One of the trustees was unable from ill health to give evidence, but an affidavit by the other two contained the following paragraph:—"None of us gave any consent to the said marriage of the defendant, H. W. Smith, unless a consent thereto is to be inferred from the circumstances hereinafter stated, but we have never refused to give our consent to the marriage. We have not any objection to the marriage, and at the time when the defendant, H. W. Smith, applied to us as hereinafter stated we had no objection to the lady. We were, however, of opinion that it was not at that time desirable that the said defendant should marry, or should be put in possession of the capital of his share under the testator's will."

This evidence was supplemented by the evidence of H. W. Smith himself, who said that the above paragraph of the trustees' affidavit did not fully give an account of what occurred at the interview therein mentioned, and that one of the trustees on that occasion said to him after he had asked the trustees' consent to his marriage, "We see no objection, but we should like you to make your application in writing," leading him thereby to suppose that the writing was merely a matter of form.

A formal letter was written on the 5th of January, 1885, to which an answer was sent on the 13th of January, the meaning of which his lordship held was that the trustees understood that, as the lady did not intend to marry him, it was not necessary for them to give any consent.

The marriage took place on the 2nd of March, 1885.

Hastings, Q.C., and Eastwick, for H. W. Smith.—There is sufficient evidence here of consent by the trustees. The will does not require that the consent shall be in writing. The trustees never refused their consent, and their statements, which appear from their affidavit, must be regarded as equivalent to consent. Where no particular mode of consent is prescribed by the instrument it may be inferred from conduct: Berkley v. Ryder, 2 Ves. sen. 533; Campbell v. Lord Netterville, cited Ibid. 534; Mesgrett v. Mesgrett, 2 Vern. 580; Daley v. Desbouverie, 2 Atk. 261; Clarke v. Parker, 19 Ves. 1; Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atk. 330; Harvey v. Aston, 1 Atk. 361. The court leans strongly against stripping a child of its provision: Burleton v. Humfrey, Amb. 256.

Buckley, Q.C., and Colt, for H. A. Walters and the trustees of Mrs. Mason's (formerly E. E. Walters) marriage settlement.—There was no tacit consent by the trustees to the marriage. The evidence shows that the trustees, so far from consenting to the marriage, opposed it, and for the reasons stated in the affidavit. Previous consent must be shown, and no regard must be had to subsequent approbation. Campbell v. Lord Netterville merely shows how far such consent may be implied. Daley v. Desbouverie was not really a case of implied consent, for there there was a letter signed by the trustees containing the statement "We shall be obliged to consent," which was held equivalent to consent. Mesgrett v. Mesgrett was a case of fraud. In Burleton v. Humfrey the words were "consent and approbation," and it was held that the word "and" was to be construed to mean "or." The case is not, therefore, an authority upon the present question. The cases were reviewed in Clarke v. Parker, and the result deduced therefrom was that, although the court may wish to struggle to prevent a child being deprived of its portion, yet it must see that the condition is fulfilled. The consent must be given before the marriage, subsequent approbation will not suffice.

Hastings, Q.C., was not called upon in reply.

STIRLING, J., stated the will, and continued:—The son has married, and the question I have now to decide is whether he has married "with the consent of at least two of the trustees for the time being."

In the first place it is to be observed upon the terms of the will that the testator has not prescribed that the consent of the trustees is to be given in any particular form or manner, and it is enough that there should be the consent of two of the trustees for the time being. It is also to be observed that in dealing with cases of this kind the court has from an early period treated the consent to be given to the marriage as a matter of substance rather than of form, and that when the court finds that substantially the consent has been given it has not looked very minutely into the form which the consent has taken.

This is, perhaps, shown by no case more strongly than by that of Daley v. Desbouverie, decided by Lord Hardwicke as far back as 1738. In that case there was a gift over in case Lady Ann Burke should marry without the consent of her trustees, and there was then the peculiar feature that at first there was an absolute refusal of such consent, but there was afterwards a letter written by the trustees, which contained this passage:—"If Mr. Daley's father will make the settlement proposed, we believe the young folks are too far engaged for us to attempt to break off the match, and, therefore, we shall be obliged to consent to it." That was not in form a letter expressing any present consent at all, but, rather, an expression of a future consent to be given on terms. Mr. Daley's father was willing to make a settlement, though not in precisely the terms proposed by the trustees, and after some negotiations, which did not come to anything, the plaintiffs, Lady Ann and Mr. Daley, were married, according to the evidence, at the Fleet "by John Gagnam, the famous Fleet parson, on the 6th of June, 1785," so that it was a secret marriage, and the question whether that was a marriage with consent came before Lord Hardwicke for decision; and his lordship, in deciding that the marriage was substantially with the consent of the trustees, towards the end of his judgment expressed himself as follows:—"It is manifest, both from the letter and disposition of Mr. Manley, one of the trustees, that he agreed to the proposal, and gave his consent that it should be a match; and the letter is likewise evidence that the trustees in general approved of the person, behaviour, and quality of Mr. Daley; and it is also evidence of their consent to the marriage, provided Mr. Daley, the father, will make the settlement he proposed. The words in the letter, 'We shall be obliged to consent,' mean from the necessity of the thing, and for the happiness of the lady, and ought to be construed a present consent, that, if the father would make the settlement, they would not break the match. . . . The trustees have signified their consent that a settlement should be made according to the prayer of the plaintiff's bill. And, therefore, I will decree accordingly." So that Lord Hardwicke held that the marriage was substantially with the consent of the trustees.

I cannot find that this case has ever been overruled. On the contrary, in Clarke v. Parker Lord Eldon was not at all prepared to depart from it, for in the very last paragraph of his judgment he says:—"There are so many cases in which the court has thought itself at liberty to conceive consent to have been given substantially, though not in terms, that I do not think it right to decide this case without directing inquiries, with a view to bring fully before the court matter which is in some degree before it." That was in relation to the question whether a substantial consent could be inferred from the acts of one of the trustees who had not given a formal consent. That was the principle upon which the present case ought to be dealt with, and the evidence here stands thus: [His lordship then stated the evidence of the trustees as above set forth, and continued:—] So to the marriage itself they had no objection, although they were of opinion that at present it had better not take place. That is to say, they stood in very much the same position as the trustees in Daley v. Desbouverie, and their evidence amounts to this, "We consent, provided the marriage takes place at the proper time." That evidence should be supplemented by the evidence of Mr. H. W. Smith himself. [His lordship then referred to the evidence of H. W. Smith and to the letters above stated.] Upon that evidence it was said that the trustees never considered the matter, and never really gave their consent.

In my opinion I ought not so to regard it. I think that they did consider the substance of the matter—i.e., whether or not it was a proper marriage; and that they came to the conclusion that it was, though they attached the proviso that it should take place at a proper time. That brings the case within Daley v. Desbouverie, and I accordingly come to the conclusion that consent to the marriage had substantially been given, and that the son is now entitled to a moiety of the residuary estate.

TOWNEND v. SHERIFF OF YORKSHIRE. (a.)

Sheriff—Execution—Sheriff's costs and charges—Taxation by district registrar—Appeal—Sheriffs Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 55), s. 20, sub-section (2)—General Order of August 31, 1888, schedule.

The schedule to the General Order made on the 31*st of August*, 1888, in pursuance of section 20, sub-section (2), of the Sheriffs Act, 1887, provides for the taxation by a master or a district registrar of the sheriff's costs and charges of an execution, "in case the sheriff and the party liable to pay such costs and charges differ as to the amount thereof." The power of the taxing officer under this provision is limited to the ascertainment of the amount of the costs and charges according to the scale in the schedule; he is to assume them to have been properly incurred, and cannot deal with the question of liability. There is, therefore, no appeal from his decision.

This was an appeal from the decision of Day, J., in chambers that he had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal from a taxation by the Manchester District Registrar under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff had recovered judgment in an action of Townend v. Dunn, and a writ of fi. fa. was placed in the hands of the sheriff for execution, the name of Dunn's residence being indorsed on the writ. The sheriff's officer, on seizing some goods at the place named, was informed that all the property there, belonged to Dunn's wife. He afterwards discovered two other places where Dunn carried on business, and he seized goods at each of them. In each case a bill of sale was set up. The sheriff took interpleader proceedings, and his claims were dismissed, these two seizures thus proving ineffectual. The sheriff and the plaintiff differing as to the amount of the sheriff's costs and charges, they were taxed by the district registrar. He allowed one guinea in respect of each of the three seizures according to the table of fees in the schedule to the General Order made on the 31st of August, 1888, under the Sheriffs Act, 1887. That table provides—

2. For seizure by the sheriff's officer:—

For each building or place separately rated at which a seizure is made ... £1 1 0

The plaintiff disputed the right of the sheriff to receive any payment for the abortive seizures at the two houses other than the one named in the writ, and this contention formed the ground of his appeal; but, as will be seen from this report, this question was not decided.

C. A. Russell, for the plaintiff.—The sheriff has seized goods of a third person to satisfy our claim against Dunn, and he has no right to be paid for this. The district registrar, by allowing his ordinary fee, has decided that he has that right, and there is an appeal from his decision. This is an ordinary taxation in the High Court and is subject to review. Ord. 65, r. 27 (39—41) apply. This order as to taxation of sheriff's costs is ultra vires; the Act is a consolidating Act, and is not intended to alter the law.

J. V. Austin, for the sheriff, was not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the order of Day, J., following a similar order of Field, J., was right. This is an attempt to review the taxation, under the General Order of the 31st of August, 1888, by the district registrar of the fees recoverable by the sheriff from the execution creditor. No. 2 in the table of fees issued as a schedule to that order is "for seizure by the sheriff's officer—for each building or place separately rated at which a seizure is made, £1 1s.," and at the end of this scale it is provided that "the amount of any costs and charges payable under this scale shall be taxed by a master of the Supreme Court or district registrar of the High Court (as the case may be) in case the sheriff and the party liable to pay such costs and charges differ as to the amount thereof." It has been argued that the word "tax" being used in this rule, the serious consequence follows, that in every taxation of a sheriff's costs by the taxing master or district registrar there is an appeal (through the intermediate courts) to the House of Lords. It is said that the word "tax" always carries with it certain incidents. Without denying that the general principle is that taxation is subject to review, one must construe enactments with reference to their subject-matter, and it would be foolish to extend the principle to matters to which it was never intended to apply. It was certainly not in the minds of the framers of the rules that an appeal should lie to the House of Lords about every sum of 5s. or 7s. 6d. sheriff's costs. The question, no doubt, is not what was in the minds of the framers of the rules, but whether the words bear the meaning suggested, and I think they do not. All the rule says is, that the district registrar is to tax in case the parties differ as to the amount. Mr. Russell contended that it was not the amount that was called in question here, but the right of the sheriff to take anything in respect of the seizures at these two houses, and that the registrar had to deal with that question. I think not; any more than in a taxation of an attorney's bill of costs questions of retainer or of the attorney's negligence are gone into; the retainer is assumed, and the taxing master only decides whether the proper amount is charged in the bill upon that assumption. This rule seems to me to contemplate the possibility of some seizures being inoperative, and still the taxing master has to tax. It is true that in almost every question as to the amount of a charge the right to charge anything at all, is involved, but where the amount alone is the subject mentioned in the rule, I think that that alone is to be dealt with by the taxing master. The judgment creditor is not without remedy, for if it be true that an amount has been given to the sheriff without his having a right to any amount at all, that question can be raised by an action with all the appeals incident to an action. I think, therefore, that there is no appeal from the decision of the district registrar, which is simply as to the amount. A very serious question was raised as to the validity of these rules, but that cannot be gone into on this occasion, and I express no opinion upon it.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I agree. The district registrar has taxed the amount to be paid to the sheriff, and Day, J., held that there was no appeal from his taxation. The sole question which we have to decide is whether or not the district registrar or the taxing master (as the case may be) is made the sole judge. [His lordship then read section 20, sub-section 2, and referred to the table of fees.] When one looks at the scale of fees one sees that there are many matters to be gone into which are matters of arithmetical calculation and nothing else. It is argued that the ordinary principles of taxation should be applied in this case. But that is not so; the object of the taxation is to ascertain an amount; the ascertainment of that amount fixes no liability on the parties and no order to pay is made. The objection here is that the sheriff did not do his duty when he made seizures in two of the three houses, and that may be a matter for much argument, but it was not a matter which the district registrar could go into.

Appeal dismissed.

DUKE OF NORFOLK v. LAMARQUE (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Manorial dues—Profits—Cost of collection—Deductions—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 60, schedule (A), rr. II., 4; s. 159.

In estimating the value of manorial dues under schedule (A) of the Income Tax Act, 1842, the lord of the manor is not entitled to deduct the costs of collection, such costs not being specified in the Act as an authorized deduction.

Case stated for the opinion of the court under section 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 19).

The Duke of Norfolk, lord of the manor of Dorking, was assessed to income tax for the year ending the 5th of April, 1889, in the sum of £178 9s., being the amount admitted to have been received or to be receivable by him on an average of the seven preceding years in respect of the amount of the profits of the manor for that year. This assessment was made under the Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 60, schedule (A). The 4th of the rules for estimating the lands under schedule (A), No. II., provides for the computation of the annual value "of manors and other royalties, including all dues and other services or other casual profits (not being rents or other annual payments reserved or charged) on an average of the seven preceding years to be charged on the lord of such manor, or royalty, or person renting the same." By section 159 no other deductions than such as are expressly enumerated in the Act are to be made. The Duke claimed to deduct from the amount of the assessment a sum of £38, being the costs incurred by him in the collection of the manorial rights and dues. He appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the Wotton Division of the county of Surrey against the refusal by the surveyor of taxes to allow this deduction. The commissioners dismissed the appeal, and at the request of the appellant stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Lyon, for the appellant.—I admit that the cost of collection is not included in the deductions authorized by the Act—schedule (A), V., and section 159—but this expense is necessarily incurred, for these dues could not be collected by the lord of the manor personally. Therefore the profits are not to be computed until the cost of collection has been defrayed, and it is the profits only which are taxed. The words are, "including all dues and other services or other casual profits": Stevens v. Bishop, 36 W. R. 421, 20 Q. B. D. 442.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (A. V. Dicey and E. Griffin, with him), argued that no deductions were to be made except those specified in the Act, and referred to section 159 and schedule (A), V., and cited Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 29 W. R. 717, 6 App. Cas. 315.

Lyon replied.

POLLOCK, B.—In my judgment this appeal fails. Mr. Lyon very properly admitted that this amount sought to to be deducted was not one of the deductions named in the Act of Parliament, and that admission, to my mind, goes a little further than at first sight appears; because, if you turn to the deductions which are admitted and provided for by the Act (they are to be found at page 59 of Mr. Dowell's book) you will find that they are not items which are essential to be deducted before you can arrive at any fixed sum—as in the case of manufacturers an outlay for rent, for materials, salaries of workmen, and so forth—but they are items which would come after the profit derived from the particular subject-matter which is taxed is obtained. It is therefore clear that this is in no sense a deduction of that kind.

Neither is it a deduction to be made before you can arrive at the amount which is to be returned by the person who is taxed. The Act requires the lord of a manor to return the amount of all dues and other services or other casual profits of the manor on an average of seven years.

It is when we look at rules I. and II. of schedule (A) that the greatest difficulty arises. It is plain that no analogy whatever can be drawn from profits earned in manufactures or mercantile concerns, for those profits are the result of outlay made for the purpose of earning them: but the money paid for collecting rent is not spent for the purpose of earning the rent. The use of the word "profits" in No. II. is certainly not very happy. The annual value of certain properties is to be "understood to be the full amount for one year or the average amount for one year of the profits received therefrom." "Profits" here means, to my mind, the average amount for one year of the interest or property that the man has in those rights which are taxed. The words relating to manors and royalties (sub-rule 4 of No. II.), are "on an average of the seven preceding years to be charged on the lord of such manor, or royalty, or person renting the same." These profits are treated as rent issuing out of property which belongs to the lord in fee simple.

The only other doubt which I have felt has been occasioned by the case of Stevens v. Bishop; but there is certainly a distinction between the cases; in my opinion the real ground of the decision there is that it was admitted by the Crown that the sum claimed to be deducted was expended necessarily and properly; that is not so here. In this case I think the full amount is subject to duty and the appeal fails.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion.

KNILL v. TOWSE. (a.)

Election law—County council—Registration—Right of voting in more than one division of a county—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 2, sub-sections (1), (2) (e), (4); s. 75—County Electors Act, 1888 (51 Vict. c. 10), s. 7, sub-sections (1), (2), (4), (5) —Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 44, sub-section (1); s. 45, sub-section (6); s. 51, sub-section (2).

Under the Local Government Act, 1888, an elector is not entitled to vote in more than one electoral division of an administrative county, although qualified and duly registered under the County Electors Act, 1888, in more than one division.

Appeal from the City of London Court.

The plaintiff had a residence in the Greenwich electoral division of the administrative county of London and a place of business in the City of London division of the same county, and was duly registered as an elector in the registers of both divisions. At an election of county councillors in January, 1889, the plaintiff voted in the Greenwich division and subsequently presented himself at a polling station in the City of London division where the defendant was acting as presiding officer, and demanded a ballot paper to enable him to vote. The defendant refused to receive the vote or to supply a ballot paper, on the ground that each elector could only vote in one division.

An action having been brought in the City of London Court to recover damages for such refusal, the judge gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Russell Griffiths, for the plaintiff.

Vaughan Williams, Q.C., and J. V. Austin, for the defendant.

The arguments are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Dec. 18.—The following written judgment of the COURT was delivered by MATHEW, J.—This was an action brought to try the question whether the plaintiff was entitled to vote at the same election in two electoral divisions of the administrative county of London.

The plaintiff's vote had been refused by the defendant, as presiding officer for the City division, on the ground that the plaintiff had already voted in the Greenwich electoral division, and the plaintiff sued the defendant in the City of London Court to recover damages for rejecting the plaintiff's vote.

The case raised the question whether in elections for county councils an elector having a qualification in more than one division can vote in each of such divisions, or can vote only once.

It was admitted that the plaintiff was a duly registered elector for the City and for the Greenwich electoral division, that he had voted in the latter division before he demanded a voting paper and proposed to vote in the City, and that his vote had been on that ground rejected by the defendant in the City electoral division.

The case came on for trial before the judge of the City of London Court, who gave judgment for the defendant, and against this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

The argument for the plaintiff may be stated thus. The Local Government Act, 1888, s. 2, sub-section (4), provides that, as respects the election of county councillors, the persons entitled to vote (elsewhere than in a borough) shall be the persons registered as county electors under the County Electors Act, 1888.

The plaintiff was admitted to be entitled to be placed on the roll of electors for both divisions under section 7, sub-section (1), of that Act. By sub-section (4), of section 7, nothing in that section is to prevent a county elector from being registered in more than one division register. And by sub-section (5), which is intended to secure that a parliamentary voter shall not vote at an election more than once in respect of different qualifications in the same parliamentary division, it is provided that the voter shall have the same right of voting at an election of a county authority as if the section did not apply. The case was therefore said to be perfectly clear when the Local Government Act and the County Electors Act were read together, and the argument that under section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1888, statutes were incorporated which might lead to a different conclusion, was met by reference to the express terms of that section, that no enactment is to be incorporated inconsistent with the provisions of the Local Government Act.

On the other hand, the defendant's counsel contended that the County Electors Act, when carefully examined, disclosed no intention that the elector for the county council was to be entitled to vote in each electoral division, as he clearly would have been if he were duly qualified as a voter in different parliamentary divisions. Section 7, sub-section (5), it was said, applied to parliamentary electors only, and the clause at the end of the section which preserved any right of voting at an election of a county authority did not define or specify what that right was. The object of sub-section (5), it was urged, was not to confer a double franchise on county council electors, but was to prevent the loss of a vote at an election for the county authority, as would be the result if, instead of an asterisk, there was an erasure of the voter's name in accordance with the Registration Act, 1885, s. 4, sub-section (9) (a). It was pointed out that by section 7 of the County Electors Act, 1888, sub-section (2), the Registration of Electors Acts and sections 45, 48, and 71 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, are to apply for the purposes of the section, with the substitution of "county register" and "division register" for "burgess roll" and "ward roll" respectively, and of "electoral division" for "ward." Then, by section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1888, portions of the Municipal Corporations Act are incorporated, and among them is the 51st section, which provides that no person shall vote in more than one ward; and by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 2, it is provided that the council of a county and the members thereof shall be constituted and elected in like manner and in like position in all respects as the council of a borough divided into wards, but subject to the provision (sub-section (2) (e)) that the divisions shall be called "electoral divisions," and not "wards." This provision, it was said, was the key to the true construction of the statute, and showed a clear intention that, under section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1888, section 51, sub-section (2), and section 59 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, should be incorporated with the Local Government Act.

If any provision of the County Electors Act was inconsistent it was pointed out that it was repealed by section 126.

It followed that the right of voting in divisions in administrative counties was to be dealt with as in wards in municipal elections, for which only one vote is allowed.

We are of opinion that the argument for the defendant must prevail, and that the judgment for the defendant must be affirmed. We cannot adopt the view that the clauses of the Municipal Corporations Act are inconsistent with the provisions of the principal Act with which they are incorporated. Those sections seem to us in harmony with section 2 of the statute.

We were much pressed with the argument for the plaintiff that the right to vote must follow the express provision of the County Electors Act, that the plaintiff was entitled to have his name placed on the list of voters for each electoral division.

It was insisted that the only object of being registered is to secure a right to vote; and that, if the right was once conferred, it was unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature would forthwith enact that the right should be taken away.

It was said to be almost disrespectful to the Legislature to suppose that in Acts of Parliament passed in the same session, and apparently intended to be read together, there could be found one set of provisions that gave and another that took away the right of the elector to vote in different divisions. But the argument rests upon what appears to us to be the erroneous view, that the County Electors Act and the Local Government Act are to be treated as if they were one statute. The County Electors Act came into operation some months before the Local Government Act, and at a time when the exact form which the later Act was to take had not been decided on. We consider that the intention of the Legislature must be sought from the later Act, and that it is impossible to give effect to its various provisions on this subject without holding that for the purpose of voting the electoral division of the administrative county is to be regarded as if it were a ward in a borough. It follows that the voter has only one vote at an election for an administrative county council. The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed, with costs.

We have arrived at this conclusion with some difficulty, though without doubt. The difficulty has arisen, not from anything inherent in the subject itself, which is simple enough, and might be quite simply treated, but from the mode of legislation now usual in these matters.

Sometimes whole Acts of Parliament, sometimes groups of clauses of Acts of Parliament, entirely or partially, sometimes portions of clauses, are incorporated into later Acts, so that the interpreter has to keep under his eye, or, if he can, bear in his mind, large masses of bygone and not always consistent legislation in order to gather the meaning of recent legislation. There is very often the further provision that these earlier statutes are incorporated only so far as they are not inconsistent with the statute into which they are incorporated; so that you have first to ascertain the meaning of a statute by reference to other statutes, and then to ascertain whether the earlier Acts qualify only or absolutely contradict the later ones, a task sometimes of great difficulty, always of great labour—a difficulty and labour, generally speaking, wholly unnecessary. It has, indeed, been suggested that to legislate in this fashion, keeping Parliament, in truth, in ignorance of what it is about, is the only way in which at the present day legislation is possible. We do not know whether the suggestion is correct; what we do know is that this procedure makes the interpretation of modern Acts of Parliament a very difficult, and sometimes doubtful, matter. We, the judges, have perhaps the least cause to complain. We sit here for the purpose, among other things, of interpreting Acts of Parliament, and we bring, or ought to bring, to our task trained and experienced intellects.

But in practical matters of everyday concern, such as the possession and exercise of the franchise, it is of the last importance that the law conferring it, and the rules which govern its exercise, should be easily comprehensible by the mass of the ordinary voters. We are well aware that protest as to past legislation is unavailing, but for the future to draw attention to a plain evil may perhaps be the first step towards its remedy.

Probate — Practice — Will — Attestation—Signature of third person under attestation clause — Omission of name in probate.

Where a will has been executed in the presence of two witnesses, and, in addition to their signatures, the signature of a third person, who was a legatee under the will, appeared at the foot of the will immediately below their signatures, the court will receive evidence to explain why such signature was written, and, if satisfied that it was not written with the intention to attest the signature of the will, it will, on motion after notice to all parties interested, and on their non-appearance, order the name so written at the foot of the will to be omitted in the probate.

Motion for a grant of probate of the will of John Smith, deceased, omitting the name of Emma Smith as signed by her after the attesting witnesses.

John Smith, late of Farnworth, in the county of Lancaster, duly made and executed his last will and testament, bearing date the 24th of July, 1884, whereby he gave a life interest in all his property to his wife, Emma Smith, and directed that after her death or remarriage it should be divided equally between his seven children. The will, which was on a printed form, was duly attested by John Catteral and John Hough, who signed on the two lines linked together in the form for the witnesses' signatures, and after the execution Emma Smith had signed her name immediately below the attesting witnesses. It appeared upon affidavit that she signed, not as attesting witness, but for the purpose of verifying the contents of the will at the request of her husband, who was of opinion that this was necessary for the validity of the will.

BUTT, J.—To bring myself strictly within that decision I shall direct notice to be served on all the children—on those who are minors through a guardian or person or persons to be nominated by the registrar for that purpose—and the motion will stand over for that purpose.

In re RHODES.

RHODES v. RHODES. (a.)

Lunatic—Maintenance—Implied obligation—Necessaries—Debt—Right to recover against estate of deceased lunatic not so found by inquisition payments made towards her maintenance.

Where sums of money have been expended for necessaries supplied to a lunatic not so found by inquisition, by a person who intends to be repaid for so doing, an obligation will be implied on the part of the lunatic to repay out of his estate the sums so expended.

Whether the sums so expended were for necessaries or not, must be determined according to the circumstances in each particular case.

A lunatic, not so found by inquisition, lived for many years in an asylum partly at her own cost and partly at the cost of other persons. After her death her estate was administered in court, and these persons applied for repayment to them out of her estate of the amount paid by them in maintaining her beyond her own income.

(a.) Reported by W. IVIMEY COOK and H. C. ROPER, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Held (by the Court of Appeal and Kay, J.), that an obligation could be implied to indemnify them for money spent in supplying her with necessaries; but, on the evidence, that, in this case, repayment had not been expected, and could not therefore be allowed.

In re Weaver, 31 W. R. 224, 21 Ch. D. 615, discussed.

Appeal from Kay, J.

This was a claim for money spent in the maintenance of a lunatic not so found by inquisition, and the question was whether these sums ought, after her death, to be repaid out of her estate.

Eliza Charlotte Rhodes was confined in a private lunatic asylum from the 6th of November, 1855, till the 7th of July, 1881, the date of her death, at an annual cost of £140. Her own income was not sufficient to defray the whole of this expenditure, and the deficiency was made up by her brother C. H. Rhodes during his life, and afterwards by his son A. C. Rhodes and other persons.

The lunatic's estate was being administered in court, and the chief clerk had made a certificate disallowing all these sums which had been spent in maintaining her, beyond her own income.

The summons was taken out by A. C. Rhodes on his own behalf, and as his father's executor, to vary the certificate by declaring that the money so spent ought to be repaid out of her estate.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Phillpotts, for the summons.—The extra payments were for necessaries supplied to the lunatic, and the court will imply a contract on her part to repay them, although she had not been found a lunatic by inquisition. It is not disputed that what was done was for her benefit: Howard v. Digby, 2 Cl. & F. 634, 663; In re Gibson, 20 W. R. 107, L. R. 7 Ch. 52; In re Marman's Trusts, 26 W. R. 621, 8 Ch. Millar, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for the representatives of the lunatic, were not called upon.

KAY, J.—In my opinion, the chief clerk's certificate is perfectly right. There is a question of considerable interest and importance whether any man who supplies necessaries for a lunatic can recover the costs of those necessaries at law, or in equity, as a debt against the lunatic on the ground of there being an implied contract on the part of the lunatic, raised by implication of law, that there should be such repayment. Now I confess for myself that I do not feel the difficulty. The contract is implied on the part of an infant who cannot enter into any binding contract at all; and yet a binding contract is implied on the part of an infant where necessaries are supplied; the contract being by implication of law. It is, therefore, not an answer to say that a lunatic cannot himself contract. An infant cannot contract so as to bind himself, yet the law does bind him by a contract for the supply of necessaries. But the question on that point has been considerably argued and discussed, and there is a considerable body of authority upon it which is of great weight. Take, first of all, the case of Howard v. Digby in the House of Lords. The lunatic had been so found by inquisition, but the claim made was for necessaries supplied before the lunatic was so found. Lord Brougham in that case said, "Upon what ground are all these allowances made; not from kindness, not from charity, not for the convenience of the parties, but because they are debts, because in the eye of that court, be it a court of law or of equity, or the chancellor sitting in lunacy, they are valid debts incurred by the insane person, and are discharged by the justice of the court."

The point came before Knight Bruce, V.C., in the case of Wentworth v. Tubb, where the bill was brought by the administrator and creditor of the lunatic against the heir-at-law of the lunatic, who was also a lunatic, and his committee, praying payment out of a certain real estate which had descended from the deceased to the defendant, the heir-at-law, there being no personal assets. The claim was founded on a report made by the master in the lunacy of the deceased by which he found that the deceased had been maintained and provided with necessaries at the sole expense of the plaintiff, from the issue of the commission in lunacy to the death of the lunatic. Knight Bruce, V.C., said: "The debt, if it is one, became due from the lunatic by operation of law, or, in other words, upon a contract raised by implication of law. If I were satisfied that there could be no such contract, that there could be no liability so raised, it would be my duty to dismiss the bill; but I am not so satisfied." He therefore directed an inquiry; the case came on appeal before Lord Lyndhurst, C., and is reported in 6th Jur. 980. The Lord Chancellor said during the argument: "If a party applies money for the benefit of a lunatic with his consent and without fraud, it is a debt which can be enforced against the lunatic, and the law constitutes it a debt for the benefit of the lunatic, and if he dies it is payable out of his estate. The rule applies only to necessaries, and there are several decisions to that effect which have always been acquiesced in." Now I comment on these words. The words "with his consent" can hardly have been used by the Lord Chancellor, because the consent of a lunatic would have been a nullity. He is also reported to have said: "Where necessaries are furnished to a lunatic, and no fraud or imposition is practised upon him by the party furnishing them, the lunatic is bound to pay for them as being a debt due from him to such party, and, if a debt, upon his decease his estate is chargeable with it." He then read the words of Lord Brougham which I have read, and says: "Lord Brougham therefore considers them as debts due from the lunatic, and, if debts, they are a charge upon the estate." And he dismissed the appeal. In the case of Williams v. Wentworth the matter came before Lord Langdale, M.R., who said: "It was argued in this case that, however beneficial to the lunatic the expenditure may have been, yet, as the lunatic was incapable of contracting, no debt could be constituted: but I am of opinion that in the case of money expended for protection of the person and estate of the lunatic, the law will raise an implied contract, and give a valid demand or debt against the lunatic or his estate, and that under the circumstances of this case a debt was constituted, and that payment of it may be obtained out of the real estate if the personal estate be insufficient. Any other conclusion would, as it appears to me, be extremely dangerous as well as contrary to the principles upon which several cases have been decided. That which is necessary for the protection of the person and estate of the lunatic may well be subject to question and consideration, but when a demand is made in respect of a necessary of that kind, I do not see how it is to be distinguished in principle from a demand arising in respect of the supply of food and clothing. A debt is constituted by reason of a contract which in such cases the law will supply, and it rests, as I conceive, upon a far better foundation than the rule which has sometimes been referred to, that a man shall not be allowed to stultify himself."

Again the point came before Knight Bruce, V.C., in Wentworth v. Tubb, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 537, where the costs on an unsuccessful traverse of an inquisition of lunacy were allowed out of the lunatic's estate. The affirmance of the decision on the other point by the Lord Chancellor is noted. The Vice-Chancellor says: "I apprehend the law to be, that if a man is alleged to be a lunatic, whether truly or not, he may employ (as far as he can be said to exercise volition on the subject) a solicitor, not only to resist the commission, but afterwards for the purpose of traversing it, and that, although the proceedings fail, the lunatic's estate is liable for the costs, subject to this, that if anything fraudulent or unfair, or perhaps I may go as far as to say frivolous or litigious, appears to have taken place on the part of the solicitor, the court may say that no debt arises." Then in a later case of Nelson v. Duncombe, where Lord Langdale says: "The objection is made to the jurisdiction. It is said that, as no lunacy has been found, there can be no implied contract, and, in the absence of contract, the court has no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the claim. It is, I think, true that in all cases of implied contract which have been decided there has been a lunacy actually found; but it has not been determined that this court will not take notice of what is done in respect of the property of persons lunatic, though not so found, or that a contract may not be implied for the supplies of necessaries to such persons."

Then there is the case of In re Gibson, in which Mellish, L.J., says: "A lunatic cannot contract for his maintenance, so whoever maintains him becomes a creditor by implied contract." I have read a considerable body of authority in support of that proposition, and among others the authority of Lord Brougham, in the House of Lords, and the well-considered opinion of Lord Lyndhurst, sitting as Lord Chancellor, besides the authority of Knight Bruce, V.C., and Lord Langdale twice repeated. But, in the case of In re Weaver, the late Master of the Rolls, sitting in the Court of Appeal, commenting on that statement of Mellish, L.J., says: "That is only an interlocutory observation. It is difficult to see how there can be an implied contract with a lunatic if he is incompetent to make an express contract. It is not always safe to report interlocutory observations of judges; they are very liable to be misunderstood." If I may respectfully say so, the reporter ought to have remembered that, before he reported that interlocutory observation of the late Master of the Rolls. In giving judgment the Master of the Rolls said: "It is not necessary to decide the question whether there could be a legal debt in this case; for myself I reserve my opinion on that point, which appears never yet to have been distinctly decided." Brett, L.J., says: "A question has been flushed, if I may use the word in this case, which it is not necessary to decide—viz., whether, if a person supplies necessaries to a lunatic, knowing of the lunacy at the time, a contract on the part of the lunatic to pay for them can be implied? I give no opinion on that point. It has not been fully argued to-day, and it appears to me to involve a very difficult point of law, which I do not think has ever been settled by authority. For my own part I should doubt whether, in favour of a person who knows of the lunacy, you can imply a contract to pay for a supply of necessaries to a lunatic."

But in a late case—Brockwell v. Bullock, 37 W. R. 455, 22 Q. B. D. 567—a medical man brought an action in the county court against a lunatic in respect of services rendered in an inquiry into the state of the defendant's mind, but was nonsuited on the ground that he could not recover such charges without an order under section 11 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862. The plaintiff gave evidence on the inquiry which was in order to prove the sanity of the defendant. The defendant, however, was found a lunatic, and then the medical man, not being a physician, brought an action for his charges against the lunatic and his committee. The county court judge nonsuited the plaintiff because of section 11 of the Lunacy Act, 1862, holding that the action was not maintainable, and the Queen's Bench Division dismissed an appeal from the county court. Then the case came before the Court of Appeal, and Lord Esher, M.R., said that section 11 did not take away any right of action which would otherwise have existed, and then he says:—"Under these circumstances the only question for us seems to be whether, assuming that the defendant was not a lunatic at the time of the plaintiff's employment, or that such employment of the plaintiff was a necessary, the action might be maintained. It seems to me that before the statute the action might in either of these cases have been maintainable." That is a distinct authority that an action could lie for necessaries supplied to a lunatic against the lunatic and his committee. Then later on he says:—"If it be shown that the defendant Bullock was a lunatic when the plaintiff was employed, then I think that in order to succeed the plaintiff must show that his employment was a necessary, a matter which may give rise to difficult questions." I can only say of these authorities—I do not know whether there are others or not, no others are brought to my attention—the large preponderance is in favour of the principle that anyone who supplies necessaries for a lunatic may maintain an action even at law for these necessaries, and that upon an implied contract with the lunatic, a contract which the law will imply notwithstanding the lunacy. But in this case the real question is, Are these necessaries? What happened is this. This lady was a lunatic, and she had certain property of her own which produced a small income, and her brother placed her in an asylum at £140 a year. She might have been placed in an asylum for very much less than that. But her brother thought it right to pay a larger sum, and after the death of her brother, his son, with other members of the family, continued the maintenance of the lunatic at this large sum. But now a claim is made before me that the extra expense was a necessary for the lunatic. It was very generous of her brother to place her in this asylum, and he might, had he lived, have been very likely to maintain her there. But that the extra expense was a necessary is not proved at all to my satisfaction. Another thing is this. The allowance made by the brother and the other members of the family seems clearly to have been an allowance which they never expected to be repaid. There is no evidence which satisfies me that any of these parties expected any repayment. How far a feeling of kindliness towards their relative may have actuated them, I do not know, but there is nothing to show that they had the smallest expectation of being repaid, or of making this a debt against the estate of the lunatic. This application must be refused with costs.

A. C. Rhodes appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Phillpotts, for the appellant.—A. C. Rhodes is the legal personal representative both of the father, C. H. Rhodes, and of the lunatic, and therefore no question as to the Statute of Limitations being a bar arises: Thompson v. Cooper, 1 Coll. 81; Stahlschmidt v. Lett, 1 Sm. & G. p. 421. The evidence shows that the lunatic had the social position of a lady; she had property which produced an average annual income of £86, and the annual cost of her maintenance and support in the asylum was £140. This charge, having regard to the social position of the lunatic, was not unreasonable, and ought, therefore, to be regarded as a necessary. If the charge is in itself reasonable, the fact that the lunatic might have been supported for a smaller sum in some other asylum is not material. It would have been unreasonable to put her in a pauper asylum.

They cited the various cases relied on in the court below.

Millar, Q.C., and Curtis Price, for the respondents.—The chief clerk by his certificate has found that there were no debts due by the estate of the deceased lunatic; no application has been made to vary his certificate in that respect, and therefore, whatever this claim may be, it cannot be said to be a debt due by the estate of the deceased. Further, the facts of this case show that no debt was intended to be created. The payments were made as bounties. Assuming, however, that a debt was created, the extra payments were not for necessaries. The cases cited on the other side all fall into one of two categories, either these are cases in which the lunatic had been so found, or cases in which the payments had been made by the direct trustee of the lunatic. [COTTON, L.J.—We will not trouble you on the question of law.]

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal against a decision of Kay, J., refusing to allow a claim made by the defendant on behalf of himself and his brother and his sisters, and as the legal personal representative of his father, for several sums expended in the support of the lunatic in excess of what was provided by the income of her own property. The case raises several questions, one of which is of considerable importance; and although in the view which we take that question is not necessary to the decision of the case, yet, as it has been fully argued, we think we ought to express our opinion upon it. That question is, whether there can be an implied contract on the part of a lunatic not so found by inquisition to repay out of her property, sums expended for necessaries supplied to her. Now the term "implied contract" is a most unfortunate expression, because there cannot be a contract by a lunatic. But whenever necessaries are supplied to a person who, by reason of disability, cannot himself contract, the law implies an obligation on the part of such person to pay for such necessaries out of his own property. It is asked, Can there be an implied contract by a person who cannot contract? The answer is, that what the law implies on the part of such a person is an obligation, which has been improperly termed a contract, to repay money spent in supplying necessaries. I think the expression "implied contract" is erroneous and very unfortunate, and in one case which was before the Court of Appeal (In re Weaver) though that court did not decide the question whether there could be what has been called an implied contract by a lunatic, yet one of the judges did express an opinion that there could be no implied contract on the part of a lunatic or any other person who is himself incompetent to make an express contract.

We all agree with the view that I have just now expressed, in order to prevent any doubt from arising in consequence of the Court of Appeal having declined to settle the question in the case to which I have alluded.

But then, though there may be an implied obligation on behalf of the lunatic, the necessaries must be supplied and paid for under circumstances which would justify the law in implying an obligation to repay the money spent upon them. I have no difficulty as to the question of the expenditure being for necessaries, for the law is well established that when the necessaries supplied are suitable to the position in life of the lunatic, an implied obligation to pay for them out of his property will arise. [His lordship then discussed the evidence, and came to the conclusion that the relatives of the lunatic, in making the payments for her maintenance, did not intend to constitute themselves creditors against her estate.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question we have to decide is whether a sum of £1,100 is payable as a debt out of the assets of the deceased lady. The claim is made on the ground that the money has been properly expended for necessaries. I think that the facts are all in favour of the money having been reasonably and properly expended for necessaries. Against that it is said that the lady might have been supported at an expense which her own income would have been sufficient to meet, but as, in the case of a claim made for necessaries against the estate of an infant, the claimant is not always bound to show that he sent the infant to the cheapest school that could be found, so in this case the fact that some cheaper place of residence might possibly have been found for this lady is not necessarily an answer to this claim, assuming it can be made.

The question whether an implied obligation arises in favour of a person who supplies a lunatic with necessaries is a question of law, and in the case of In re Weaver a doubt was expressed whether there was an obligation on the part of the lunatic to repay. I confess I cannot participate in that doubt. I think that that doubt has arisen from the unfortunate terminology of our law, owing to which the expression "implied contract" has been used to denote an obligation implied by law which is not a contract at law. Obligations of this class have also been called obligations quasi ex contractu. But that a lunatic's estate may be made liable for necessaries has been settled, at any rate as far back as Manby v. Scott, 1 Sid. 112, 2 Smith's L. C., 9th ed., at pp. 476-7, where the three learned judges, after holding that an infant might be bound for necessaries provided for him, proceeded: "And what has been said of an infant is applicable to an idiot in case of housekeeping." I do not doubt that the cost of necessaries can be recovered against a lunatic's estate in a proper case. [His lordship then dealt with the evidence, and agreed with the conclusion arrived at by Cotton, L.J.]

LOPES, L.J.—If a person finds necessaries for a lunatic and intends to be repaid for so doing and to constitute a debt against the lunatic's estate, I do not doubt that the law implies an obligation on the part of the lunatic's estate to repay the amount spent on such necessaries. It seems to me strange that the law to this effect could be doubted. I have known several cases in the Queen's Bench Division of this kind: Action brought for goods sold and delivered; plea, insanity; replication, necessaries. And I have never heard any doubt expressed that that was a perfectly good replication. [His lordship then discussed the evidence, and came to the same conclusion as the other members of the court.]

Then the question arises whether these payments could be necessaries. I should not myself have felt any difficulty as to that because necessaries have to be determined according to the circumstances of each particular case, and things may well be necessaries in one case which would not be so in another. The question what are necessaries must always be considered with reference to the reasonable requirements of the person under disability, having regard to his means and station in life.

The appeal fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Bill of sale—Attestation—Address and description of attesting witness—Statutory form—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 8, 9, 10—Schedule annexed to the Act.

A bill of sale, which does not contain both the address and the description of the witness attesting the bill of sale, is not "made in accordance with the form in the schedule" annexed to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and is therefore void.

The first case was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Fry, L.J., and Mathew, J.) of the Queen's Bench Division affirming the judgment, on an interpleader issue, of his Honour Judge Powell, at the County Court of Kent, holden at Woolwich, and holding a bill of sale void; and the second case was an appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., on an interpleader issue, holding a bill of sale void.

The question raised and decided in both cases was, that the fact of the omission to state in the bill of sale itself, either the address or the description of the witness attesting the bill of sale, rendered the bill of sale void under section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, as being, by reason of such omission, not "made in accordance with the form in the schedule," to the Act.

In the first case neither the address nor the description of the witness who attested the bill of sale was stated in the bill of sale itself; the affidavit, however, filed with the copy of the bill of sale on the occasion of its registration, as required by section 10, sub-section (2), of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, did contain a statement of the address and description of the witness who had attested the bill of sale.

In the second case the description only, of the attesting witness, was omitted to be stated in the bill of sale itself, but it was stated in affidavit filed with the registrar.

The holder of the bill of sale appealed in each case, and the second case was transferred from the other branch of the Court of Appeal, so that the two appeals came on for hearing together before the same court.

The Bills of Sale Act, 1882, provides by section 8 (inter alia) that "every bill of sale shall be duly attested . . . otherwise such bill of sale shall be void in respect of the personal chattels comprised therein." By section 9, "a bill of sale made or given by way of security for the payment of money by the grantor thereof, shall be void unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule to this Act annexed." And by section 10, "the execution of every bill of sale by the grantor shall be attested by one or more credible witness or witnesses, not being a party or parties thereto." The schedule annexed to the Act contains a "form of bill of sale" made between A. B. (grantor) and C. D. (grantee), and at the end of the form are these words, "Signed and sealed by the said A. B. in the presence of me, E. F. [add witness's name, address, and description]."

A. E. Nelson, for the appellant in the first case.—The affidavit filed with the registrar states the address and description of the attesting witness to the bill of sale, and therefore the respondent was seised with that knowledge. The address and description of the attesting witness is not part of the form of the bill of sale. The Divisional Court in the present case felt bound to follow the previous decision of a Divisional Court in Blankenstein v. Robertson, 6 Times L. R. 178, but that case is not binding on the Court of Appeal.

He also referred to Blount v. Harris, 27 W. R. 202, 4 Q. B. D. 603; Routh v. Roubiot, 28 L. J. Q. B. 240, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 13; Luckin v. Hamlyn, 18 W. R. 43; and Jones v. Harris, 20 W. R. 43, L. R. 7 Q. B. 157, which were all cases governed by the Bills of Sale Act, 1854.

H. A. Forman, for the respondent.—The directions contained in the form of bill of sale given in the schedule annexed to the Act of 1882 must be regarded as having the same force as a statutory enactment. "Duly attested" in section 8 means attested according to the directions contained in the statutory form. Though in the case of an ordinary deed the omission of the date of the deed, or of the description of the attesting witness, would not invalidate the deed, yet in the case of a bill of sale these matters are essential characteristics of the statutory form of a bill of sale, and therefore their omission will render the bill of sale void. The rule of construction laid down by Bowen, L.J., in Ex parte Stanford, In re Barber, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259, was not accepted by the House of Lords in Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. R. 353, 13 App. Cas. 506, as a test rule applicable to all cases. It is the object of the Act that the address and description of the attesting witness should appear on the face of the bill of sale itself, without the necessity of looking at the affidavit to discover them.

Channell, Q.C., and A. J. Allen, for the appellant in the second case.—Though on the authority of Blankenstein v. Robertson Mathew, J., held this bill of sale void, yet his own opinion was contrary to that. [LOPES, L.J.—Thomas v. Kelly was not cited to him]. In the present case the address of the attesting witness is stated in the bill of sale, and it is only his description that is omitted. The affidavit contains the description. The words in section 9, "in accordance with the form in the schedule," mean that the terms of the contract must be the same as those in the "form"—i.e., the contract between the borrower and the lender must have the same legal effect as that which is set out in the "form": Ex parte Stanford. The address and description of the attesting witness is really outside the "form," and the note about adding the address and description is a mere direction. The words "duly attested" in section 8 are satisfied if the document is attested by some witness whose name and address appear on the face of the document; that is sufficient to identify the witness.

R. O. B. Lane, Q.C., for the respondent.—Sections 8 and 9 and the form in the schedule must be read together, "duly attested" therefore means attested according to the provisions prescribed by the Act; and the form in the schedule expressly directs that the address and description of the attesting witness be stated. Some of the directions given in the form cannot be treated as mere directions, when, as is admitted, other directions in the form go to the substance of the bill of sale. To be "in accordance with the form" something more is required than the following the form in respect of the terms of the contract between borrower and lender. The statement of the address and description of the attesting witness is material, in order to afford sufficient information to persons interested; it is an imperative part of the object to be attained by the machinery of registration.

Channell, Q.C., in reply.—The result of non-compliance with section 8 is different from that of non-compliance with section 9, the latter section deals only with the form of the contract between borrower and lender.

COTTON, L.J. [His lordship stated the facts in each of the two cases, and continued:—].—The question is whether section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, makes these bills of sale void. We have nothing to do with the policy of the Act; we have only to carry out what is expressed in the Act of Parliament. There is no direct provision in the Act itself, that the name, address, and description of the attesting witness shall be shown on the face of the bill of sale. The question is whether either of these bills of sale complied with the requirement of section 9—that they should be made in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act. Is there anything in the form given in the schedule which requires that the address and description of the attesting witness should be added? It has been argued that there is nothing in the statutory form to require this, because, as it is said, the form only refers to that which is the contract between the parties, and that the mere direction as to stating the address and description of the attesting witness is not part of the "form" of the bill of sale, but only a direction added to the "form." In my opinion, the meaning of the word "form" cannot be cut down in that way. It is true that in most of the cases hitherto brought before the court, the deviation from the statutory form was in something relating to the legal effect of the transaction as embodied in the contract between the parties. That was the case in Ex parte Stanford. But in my opinion this provision cannot be considered as a mere direction. It is a direction as to matters which are required to be stated at the time the bill of sale is given. There are a number of blanks in the form which cannot be filled up till the form comes to be used—for example, the rate of interest payable; no one can doubt but that that must be stated. So also with regard to time and place. These matters could not be put in in the form given in the schedule, but that form contains directions which show that they should be stated, and, in my opinion, any bill of sale which has not in it that which would be in the form when it was filled up, is not made in accordance with the form. When the person who is the attesting witness in the particular case is known, the "form," to be properly filled up, must contain his name, address, and description. I do not say that any omission in that respect would alter the legal effect of the bill of sale. When Bowen, L.J., in Ex parte Stanford said that a divergence from the statutory form was only material when it was calculated to give the bill of sale a legal effect differing from that of the statutory form, he was dealing only with a variation which would alter the legal effect; and the judgments of the Lords in Thomas v. Kelly show that that statement is not to be taken as laying down a universal test for all cases. If this matter is a part of the statutory form, as I think it is, we must give effect to the provisions of the Act, however stringent they may be. I do not think that this is a merely immaterial matter in the present state of the law. The Act of 1878 required that the execution of every bill of sale should be attested by a solicitor. That provision is now repealed by the Act of 1882. The position of a solicitor gave some sort of assurance that he would see that everything that was required was properly done, and when the Legislature took away that safeguard it may well have thought it material that it should be shown, by means of the address and description of the attesting witness, what sort of a man he was. In my opinion, therefore, it is essential that on the face of the bill of sale itself, the name, address, and description of the attesting witness should appear. In the second appeal this provision presses more hardly than in the first, but I do not see how even in that case one can depart from the directions contained in the schedule. Both the appeals, therefore, must fail.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am sorry I cannot see my way to arrive at any other conclusion. It is always a painful thing to be compelled to hold that a bonâ fide transaction is void because some t's are not crossed and some i's are not dotted. We must, however, give effect to the Act of Parliament, and, in my opinion, the statutory form requires that the name, address, and description of the attesting witness should be filled up.

LOPES, L.J.—The Act of 1882 imposes most stringent fetters on contracts of this kind, by dealing not only with matters of substance, but also with matters of form. It has been said that the Act is imperious and tyrannical. I am not sure that it was not intended to be so. I am not prepared to say that it is too imperious or too tyrannical. But the court has nothing to do with this. I think the words "duly attested" in section 8, mean duly attested in accordance with the provisions of the Act and the form. At any rate, section 9 is clear that the bill of sale must be in accordance with the form in the schedule, and the name, address, and description of the attesting witness is part of the form. It is perfectly plain that the form in the schedule could not contain the name, address, or description of the particular attesting witness, but in any bill of sale these directions in the schedule are to be complied with, and those things which are added become part of the statutory form of the bill of sale. If they are not complied with, it is impossible to say that a bill of sale is made in accordance with the statutory form when it is not executed and attested in the mode prescribed. I quite agree with Cotton, L.J., that this is not altogether a technical matter, but may well be regarded as a matter of substance. The second case is certainly a harder one, but the same reasoning covers both cases.

An agreement between the parties to a divorce suit to withhold from the court knowledge of material facts tending to support a counter-charge of adultery amounts to collusion within the meaning of section 30 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, even though the facts suppressed prove insufficient in the event to establish the counter-charge. Consequently, a party petitioning for dissolution of marriage is, by virtue of those sections, deprived of the right to a decree, where such an agreement has been entered into by such party and has been acted upon, though the suppressed facts in the event come to the knowledge of the court and prove insufficient to establish a matrimonial offence against such petitioning party.

A wife presented a petition for dissolution of marriage against her husband for cruelty, and adultery with four named persons, and the husband presented a counter-petition against the wife for adultery with a named person. After the trial had begun, it was agreed between them that the charge against the wife, and the charges of adultery against the husband with three of the four persons named, should be dropped, but that his adultery with the fourth should be proved, together with the charge of cruelty, so as to allow the wife to get a decree. The husband acted on the agreement, and, though the wife's counsel refused to do so, the jury found the wife not guilty of the adultery charged against her, and the husband not guilty of adultery with the three named persons, but guilty with the fourth, and guilty of cruelty. The judge granted a decree nisi, *but referred the case to the Queen's Proctor, who accordingly intervened. At the second trial the jury found that there had been collusion, and that material facts had been withheld from the knowledge of the court, but, on the question whether the wife had committed adultery, they disagreed and brought in no finding. Appeal from Butt, J.

The question in this case turned upon the construction of sections 30 and 31 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and section 7 of the Act of 1860.

Section 30 of the Act of 1857, provides that "in case the court on the evidence in relation to any . . . petition" for dissolution of marriage, shall find "that the petition is presented or prosecuted in collusion with either of the respondents, then . . . the court shall dismiss the said petition."

Section 31 provides that "in case the court shall be satisfied on the evidence that the case of the petitioner has been proved, and shall not find . . . that the petition is presented or prosecuted in collusion with either of the respondents, then the court shall pronounce a decree declaring such marriage to be dissolved . . . " &c.

Section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860, enacts as follows:—"Every decree for a divorce shall in the first instance be a decree nisi, not to be made absolute till after the expiration of such time, not less than three months from the pronouncing thereof, as the court shall . . . direct; and during that period any person shall be at liberty . . . to show cause why the said decree should not be made absolute by reason of the same having been obtained by collusion, or by reason of material facts not brought before the court; and, on cause being so shown, the court shall deal with the cause by making the decree absolute, or by reversing the decree nisi, or by requiring further inquiry, or otherwise as justice may require; and at any time during the progress of the case or before the decree is made absolute, any person may give information to her Majesty's Proctor of any matter material to the due decision of the case, who may thereupon take such steps as the Attorney-General may deem necessary or expedient; and, if . . . the said proctor shall suspect that any parties to the suit are or have been acting in collusion for the purpose of obtaining a divorce contrary to the justice of the case, he may . . . intervene in the suit, alleging such case of collusion . . . " &c.

It appeared that Mrs. Emma Butler, the wife of Robert Butler, had, on the 26th of November, 1887, presented a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery and cruelty. In the petition she stated that there had been "issue of the marriage one child, to wit, Vernon Butler, now deceased."

On the 23rd of February, 1888, the husband, with his answer denying the charges against him, filed a cross-petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with Walter James Burnham at Nottingham on the 9th of May, 1884, resulting in the birth, on the 7th of January, 1885, of a female child.

The wife by her answer denied the adultery, and alleged that her husband was the father of the child, and she made further charges of adultery against him, so that at the trial he stood charged with adultery with four women. The two petitions, having been consolidated, came on for hearing before Butt, J., and a jury, on the 23rd of June, 1889. It appeared from Mrs. Butler's evidence that she and her husband had separated under a deed of separation on the 24th of November, 1882, but that her husband had visited her subsequently, and she asserted that he was the father of the child born in January, 1885. She gave as a reason for suppressing the birth of a second child of the marriage her fear that her husband would take the child away from her, and she admitted having, from the same motive, registered it in the names of Walter James Burnham and Emma Burnham as father and mother. She said she did this without Burnham's knowledge or consent at the time, his name having occurred to her while waiting at the registry office, and that she chose it because she wished the surname as registered to begin with a B. The child's Christian name was Mabel Winifred.

The trial commenced on a Saturday, and the first day's hearing ended before the conclusion of Mrs. Butler's examination. On the Sunday the solicitors of the parties met, and in the result the following agreement was signed:—"Butler v. Butler, Butler v. Butler and Burnham.—Petitioner to give evidence of cruelty to satisfaction of court, and of respondent's adultery with Miss W., and if court satisfied on that evidence, decree for dissolution to go. Petitioner accepts her husband's denial as to adultery with Mrs. J., and withdraws such charge, and, being satisfied that the witnesses who depose to adultery with Smith and Simpson are mistaken as to identity, withdraws such charges. The husband's petition to be withdrawn. As to alimony, no application for same to be made, but the husband, in lieu thereof, to pay a lump sum of £150 to his wife. The deed of separation to be cancelled. The wife to maintain the child Mabel Winifred. The husband to pay the costs of the suit."

When this arrangement was communicated to the wife's counsel, he, considering the agreement an improper one, declined to act upon it, and proceeded as if it had not been made, but the husband's counsel, acting on the instructions of their client, refrained from cross-examining Mrs. Butler, and confined themselves to defending their client from the charge of adultery with Mrs. J. The jury found the husband guilty of cruelty, and of adultery with Miss W., and not guilty of adultery with the three other co-respondents, and found Mrs. Butler not guilty of adultery with Burnham.

Butt, J., granted a decree nisi, but referred the papers to the Queen's Proctor, who, after making inquiries, intervened, on the ground that, at the trial, material facts had been withheld from the knowledge of the court, and that the decree had been obtained by collusion between the husband and wife, and he pleaded that on divers occasions the petitioner, Emma Butler, had herself committed adultery. He accordingly prayed that the decree nisi might be rescinded and the wife's petition dismissed. Both husband and wife having filed answers to the Queen's Proctor's plea, the case was retried before Butt, J., and a jury. The judge left three issues to the jury:—(1) Were material facts withheld from the knowledge of the court? (2) Was there collusion? (3) Did Mrs. Butler commit adultery with Burnham? The jury answered the first and second questions in the affirmative, but said they were unable to agree as to the third.

Upon those findings Butt, J., discharged the decree nisi.

Mrs. Butler appealed.

Buszard, Q.C., and Priestley (Bargrave Deane with them), for the appellant.—In order to deprive the wife of her right to a decree absolute she must have been found guilty of a matrimonial offence. [Jacques referred to Hunt v. Hunt, 47 L. J. P. D. & A. 22, 26 W. R. Dig. 79.] Persons knowing their own innocence, but aware that there have been circumstances of suspicion against them at some previous period of their lives, are surely not bound to bring those circumstances before the court. When the suppressed facts, on being disclosed, do not establish a matrimonial offence, the 7th section of the Matrimonial Causes Amendment Act, 1860, does not empower the court to withhold a decree of dissolution of marriage on the ground of suppression of material facts by the petitioner: Alexandre v. Alexandre, 18 W. R. 1087, L. R. 2 P. & D. 164. "Collusion" is defined in Crewe v. Crewe, 3 Hagg. Eccl. Rep. 123, at p. 130. "Collusion, as applied to this subject, is an agreement between the parties for one to commit or appear to commit a fact of adultery in order that the other may obtain a remedy at law as for a real injury." The findings are inconsistent with each other, as the only fact that could be material would be the adultery of the wife. Moreover, even if the agreement was collusive, it was not acted on—the facts all came out at the trial. [COTTON, L.J., referred to Barnes v. Barnes, 16 W. R. 281, L. R. 1 P. & D. 505.]

Lockwood, Q.C., and Jacques, for the Queen's Proctor, were not called upon.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Butt, J., who, upon the Queen's Proctor intervening, and upon the findings at which the jury arrived, refused to make a decree absolute, and discharged the decree nisi. I will not enter into the question what Butt, J., ought to have done when this agreement was brought before him, though I have some doubt as to whether he ought to have gone on with the case or ought to have made any decree nisi after that fact was discovered. He proceeded, however, to communicate with, and send the papers to, the Queen's Proctor, who intervened, and then there was a trial before a jury, who came to a conclusion to which I will refer presently. The ground of the Queen's Proctor's intervention was a strong suspicion in the circumstances brought before him that the decree was obtained by collusion and suppression of material facts. The petition of the wife charged her husband with cruelty and adultery with four named persons; then there was a counter-petition by the husband charging the wife with adultery with a particular person. After the case had gone on for one day, Saturday, and had been adjourned, on the Sunday, the solicitors acting for the wife and husband met together, and they came to an agreement, which has been read to us. The agreement was this—that the charge of adultery against the husband with the particular named persons should not be proceeded with, that the wife shall bring forward such evidence as would satisfy the court of his adultery with another named person, and then the husband shall not press the charge he made against his wife. It is very true that Mr. Buszard, when it was brought before him on the Monday, saw the vice of the agreement, and refused to act upon it, and conducted the case as if no such agreement had been come to. But the husband did, in fact, act upon it, and did not support the charge he had made against his wife, and did not in any way cross-examine her. The jury have found this—and it is not a finding which is altogether satisfactory—that there was collusion between the husband and wife:—that, "as between Emma Butler, the petitioner, and Robert Butler, the respondent, in the first-named suit, they were guilty of collusion together to withhold from the court material facts." Then the jury do not say that the wife had not been guilty of adultery, but do not come to a conclusion whether she had been or not, and as to that issue there was no verdict at all. Then the question is, was that finding at which they arrived sufficient to justify the conclusion at which the learned judge has arrived, and upon which he acted? I think it was. Under section 7 the decree was first of all to be a decree nisi; then there was to be a certain time before it could be made absolute, and during that period the Queen's Proctor, and, in certain cases, other persons, could apply to prevent the decree nisi being made absolute.

What is said in the section is this:—"During that period any person"—that is, any person intervening—"shall be at liberty to show cause why the said decree should not be made absolute by reason of the same having been obtained by collusion, or by reason of material facts not brought before the court." I need not read what follows, but that was to be done by any person, and the section goes on to provide that power should be given to the Queen's Proctor to bring the matter before the court; and then certain directions are given as to what shall be done by the court for the purpose of ascertaining whether those charges, brought to prevent the decree nisi being made absolute, can be supported or not. It is argued that the court has no right to withhold an absolute decree from the petitioner unless she has been found guilty of a matrimonial offence. But I do not at all understand that. It cannot be said that she can obtain a decree nisi, followed by a decree absolute if, under the original Act, of which this is a mere amendment in certain details, she could not obtain a decree nisi in the original suit. Sections 30 and 31, to my mind, conclude the question, in the sense that she is liable to be deprived of the decree, not simply and solely if she is guilty of a matrimonial offence, but that, by virtue of those sections, the court is prevented from making a decree in her favour if it has been found that the petition is presented or prosecuted in collusion with either of the respondents—the words are, "then, and in any of the said cases, the court shall dismiss the said petition." That is, independently of whether the court arrives at the conclusion that the petitioner has been guilty of a matrimonial offence or not, the Act of Parliament is to prevent the court from making a decree.

In my opinion it is very important that any case brought before the court shall be conducted in a proper manner, that judgment shall be obtained fairly, and that the court shall not give judgment where it finds, not merely that the facts suppressed might lead to the conclusion that a matrimonial offence has been committed, but that the parties, by an agreement between them, have so conducted the case as that all material facts are not brought before the court. And that is what is meant by collusion. I do not suppose it would be argued that if there was collusion it was not "prosecuted" as collusion. It is not necessary that it shall be "prosecuted" as collusion, but the words are "presented or prosecuted." It is said there is no collusion here. Why? Because the facts ultimately brought before the court did not lead to the conclusion that the wife had committed a matrimonial offence. Perhaps not—the state of things being such as it was, the jury differed. But to my mind, in such a state of things the question is not whether it appears that the wife is guilty of a matrimonial offence, but whether the parties have agreed together not to put before the court material facts relevant to the issue tried (not facts material in this sense, that they prove anything conclusively one way or the other upon the issue which has to be tried, but material in the sense that all facts are material if they are substantial facts which will tend to assist the court in arriving at a conclusion whether the charge made was right or wrong).

Here the husband agreed with his wife that he would not support his charge against her, that he would not cross-examine her, and that he would withdraw his counter-charge. In my opinion, that was a suppression of material facts and collusion. It is said that Alexandre v. Alexandre is inconsistent with that view. We are not bound by Alexandre v. Alexandre, and if it does really make any such rule as that contended for, I must express my opinion, with every respect for the judge who decided that case, that it is wrong, because I think there is collusion (independently of the question as to whether it is proved ultimately that one of the parties has in fact been guilty of the act complained of), where the parties have agreed together not to bring before the court facts which are relevant to the case, and which, if brought before the court, will enable it to decide one way or the other. And in this case one can see that these facts were never submitted to the first jury, or put before them in such a way as they ought to have been, by the husband prosecuting his charge. They were before them in a certain way, and as a result they came to the conclusion they did. But I think it would be wrong to assume, after what had taken place, that they would even have doubted as the second jury did. We cannot possibly surmise what the jury in the first case would have done, because in our opinion the proper facts were not brought before them, and, therefore, whether the petitioner ought or ought not to have been found guilty of the charge against her, there was collusion between the husband and wife as to the prosecution of the petition. In my opinion, the judgment of Butt, J., was right, and the appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—If we were to accede to this appeal, it appears to me we should be doing that which would be a perfect scandal. The facts are very short. Mr. and Mrs. Butler were married some time before 1882; in 1882 they separated. In 1885 she had a child, alleged to be illegitimate, and registered under the name of its supposed father, not her husband. Afterwards, in 1887, she sought in the Divorce Division for a dissolution of her marriage, on the grounds of her husband's cruelty and adultery. He presented a cross-petition against her, alleging adultery with the person to whom I have alluded. In the course of the trial, during an adjournment, the solicitors for both sides meet; they sign an agreement to the effect that she shall prove just enough to get a divorce, and that he shall not object. When this letter is handed to the counsel for the wife, he sees the difficulty, and he takes the bold course of going on just as if that had not been written. The husband, however, does nothing of the kind, he acts upon the letter, and he does not oppose the divorce in any serious way. He does not adduce any witness in support of his counter allegation, which he still believes to be true. It is not that he withdraws the opposition on the ground that he has made a mistake—no such thing—but in pursuance of this arrangement he ceases to oppose his wife's petition, and under those circumstances a decree nisi is obtained. There is withholding of material facts beyond all doubt or question. It is perfectly idle and absurd to suppose that the facts which we have to deal with, and which were withheld by the husband from the jury, were not material for the consideration of the jury who had to try the case. What view they would have taken of them I do not know. But the materiality does not depend upon that; it depends upon whether they might have taken a hostile view upon those materials; and if they might have done so, then these facts were material.

Under those circumstances the decree nisi is got. In consideration of this letter the learned judge sends the case to the Queen's Proctor, who intervenes and alleges that the decree nisi has been obtained by collusion. That is the issue for the jury, who find this: (1) That divers material facts were withheld from the consideration of the court when the decree nisi was obtained;

(2) That the wife and husband on that occasion had been guilty of collusion together to withhold from the court material facts; but (3) they cannot agree whether the wife was guilty of adultery or not. What their difficulty was, I do not know—and now it is said that as they could not agree as to that, their finding of what took place on the earlier occasion—that there was collusion and a suppression of material facts—cannot be used to prevent the wife from having her decree made absolute.

I say that in my opinion it would be a perfect scandal if we were to allow that contention to succeed. A more scandalous case of attempted imposition upon the part of the parties—I do not say by counsel, because they threw them over—I cannot conceive. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lopes, L.J.—The facts have been gone into on the matter of collusion. In my opinion the agreement of the parties to a divorce suit to withhold from the court pertinent and material facts, which might have been adduced on the trial in evidence in support of a counter-charge by the respondent or co-respondents, amounts to collusion, even though the suppressed facts might not have been sufficient to establish the counter-charge. I believe that to be the correct definition of collusion as applicable to the circumstances of a case like this, and I believe also that that definition is strictly in accordance with the decision in Hunt v. Hunt. Whether it is entirely in accord with that in Alexandre v. Alexandre I do not express an opinion. But in point of fact I agree with what was said by my learned brother with regard to Alexandre v. Alexandre. If it is intended to mean that which is suggested, I doubt very much if it is correct. Applying the definition which I have just given to the present case, let us see how it stands. In this case there was a counter-charge of adultery made against the petitioner by the husband, the respondent, and issue was joined thereon. The husband and wife during the pendency of the trial (the trial, I believe, beginning on a Saturday, and this agreement taking place on the Sunday) agreed to do—what? They agreed to withdraw from the jury the consideration of this issue of whether or not the wife had committed adultery. If the wife had committed adultery it must be remembered that she (the petitioner) would have been disentitled to the relief for which she prayed. To my mind it is impossible to say that those circumstances do not bring this case within the definition that I have given. And this should also be observed—not only was that agreement come to (and I think that would have been sufficient), but that agreement was acted upon, because at the trial Mrs. Butler, the petitioner, was not cross-examined with regard to this alleged adultery having been committed by her, nor did the husband (no doubt in accordance with his agreement) give any substantive evidence, or any evidence in chief, or of any kind, to that effect.

Now what is the object of this special provision with regard to collusion? I think that its object is certainly to compel the parties to come into the court of divorce with clean hands. It is to oblige them to bring all material and pertinent facts to the notice of the court; to prevent their blinding the eyes of the court in any respect; to do that which will enable the court to be in a position to do justice between the parties. At the trial, when the Queen's Proctor intervened, the learned judge left several questions to the jury—there were two questions, I think, relating to the collusion, and the jury found both those questions in favour of the Queen's Proctor. But the learned judge left another question to the jury, and that was whether the petitioner, Emma Butler, had on divers occasions committed adultery. With all respect to the learned judge, I think that was an immaterial fact, and I think that he was wrong in leaving that question to them. The question of collusion was an independent issue, and it was an issue which, found one way or the other, was sufficient to enable the judge either to rescind the decree nisi or make it absolute. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Bristol, Cardiff, and Swansea Aerated Bread Co. (Limited) v. Maggs. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Contract—Letters—Offer and acceptance—Subsequent correspondence—Withdrawal of offer—Statute of Frauds—Goodwill.

The defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff offering to sell him a lease and goodwill at a certain price, the offer to remain open for ten days; and the plaintiff, in reply, accepted the offer. The solicitors of the parties prepared a memorandum of agreement, containing additional formal terms, and the plaintiff wished also to insert a clause restraining the defendant from carrying on business within five miles. After further negotiations about this clause, the defendant, before the expiration of the ten days, declined to proceed further in the sale. The plaintiff claimed specific performance of the contract contained in the two letters, without regard to the subsequent communications.

Held, that the clause in question was a substantial, not a formal, addition; that the question whether the two letters were evidence of a complete contract was independent of the Statute of Frauds; that the whole of the correspondence must be considered, and that that showed that the plaintiff himself thought that the contract was not concluded; that the circumstances that the withdrawal of the offer was within the ten days, and that the negotiations were partly by the principals and partly by the solicitors, made no difference; and that specific performance must be refused.

Trial of action.

This was an action for specific performance, and the question was whether two letters between the parties ought to be taken as evidence of a completed contract or whether subsequent communications ought to be taken into consideration as showing that no contract was actually concluded.

The facts were stated by Kay, J., as follows:—

This action seeks specific performance of a contract alleged to be constituted by the following letters:—

"Cardiff, May 29, 1889. Dear Sir,—I beg to submit to you the following conditions for disposal of my business, carried on at 15, Duke-street, Cardiff. Lease and goodwill, £450 (lease from 29th of September, 1888, for 14 years). All fixtures, fittings, utensils, &c., stock-in-trade connected with the premises to be taken at valuation. Yours truly, R. Maggs. This offer to hold good for ten days." "Cardiff, June 1, 1889. Dear Sir,—On behalf of the Bristol, Cardiff, and Swansea Aerated

(a.) Reported by H. C. Rofer, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bread Co. (Limited), I accept your offer for shop and lease, &c., 15, Duke-street, Cardiff. Yours truly, JOHN GUTHRIE (for B., C., and S. Aerated Bread Co.). Mr. R. Maggs, 15, Duke-street, Cardiff."

Colonel Guthrie, the writer of the last letter, was a director of the plaintiff company, and wrote with the authority of the board. On the 2nd of June, 1889, the defendant's solicitor sent to him a formal memorandum of agreement for approval, with an accompanying letter. This memorandum was altered by the plaintiffs' solicitors, mainly by the insertion of a clause preventing the vendor for five years from carrying on a like business within the borough of Cardiff or within a distance of five miles from the town-hall. The memorandum so altered was returned on the 4th of June, with a letter of the plaintiffs' solicitors. On the 5th of June the defendant's solicitor wrote sending the draft again to the plaintiffs' solicitors, with a modification of the proposed additional clause. On the 6th of June the plaintiff's solicitors wrote that they could not themselves agree to the proposed modification, but that they had asked Colonel Guthrie to call about it.

On the 7th the defendant's solicitor wrote that he regretted the plaintiffs' solicitors had not agreed to the terms of the draft contract, and continued:—"Colonel Guthrie has not been near me, and by my client's instructions I beg to inform you that he declines to proceed further in the matter." On the 8th Colonel Guthrie saw the defendant's solicitor and said he had come to settle the agreement which had been returned to him. The answer was that he was too late; the defendant had made other arrangements. He replied he was prepared to sign the agreement leaving out the disputed clause. The solicitor declined, and Colonel Guthrie went immediately to the defendant, who, he said, told him that he wished to have the agreement cancelled, because his son was very much against his parting with the shop. The defendant, he says, did not suggest that there was no agreement, but asked him to use his influence with his co-directors to get the sale cancelled.

The memorandum of agreement contained several terms not expressed in the letters; for example, it provided for the book debts and books of account being reserved to the vendor and for the payment of a deposit of £45; it fixed the 24th of June as the day for completion of the purchase and delivery of possession; it provided for delivery of abstract of title and the date from which it was to commence, and other matters, all which might possibly be treated as more or less formal Levett, for the plaintiffs.—We ask for specific performance of the contract contained in the two letters without the additional terms. The solicitors had no authority to alter that contract, and they only inserted formal provisions. If they added a new substantial term that does not make the original contract void. We were prepared to make a fresh contract, but that did not upset the first one. After the two letters the only question was as to the form of the deed, and the court will enforce the first contract without regard to subsequent communications: Bonnewell v. Jenkins, 26 W. R. 294, 8 Ch. D. 70. [KAY, J.—I must look at the whole of the correspondence: Hussey v. Horne-Payne, 27 W. R. 585, 4 App. Cas. 311. The question is whether the parties themselves understood that there was a final contract.] That case has been explained in Bolton Partners v. Lambert, 37 W. R. 434, 41 Ch. D. 295. It was decided on the ground that the letters themselves showed that there was a doubt whether the contract was completed. The defendant ought to have given us time to withdraw the new terms.

Warrington, for the defendant.—The subsequent correspondence must be considered, and it shows that there was no concluded contract. Hussey v. Horne-Payne was decided on general grounds: May v. Thomson, 20 Ch. D. 705, 31 W. R. Dig. 187. [KAY, J., referred to Preston v. Luck, 33 W. R. 317, 27 Ch. D. 497.] We do not say that we misunderstood the contract, but that there was none, and the solicitors were settling questions of substance.

Levett replied.

March 5.—KAY, J., stated the facts as above, and continued.—The contested stipulation as to restricting the vendor from carrying on a like business to that which he had sold was not by any means a matter of form. After some conflict of opinion it has been decided by the Court of Appeal in Pearson v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 1006, 27 Ch. D. 145, that a man who sells the goodwill of a business may not only set up a similar business next door and say that he is the person who carried on the old business, but that he may also solicit the customers of the old business to continue to deal with him, although by these proceedings he might not only destroy all benefit to the purchaser of the thing which he had bought, but might recover to himself the actual possession of it. Such a fraudulent proceeding, according to the decision, cannot be prevented by any court of law or equity. It follows that the stipulation which the company's solicitors introduced into the draft was one which they were not entitled to insert if the two letters which I have read were a complete contract. In other words, they were trying to obtain an additional and most important concession from the vendor.

Now, put aside for a moment the Statute of Frauds and decided cases, and suppose this to pass in conversation:—A. offers to B. his business, lease, and goodwill for £450. B. says: "I accept." A day or two afterwards B. asks A. to engage not to carry on a similar business within a distance of five miles. A. answers: "I cannot agree to that, but I will if you say three miles." B. takes time to consider, saying he will send an agent next day to settle the terms. The agent does not go the next day, and A. accordingly says to B.: "I put an end to the matter." No one could doubt that would be a continuous negotiation, and that B. could not say: "I will disregard all that followed the acceptance of the prior offer and insist on there being a complete contract by that acceptance." Well, then, still leaving out of sight the statute and authorities, suppose all this to take place by letters between A. and B. instead of conversation, it is obvious the result must be the same. Some of the letters being by the principals and some by the solicitors could not make any difference. Now what effect has the Statute of Frauds upon such a transaction? Certainly it was not intended to turn a negotiation into an agreement. There was danger of fraud and perjury if parol agreements as to land could be enforced. To obviate this it was enacted: "No action shall be brought whereby to charge . . . any person . . . upon any contract or sale of lands . . . unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." Lord Mansfield, in 1764, pointed out that it had often been said of this statute "that it should never be so turned, construed, or used as to protect or be a means of fraud" (Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1905). This has been repeated again and again since his time, and, very recently, in Jervis v. Berridge, 21 W. R. 395, L. R. 8 Ch. App. p. 360, and, in Hussey v. Horne-Payne, Lord Selborne said, in effect, that the Statute of Frauds was a weapon of defence, not offence. The real truth is that the statute was not meant to affect contracts in any way, but only the evidence of them. It does not provide that a memorandum duly signed shall be a contract, but only that no contract concerning land shall be proved by any lower evidence than such a written memorandum. The question whether the two letters relied on in this case were a complete contract or were only steps in a negotiation is altogether independent of the Statute of Frauds.

Then I must consider the authorities on the subject. Is there anything in them which prevents my deciding this case according to what seems to me the common-sense view of the transaction? In Hussey v. Horne-Payne Lord Cairns, dealing with a case in which it was proposed to satisfy the requirement of the Statute of Frauds through the medium of letters which had passed between the parties, said this:—"It is one of the first principles applicable to a case of the kind that where you have to find your contract, or your note or memorandum, of the terms of the contract, in letters, you must take into consideration the whole of the correspondence which has passed. You must not at one particular time draw a line and say we will look at the letters up to this point and find in them a contract or not, but we will look at nothing beyond. In order, fairly to estimate what was arranged and agreed, if anything was agreed between the parties, you must look at the whole of that which took place and passed between them." Lord Cairns then considered the two letters which in that case it was contended constituted the agreement, putting aside the words "subject to the title being approved by our solicitors" which occurred in the latter of them. He found that in the previous negotiation there had been a verbal suggestion by one of the parties, which was acquiesced in by the other, that the purchase-money should be paid by instalments. What those instalments were to be was to be thereafter settled. There was a subsequent negotiation about this, but before it was ended one of the parties died. The conclusion drawn by Lord Cairns from what the appellant himself told him was "that the two original letters, which, if you took them alone, without any knowledge supplied to you of the other facts of the case, might lead you to think that they represented and amounted to a complete and concluded agreement, yet really were not a complete and concluded agreement; that there were to be other terms which at that time had not been agreed upon, that efforts were made afterwards to settle those other terms, and that these efforts did not result in a settlement of these other terms." And he finds the result to be "that there was in point of fact no completed agreement between the parties." His lordship then considers the words which he had put aside, and treats them as meaning only that the title must be investigated and approved in the usual way. Lord Selborne concurs both in the reasons and the conclusion of Lord Cairns, and adds that he cannot agree, "that because two letters were written by which the conditions required by the Statute of Frauds would have been satisfied if there were nothing outside those letters to the contrary, therefore there is here such a concluded agreement as a court of equity ought specifically to perform without regard to what preceded or what followed. The observation," he says, "has often been made that a contract established by letters may sometimes bind parties, who, when they wrote these letters, did not imagine that they were finally settling the terms of the agreement by which they were to be bound; and it appears to me that no such contract ought to be held established, even by letters which would otherwise be sufficient for the purpose, if it is clear upon the facts that there were other conditions of the intended contract beyond and besides those expressed in the letters which were still in a state of negotiation only, and without the settlement of which the parties had no idea of concluding any agreement. I adhere," his lordship continues, "to what I said when sitting in the Court of Chancery in the case of Jervis v. Berridge, that the Statute of Frauds is a weapon of defence, not offence, and does not make any signed instrument a valid contract by reason of the signature, if it is not such according to the good faith and real intention of the parties, and I think it especially important to keep that principle in view when, as in the present case, it is attempted to draw a line at one point of a negotiation, conducted partly by correspondence and partly at meetings between the parties, without regard to the sequel of the negotiations, which to my mind plainly shows that terms of the intended agreement which were of great practical importance and were so regarded on both sides then remained unsettled, and were still the subject of negotiation between them."

I have examined that case carefully because it has been suggested that the judgment of Lord Cairns proceeds upon the circumstance that the two original letters contained terms which raised a doubt whether there was a concluded contract, and an observation to that effect of one of the judges of the Court of Appeal in Bolton Partners v. Lambert is relied on. I have read Lord Cairns' judgment more than once, and with deference I do not think that to be a just criticism. Both he and Lord Selborne seem to me to lay down broadly that where it is sought to make out a binding contract from correspondence the whole of it as well as the verbal communications at interviews should be regarded, and it is not right to stop at one letter of the correspondence which, with what preceded, might constitute a sufficient agreement within the Statute of Frauds, whereas, if the whole of the correspondence were considered, and particularly as Lord Selborne says, "the sequel" of the communications, it may clearly appear that those letters were in truth only part of an uncompleted negotiation.

As was said in May v. Thomson "the case of Hussey v. Horne-Payne shows that we must look at the whole correspondence from beginning to end. Of course, if we find a few letters which are perfectly plain in themselves which show an agreement, and the parties do not follow them up by further correspondence, we have a comparatively easy case. But where each letter is followed immediately by another which suggests something else as a topic of further discussion, it becomes most dangerous to draw a line after any particular letter."

With that view of the decision of Hussey v. Horne-Payne I entirely agree, and, so understood, it is a valuable and important authority, pointing out and obviating the great danger which arose from the course of modern decisions upon contracts by correspondence—viz., that the Statute of Frauds, which was passed merely to alter the law as to evidence of a contract, might be used as a trap to catch unwary vendors and purchasers and bind them by a contract when the real intention was negotiation only.

The only difference between that case and the present, is that in that case there had been before the letters in question were written an understanding, not expressed in them, that the purchase-money was to be paid by instalments, the amount of which remained to be settled.

In this case there was no anterior understanding as to the restriction of the vendor's right to carry on a similar business to that sold. The negotiation as to that arose after the two letters relied on had passed. But it was begun by the solicitors of the plaintiffs, who are now seeking to rely on the two letters only. Their position, therefore, is, that they were not satisfied with the terms of the two letters, but themselves reopened the matter by negotiating for another most important advantage; and having thus treated the two letters as part of an incomplete bargain, it would be most inequitable to allow them to say, "Although we thus treated the matter as incomplete and a negotiation only, yet the defendant had no right to do so, but was bound by a completed contract." In my opinion the decision of Hussey v. Horne-Payne completely covers this case. I understand it to mean that if two letters standing alone would be evidence of a sufficient contract, yet a negotiation for an important term of the purchase and sale carried on afterwards is enough to show that the contract was not complete, and, so far as my own judgment is concerned, I entirely agree in the justice and equity of such a rule. Cases have been referred to in which a subsequent discussion as to the preparation of a formal contract, even where the letters mention that such a contract is contemplated, has been held not to prevent the letters from being themselves a binding contract. There are many such decisions, and the distinctions between some of them are remarkably fine—see Crossley v. Maycock, 22 W. R. 387, L. R. 18 Eq. 180. But they are all subject to the observation that the formal document contemplated is one which is to put into more correct form, a complete agreement, not to alter that agreement by adding a substantial term to it. I have already pointed out that the subsequent negotiation in this case was in no sense concerning a matter of form, but was a negotiation for an additional term, to which the plaintiffs had no right, according to existing decisions, at law or in equity. It was suggested that the ten days during which the offer was to remain open had not expired when it was withdrawn. But this can make no difference. The offer was not a contract, and the term that it should remain open for ten days was therefore not binding. It has often been held that such an offer may, notwithstanding, be withdrawn within the ten days—Routledge v. Grant, 4 Bing. 653; Cooke v. Oxley, 3 T. R. 653; Dickinson v. Dodds, 24 W. R. 594, 2 Ch. D. 463. I decide this case against the plaintiffs upon the ground that although the two letters relied on would, if nothing else had taken place, have been sufficient evidence of a complete agreement, yet the plaintiffs have themselves shown that the agreement was not complete by stipulating afterwards for an important additional term, which kept the whole matter of purchase and sale in a state of negotiation only, and that the defendant was therefore at liberty to put an end to the negotiations, as he did, by withdrawing his offer. The action must be dismissed, with costs.

In re Bristol Athenæum. (a.)

Company — Literary society — Trading company — "Business"—Winding up — Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 199—Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 112), ss. 30, 33.

An unregistered association, not established for the purpose of gain, but for the promotion of literary and scientific purposes, cannot be wound up under section 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, which is only applicable to trading associations.

Such a literary or scientific association, though consisting of members who are shareholders, is not a joint-stock company within the proviso in section 30 of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, and on its dissolution its property must be given to some kindred institution, to be determined in manner prescribed under section 30 of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, even although the rules of the association contain a provision that the property of the society on its dissolution is to be divided among its shareholders. Such a provision is contrary to the Act.

Petition.

The Bristol Athenæum was a society established in 1844 for the purpose of promoting "moral and intellectual improvement and social recreation by means of libraries for circulation and reference, newspapers, and periodical publications, lectures, discussion, and classes for instruction and improvement in literature and the arts and sciences. The lectures to include theological and political science, but not party or local politics or controversial theology."

The society consisted of donors to the funds of £20 and upwards (who were to be life members), of shareholders, and of annual subscribers of various sums. The property of the society was to be vested in five trustees with power to sell or exchange such property for the benefit of the society at the request of the board of directors. The society was never incorporated or registered under any Act of Parliament, and no trust deed was ever executed.

Certain leasehold premises in Bristol were acquired by the society and were vested in trustees.

In 1884 the trustees mortgaged these leasehold premises by way of sub-demise to secure the payment of £1,750.

In March, 1888, certain new rules were adopted by the society, which were as follow:—

"The society shall not be dissolved unless a resolution be carried by a majority of at least two-thirds of the life members and shareholders present at a meeting especially convened for that purpose, and confirmed by at least as great a majority at a second special meeting held at an interval of not less than a month from the first. The property remaining after paying off all liabilities shall be divided among the shareholders pro ratâ" (rule 15).

"This society shall not make any dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money unto or between any of its members" (rule 18).

In August, 1888, the mortgagee sold the premises, and after satisfaction of the mortgage there remained a balance of £800 which was paid to the solicitors of the surviving trustees in whom the premises subject to the mortgage were vested.

On the 22nd of August, 1888, a general meeting of the life members and shareholders was held, at which it was resolved that the society should be dissolved, and at another meeting held on the 1st of October this resolution was confirmed.

In November, 1888, the library books, furniture, fittings, and other effects of the society were sold, and the proceeds, amounting to £150, were paid to the treasurer of the society. The said sums of £800 and £150 represented the whole available assets, and the directors had paid thereout all the ascertainable debts and liabilities of the society. Advertisements for creditors and claimants had been issued, and the time limited by such advertisements had long since expired.

This petition for winding up the society was now presented under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, by shareholders and a life member, who stated in the petition that it was not known who the present shareholders were, by reason of many of them having died or gone to reside away from Bristol, or having transferred their shares to persons who had not registered the transfers; that there remained a considerable surplus for distribution, but that, having regard to the difficulty in determining whether the shareholders of the society were entitled to the surplus, and, if so, how it ought to be distributed, it was just and equitable that the society should be wound up by the court.

Edward Ford, for the petition.—This society may be wound up under the 199th section of the Companies

(a.) Reported by C. H. F. Christie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act, 1862, which applies to unregistered companies. The society is not a trading association, but an extended meaning may be given to the term "place of business" in that section. Re Dutton, 27 W. R. 398, 4 Ex. D. 54, is distinguishable. The society is not within the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, because of the proviso in section 30, "this clause shall not apply to any institution which shall have been founded or established by the contributions of shareholders in the nature of a joint-stock company."

A. G. Ford, for the society.

Kay, J.—I think that this is not a society which comes within the description "an institution in the nature of a joint-stock company." It is not a trading association at all. Section 199 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that any partnership, association, or company, except railway companies, consisting of more than seven members, and not registered under the Act, and thereinafter included under the term "unregistered," may be wound up. Now of course this society is not registered. But if it comes within any section it is not section 199, because the first sub-section of that section provides that an unregistered company shall, for the purpose "of determining the court having jurisdiction in the matter of winding up, be deemed to be registered in that part of the United Kingdom where its principal place of business is situate," therefore, the "partnership, association, or company," which may be wound up under section 199 must be one of those thereinafter included under the term "unregistered company," and an unregistered company under the section must be wound up at its place of business, and "business" must ordinarily be trading under the Act. But in the first place this does not seem to me to be a joint-stock company, because it is constituted by rules which do not permit of any dividend, division, or bonus among its members. The funds which are provided by the rules are to be subscribed by life members, subscribers, and shareholders. The objects of the society are entirely within the 33rd section of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, to which I have been referred. Therefore, undoubtedly it is an institution within that Act of Parliament. Now that Act provides that when such an institution—speaking generally, a literary institution, to call it by that name for this purpose—is dissolved, which this has been by both classes of members, its property shall be given to some other institution, to be determined either by the members or by the county court—some other like institution.

No doubt these rules contain a provision that when the society is dissolved its property shall be divided, not among those who contributed, but among the shareholders only. That is distinctly contrary to the Act. No rules can obviate or get rid of the effect of a public Act of Parliament. It seems to me that this Act applies, and that this institution does not come within the exception in section 30 which excepts joint-stock companies. This institution, for the reason I have given, seems to me not to be a joint-stock company, and, therefore, I think that the proper view to take is that the shareholders cannot divide the property of the company, as to which, indeed, there seems to be a difficulty, because it has not been ascertained who they are and where they all are. The institution to which the property must be given must be determined by the court. This, however, cannot be done until all the liabilities are discharged. It is suggested that there may be a liability under covenants in the leases to which the institution is subject. The court will, of course, see that proper provision is made to indemnify the members. I am glad to come to this conclusion, because if I were to make a winding-up order a great part of the funds would be dissipated in costs, whereas now, by a simple application, the fund may be saved for the benefit of some other useful institution of the same class and character. I am of opinion that the institution comes within the first part of the 30th section of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, and is not affected by the proviso in that section. I therefore make no order, except that the costs of the petitioners and of the association are to be paid out of the assets of the institution.

Will—Construction—Forfeiture—Alienation—Repugnancy—Annulment of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 35 (2).

A testator by his will gave his personalty absolutely to, amongst others, his children. He devised his real and leasehold estate and his residuary estate, as to one-third to his wife for life, and as to two-thirds to his children for life equally, with remainder, after the death of his wife, to his children equally.

The will contained a forfeiture clause, whereby if, by any act or operation of law, the share given to his wife or any child should be aliened, charged, or disposed of, the share or shares so aliened, charged, or disposed of should vest in the other beneficiaries. At the date of the testator's death one of his daughters, who, under the will, had been given an absolute interest, an immediate life interest, and a contingent life interest, was a bankrupt. The bankruptcy was annulled some years afterwards, sufficient funds having come to the trustee's hands to pay all the creditors in full. The contingent gift still remained contingent at the date of the annulment.

Held, that, as to the absolute gifts, whether in possession or remainder, at the testator's death, the forfeiture clause was repugnant and void; that, as to the contingent life interest, the forfeiture clause did not operate, since the moment for determining whether the clause applied was when payment and receipt became possible; but

Held, also, that, as to the immediate life interest, the clause of forfeiture did operate, notwithstanding the provisions as to the consequences of annulment contained in section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (the Act applicable to this particular case), the language of which, for the present purpose, is the same as section 35, sub-section (2), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by Georgina Metcalfe, one of the daughters of a testator, Thomas Metcalfe, against the widow, who was an executrix, and the other children of the testator for administration of the testator's estate, and payment to her of a share of the testator's property.

The question raised was as to the operation of a forfeiture clause in the testator's will, dated the 10th of May, 1864, by which he bequeathed certain personalty to his wife, and directed his executrix and executor to convert all debts, shares, and securities for money, and all moneys at his dwelling-house, or at his bank, or in the funds, and bequeathed one-third part thereof to his wife, and the remaining two-thirds equally between his children living at his decease, and attaining twenty-one or marrying, as tenants in common. The testator also demised and bequeathed to his executrix and executor certain real and leasehold estates, and also all his residuary estate upon trust, to permit his wife to receive one-third of the rents and profits thereof for her life or during widowhood, to pay the remaining two-thirds to his children living at his decease for their respective lives and the lives and life of the survivors or survivor, such payments to commence at twenty-one or marriage. The testator also declared that on the death or second marriage of his wife the said children should share equally the clear rents and profits during their lives and the lives of the survivors or survivor, and on the death of any of the children the share of such child was to go over to the shares of the survivors or survivor. Towards the end of the will there was a proviso as follows:—"Provided also that if by any act or default or by operation of law the part or share, parts or shares, or the whole of the said rents and profits, or any other sums of money or interests limited or bequeathed by this my will in trust for my said wife and children or child, grandchildren or grandchild, or either of them, shall be aliened, charged, or disposed of, either in part or as to the whole of the said several and respective shares and interests, whereby the same respectively would, but for this provision, vest in or become payable to some other person or persons, otherwise than my said wife, children or child, grandchildren or grandchild, or either of them, then my said trustees or trustee shall, upon such act or default, or upon such operation of law as aforesaid, pay or apply the share or shares, interest, or interests so aliened, charged, or disposed of, or attempted so to be dealt with as and in manner aforesaid, to and among the others or other of the person or the persons who would have been entitled to the same by survivorship in remainder or otherwise under the aforesaid trusts as in the case of the death or deaths of the person or persons so alienating, charging, or disposing of his, her, or their respective shares and interests, or attempting the same as and in manner aforesaid."

The testator died on the 7th of February, 1884, leaving five children who had attained the age of twenty-one. The plaintiff, Georgina Metcalfe, had been adjudicated a bankrupt on the 16th of March, 1882. On the 17th of January, 1885, the plaintiff became entitled, upon the death of her brother, to a share under another will, and in February, 1887, this interest was sold by her trustee in bankrupty for £425. The creditors were all paid in full, and there was a small balance. On the 10th of June, 1887, the plaintiff's bankruptcy was annulled; but the bankruptcy having occurred before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the effect of the annulment was governed by section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which section, however, for the present purpose, is the same as section 35, subsection (2), of the Act of 1883. The question argued was as to the effect of the forfeiture clause upon the absolute gifts in the will, both in possession and remainder, and also upon the life interests, both present and contingent. No part of the testator's residuary estate had fallen into possession since the annulment of the plaintiff's bankruptcy.

Warmington, Q.C., and G. R. Napier, for the plaintiff.—This forfeiture clause is certainly bad as to everything beyond an immediate life interest. First, as regards absolute interests, when once you find them given, anything that cuts them down or defeats them is void for repugnancy: Coke upon Lyttleton, 223 A.; Bradley v. Peixoto, 3 Ves. jun. 324; Holmes v. Godson, 4 W. R. 415, 8 De. G. M. & G. 152; In re Rosher, Rosher v. Rosher, 32 W. R. 821, 26 Ch. D. 801; In re Dugdale, Dugdale v. Dugdale, 36 W. R. 462, 38 Ch. D. 176. The question is one of the construction of the will, as to what was the interest given. The effect of the annulment of the bankruptcy of the plaintiff was to restore the plaintiff to her former position, and operated as a sort of statutory reverter. There is no devolution of title from the trustee to the bankrupt: Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 81; Bailey v. Johnson, L. R. 7 Ex. 263. The bankruptcy was unduly prolonged by the trustee, as, within a year of the testator's death, the plaintiff's estate was really solvent, owing to the fact of assets having come in from another source. The gift over is only to take effect if the primary object of the testator is likely to be defeated; but the bankruptcy is now annulled, so that this forfeiture clause has no application to either absolute or life interests: White v. Chitty, 14 W. R. 366, L. R. 1 Eq. 372; Lloyd v. Lloyd, L. R. 2 Eq. 722, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42; Ancona v. Waddell, 27 W. R. 186, 10 Ch. D. 157; Robertson v. Richardson, 33 W. R. 897, 30 Ch. D. 623. These were cases of life interests, but the question as to the effect of the annulment of the bankruptcy is the same whether it is a fee simple or a life interest. Secondly, as to the contingent life interests, they have not become vested, and, therefore, in no case does the clause apply. The annulment of the bankruptcy took place before any right to receive anything under these bequests occurred: In re Parnham's Trust, 46 L. J. (Ch.) 80, 25 W. L. Dig. 326; Samuel v. Samuel, 12 Ch. D. 152, 28 W. R. Dig. 250.

Neville, Q.C., and Gaselee, for the defendants.—The forfeiture clause operated upon all the various interests. Upon the first main point as to the clause being repugnant it is the same for this purpose whether a life interest or an interest in fee is given. In no way can you give either an absolute interest or a life interest, and couple it with a condition which is inconsistent with the legal rights which pass by such a gift, but you can, by means of a forfeiture clause limit the enjoyment of a life estate: Brandon v. Robinson, 18 Ves. 429. The only case of an absolute interest in substance being given is Samuel v. Samuel, and in the present case it is the same. [KEKEWICH, J.—I do not read it as an absolute gift in Samuel v. Samuel. Is there any case of an absolute gift in form being given and then being cut down by a condition?] No, I cannot find one, but there is a material statement on this point in the case of In re Stringer's Estate, 25 W. R. 815, 6 Ch. D. 1, where James, L.J., says, that when once property was vested de facto in a man it could not be taken from him by an expression of wish of the testator, but that "did not apply to a case where the original gift never did take effect at all, because then there is no repugnance." This absolute interest was never vested de facto in the plaintiff, if it had been the forfeiture clause would be void. The time at which to consider whether the forfeiture clause applies is the time for distribution. If the legatee is in a position to receive his legacy he must have it, if it is to be received by somebody else then he is excluded from it. No violence is done to the testator's language by such a construction. As to the annulment of the bankruptcy. The time before which the annulment should have taken place, in order to exclude the operation of the forfeiture clause, is the date of the death of the testator. Between February, 1884, and February, 1887, the interest of the plaintiff was payable to the trustee in bankrupty if the forfeiture clause did not apply. The time when the operation of the clause is to take place is to be determined once for all: the forfeiture clause is not to be read distributively, but applies to every interest taken under the will: Dorsett v. Dorsett, 10 W. R. 98, 30 Beav. 256. The forfeiture having taken place, the gift over comes in, and no subsequent event can alter it.

They also cited Markwick v. Hardingham, 29 W. R. 361, 15 Ch. D. 339.

Warmington, Q.C., in reply.—The forfeiture clause cannot be read as limited to the period of distribution, it must be read distributively and applied to the particular interests according as circumstances require.

KEKEWICH, J.—The object of the clause in question is to secure personal enjoyment of the fund by the legatee, or, rather, to provide against the benefits given to him by the will being enjoyed otherwise than by him personally. The difficulty in construing the clause arises from the state of the facts rather than anything else. The words "shall be," in my opinion, clearly cover, not only a bankruptcy occurring in the testator's lifetime, but before the date of the will: Trappes v. Meredith, 20 W. R. 130, L. R. 7 Ch. 248; Gibbons v. Gibbons, 6 App. Cas. 471, 29 W. R. Dig. 249.

As regards the other points: The forfeiture clause must be read distributively—that is, as repeated before each gift in favour of the plaintiff; hence the gift in question takes a conditional form, and determinable on the happening of any one of the events specified.

It is contended that the proviso cannot operate on the two different sets of gifts, because, as regards one, such operation is legally impossible, and, as regards the other, no specified event has occurred.

There are unquestionably gifts to the plaintiff of an absolute character—gifts, that is, which, if concerned with land, would create an estate in fee; and the plaintiff says that to put the forfeiture clause in operation as regards these would be to defeat the original gift by a condition repugnant to it, and therefore void. An estate cannot be limited to a man and his heirs until he shall convey the land to a stranger, because it is of the essence of an estate in fee that it confers free power of alienation, and it has long been settled that the principle is equally applicable to gifts of personalty. In favour of the will, which must be read and construed as a whole, you can allow such a proviso to defeat any particular estate, not as operating to take away that which has already been given, but as restricting the quantity of the original gift; but an estate in fee, or its equivalent, an absolute gift of personalty, does not admit of such treatment.

As regards, then, the gifts which, according to the terms of the will, independently of the forfeiture clause, vested absolutely, whether in possession or in remainder, on the testator's death, I think, following Holmes v. Godson, that they are unaffected by the forfeiture clause, not because the language of the clause is inapplicable to them, but because the defeasance is repugnant to the original gifts, and therefore void. Though that is the rule governing gifts of absolute interests, whether in possession or remainder, there is a distinction, in the case of gifts of particular interests, between interests in possession and interests in remainder. It has been held in many cases that if a bankruptcy which, if continuing, would have brought a forfeiture clause into operation, has been annulled before any money becomes payable to the legatee the clause does not come into operation, because the personal enjoyment does not, in the events which have happened, require to be secured, and this rule is directly applicable to reversionary interests, whether taking effect as remainders or as executory gifts.

This coincides with what the late Master of the Rolls says down in In re Parnham's Trusts, and followed in Samuel v. Samuel. It is not denied that the bankruptcy subsisted at the testator's death, and thus whatever had been given to the bankrupt by the will of the testator was immediately transferred to the trustee in bankruptcy, and might have been realized for the creditors, and it is said that therefore personal enjoyment was interfered with so as to bring the forfeiture clause into operation. But personal enjoyment points not to vesting in law, but to enjoyment in fact; that enjoyment which if not interfered with would have resulted in payment and receipt; but a gift which, according to the terms of the will, cannot be thus enjoyed remains for the time in suspense. The moment for determining whether the forfeiture clause is applicable to it or not, is the moment when receipt or payment becomes possible in fact. I have no doubt that the period of distribution—that is, the time when payment to the legatee becomes due in law—is the time when the inquiry, whether a legatee is in a position to receive, that is, himself give a receipt for his legacy, or whether it is payable to his trustee in bankruptcy, must be made and answered. The cases of Samuel v. Samuel, Robertson v. Richardson, and also that of Ancona v. Waddell, all tend in this direction. The postponement of payment by some accident, as the difficulty of proving some devolution of title, or the lunacy, or death, or absence from this country of a trustee, or any other like cause, ought not to affect the result. In this instance the testator died on February 7, 1884, and such gifts as took effect in possession at the testator's death became payable then, or, at least, at the expiration of one year from that date. The bankruptcy, as a matter of fact, subsisted for more than two years after the death. It is said that there was enough in the bankrupt's estate to pay all creditors, and that the bankruptcy was unduly prolonged. If that were substantially true I should be quite prepared to hold that the annulment of bankruptcy need not have been formally made in order to prevent the operation of the forfeiture clause, and that the merely nominal interposition of a trustee in bankruptcy, whose duty it would be, under the circumstances, to hold the fund for the benefit of the alleged bankrupt, could not be held to defeat personal enjoyment. This is the meaning of the decision in Ancona v. Waddell. But I cannot give the plaintiff the benefit of any such ruling here. The bankruptcy was not annulled until June 10, 1887, and the assets sufficient to procure that result did not fall in until January, 1885, and were not realized until February, 1887. I hold, therefore, that any life interests to which the plaintiff was entitled under the will at the testator's death were not excluded from the operation of the forfeiture clause by the annulment of the bankruptcy.

As to the effect of the 81st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which is substantially the same as section 35, sub-section (2), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, I think it was only intended to operate as between the debtor on one hand and the trustee or other persons claiming title under the bankruptcy on the other, and to confer on the debtor, as from the date of annulment, a good title to his property, so that he may convey or give a good discharge for the same without the concurrence of the trustee in bankruptcy, but it was not intended to affect the title of other persons claiming independently, under such a forfeiture clause as this one.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The holder of a licence to sell beer in bottles to be drunk off the premises under the Inland Revenue Act, 1863, is, by virtue of section 18 of the Game Act, 1831, disqualified from holding a licence to deal in game.

Case stated by justices under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1879 and 1884.

Messrs. Shoolbred applied to the justices of the St. Pancras Division of the County of London sitting in special sessions for a licence to deal in game under the Game Act, 1831.

Section 18 of the Game Act authorizes justices to grant a licence to deal in game to any person "not being an innkeeper, or victualler, or licensed to sell beer by retail, nor being the owner, guard, or driver of any mail coach or other vehicle employed in the conveyance of the mails of letters, or of any stage coach, stage wagon, van, or other public conveyance, nor being a carrier or higgler."

The applicants were holders of a licence to sell beer in bottles to be drunk off the premises, under section 1 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1863, which enacts that "any person who, in England or Ireland, shall have taken out an excise licence to sell strong beer in casks containing not less than four-and-a-half gallons, or in not less than two dozen reputed quart bottles at one time, to be drunk or consumed elsewhere than on his premises, may take out an additional licence on payment of the excise duty of one pound one shilling, and five per cent. thereon; and the same shall authorize such person to sell beer in any less quantity and in any other manner than as aforesaid, but not to be drunk or consumed on the premises where sold."

The justices were of opinion that the possession of such a licence precluded the holder thereof from obtaining a licence to deal in game, and therefore refused the application, but stated this case in order that the applicants might appeal.

Grain, for the appellants.—Messrs. Shoolbred are not persons "licensed to sell beer by retail" within the meaning of section 18 of the Game Act, 1831. Those words must be held to apply to persons holding a licence under the Beerhouse Act, 1830 (1 Will 4, c. 64). That Act was the first Act which created beerhouse licences, and by the amending Act of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 61) it became necessary for the holder of such a licence to be a resident occupier of the premises in respect of which the premises were granted. The licence held by the appellants was first created in 1863, many years after the Game Act, and is altogether a different licence; it does not require residential occupation, and it does not entitle the holder to sell beer to be drunk on the premises. The case of Jones v. Bone, 18 W. R. 489, L. R. 9 Eq. 674, is an illustration of the difference between the two licences. A consideration of the classes of persons disqualified by section 18 of the Game Act shows that the intention of the Legislature was to prevent poaching and the harbouring of poachers, and the disposal of poached game. There was no intention to aim at persons in the position of the appellants.

Bodkin, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

FRY, L.J.—I think the justices were right in their decision. The question turns on the true construction of the Game Act, 1831. That statute gave authority to justices to grant licences to persons to deal in game, such persons not being, among others, persons licensed to sell beer by retail. At that time licences to sell beer by retail were known; there were what are called full licences, and there were what are called beerhouse licences, that is, excise licences granted under the Act of 1830, and subsequently confined to resident occupiers. The Legislature in the Game Act of 1831 does not refer to the Act of 1830, but uses general language. I think that the words "licensed to sell beer by retail" mean persons entitled to sell beer by retail according to the law for the time being in force from time to time. The method of granting licences and the formalities to be complied with have been modified since that time by several statutes. The appellants hold a licence under the Act of 1863, which requires different formalities from the Act of 1830. But they have a licence to sell beer by retail, and therefore come within the language and meaning of the statute. The case which has been cited does not throw any light on the question.

Appeal dismissed.

EVANS v. NEWPORT URBAN SANITARY AUTHORITY. (a.)

Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 4, 150, 257—Highway—Expenses to new road—Frontagers.

Where a street has been formed by an old footpath and by strips of land newly added to it, and the old footpath was repairable by the parish, the frontagers are liable to pay the expenses incurred in improving the whole street under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Special case.

The appellant was summoned before the justices of the borough of Newport for non-payment of expenses incurred by the urban sanitary authority of that borough (the respondents) in improving a road. The justices determined that he was liable under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the case having been argued in the High Court on the point whether the road was a "street" within sections 4 and 150 of the above Act, the court decided that it was such a "street," and remitted the entire case to the justices for a rehearing upon the point whether the road was or was not a highway repairable by the parish. The justices found that the road was an ancient footpath or highway, but that it had been altered, widened, and added to. They further found that, houses having been built abutting thereon, it was a street within sections 4 and 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and adjudged that the frontagers were liable to pay the expenses incurred on the improvements.

After argument before a divisional court the case was again remitted to the justices to find whether or not the whole of the said road was a public highway, and what were the additions, &c., in the ancient highway or footpath, and where, and when, and by whom the same were made. The further finding of the justices on this point was that the whole of the road was not a public highway, and that the father of the appellant, about 1850, by permission of the adjoining landholders, made a carriage-drive, fenced and metalled the whole road, put in a drain, and made a quickset hedge and bank all the way down. At the western end he planted his quickset hedge within the boundary of the old track, thereby throwing a portion of his land into the road. Land was added by the father of the appellant on the north side to what was the ancient track for a considerable distance in order to get an entrance to his property. Land was also added at both ends and a long way towards the middle on the appellant's side, the north side, of the present road, and land was also taken from the site of the old track and included within the then new boundary of the appellant's property; a small portion of his boundary wall was built upon the boundary of the ancient highway or footway—viz., about 300 feet, or one-fourth of the whole, the total length being about 1,200 feet; and on the south side the road was widened in 1864, and on that side the boundary of the road was a hedge and a high bank, which had been taken away, and a long strip of land, about 160 feet, was thrown into the roadway in order to make the road broader.

The appellant appealed against the order of the justices, on the ground that he was not liable to pay the amount claimed from him under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Ram, for the appellant.—The road is an ancient highway. If so, section 150 of the Public Health Act does not apply.

Macnorran, for the respondents.—The frontagers have been charged in respect of the enlarged road. Where an old highway has been widened the frontagers are liable to be charged: Richards v. Kessick, 57 L. J. M. C. 48. Further, the apportionment of expenses is conclusive, because it has not been disputed within three months, under section 257: Midland Railway Co. v. Watton, 34 W. R. 524, 17 Q. B. D. 30.

Ram, in reply.—There was no jurisdiction to make the order: Eccles v. Wirral Sanitary Authority, 34 W. R. 412, 17 Q. B. D. 107.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The question for our determination is whether the justices were substantially right in deciding that the appellant was liable to pay the amount claimed from him. They have adjudged that the frontagers are liable to pay the expenses of this road under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 150, and that, having regard to the circumstances, the appellant has now no right of objection because he did not avail himself of the provisions of section 257 of the same Act. The road was originally an old road, and had been altered from time to time to suit the convenience of adjacent proprietors. In fact, it had ceased to be an old road and had become a street composed partly of the old road and partly of a new road. The justices found that the old road had been repaired by the parish—indeed, one witness said he had repaired it for the highway board—and the minute-books of the highway board showed that the surveyor had repaired the road. We have to say whether, in the case of a road constituted by an old road and by new additions to it, jurisdiction is given to the justices to charge the expenses of the repairs on the frontagers.

By the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 150, "where any street within any urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) is not sewered, levelled, paved, &c.," the local authority may do the work and take certain proceedings to recover the expenses from the frontagers. As the section relates to a street "not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large," there is, so far, no jurisdiction to charge the frontagers, because it is said that this is a street repairable by the inhabitants at large. But the final clause of this section enacts that "the same proceedings may be taken and the same powers may be exercised in respect of any street or road of which a part is, or may be, a public footpath or repairable by the inhabitants at large as fully as if the whole of such street or road was a highway not repairable by the inhabitants at large." Therefore, when part is a highway and repairable by the parish, and part is not, the road may be dealt with just as if it was not repairable by the parish, which is the case in point.

The justices found "that the road in question was an ancient footpath or highway, but that it had been altered, widened, and added to, and houses having been built abutting thereon, it is a new street within sections 4 and 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875." I am clearly of opinion that the justices were right in making the order. There must be judgment for the respondents, but it is not necessary to decide the other question raised in the case.

BIRCH v. CROPPER.

In re BRIDGWATER NAVIGATION CO. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Surplus assets—Partly paid-up shares—Distribution—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 133, sub-sections 1, 10.

In the liquidation of a company limited by shares, the surplus assets, after providing for debts and liabilities and for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories, ought to be distributed amongst all shareholders (ordinary and preference) in proportion to their shares; and this is the case though some of the shares are only partly paid up.

A company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, was voluntarily wound up, and, after paying all expenses and returning the capital advanced by each shareholder, there was a large surplus. The shares consisted of preference shares fully paid up and ordinary shares partly paid up. There were no provisions in the articles regulating the distribution of assets in case of a winding up.

Held (reversing the decision of the Court of Appeal, 36 W. R. 769, 39 Ch. D. 1), that the surplus must be divided amongst the holders of all the shares in proportion to the shares held by them respectively.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Fry, and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported as In re Bridgwater Navigation Co., 36 W. R. 769, 39 Ch. D. 1; and the question was upon what principle the surplus assets of the company should be distributed as between the ordinary and preference shares.

The facts are given in the judgments of Lords Herschell and Macnaghten.

Aug. 9.—Lord Herschell.—The only question for determination in this case is upon what principle the balance of the proceeds of the realization of the assets of the Bridgwater Navigation Co. remaining after satisfying all the liabilities of the company and returning to the shareholders the paid-up capital, is to be distributed as between the holders of the ordinary and preference shares of the company. The company was formed in 1872 for the purpose of acquiring the Bridgwater and other canals, with a capital of £500,000, divided into 500 shares of £1,000 each. By resolution duly passed in September of that year it was provided that the capital, instead of being divided into shares of £1,000, should be divided into 50,000 shares of £10 each, and should be increased to £1,300,000, consisting of 130,000 shares of that amount.

Prior to April, 1880, £100,000 out of the capital of £1,300,000 had been issued as ordinary shares, upon which £2 10s. per share had then been paid; and on the 27th of that month it was resolved at an extraordinary meeting that the balance of the uncreated capital—viz., £300,000—should be created, and that the 30,000 new shares should be issued as preference shares entitling the holder to a preferential dividend of five per cent. In pursuance of this resolution the shares were issued accordingly, and the additional capital of £300,000 was paid up. At the same time a call of £1 was made on the ordinary shares, raising the amount paid up on them to £3 10s. per share.

In 1887 the Manchester Ship Canal Co. purchased the undertaking and assets of the Bridgwater Canal Navigation Co. for the sum of £1,710,000, and it was thereupon resolved that the latter company should be wound up voluntarily. In the September following the liquidators repaid to the preference and ordinary shareholders the amount of capital paid up on their shares. After making this return to the shareholders, and after discharging all the debts and liabilities of the company, there remained in the hands of the liquidators a surplus of about £550,000. The question is how this surplus ought to be distributed amongst the ordinary and preference shareholders respectively.

The court below has determined that the distribution ought to be made in proportion to the amounts respectively paid upon their shares, and your lordships have to determine whether this is the correct principle to apply. It is contended on behalf of the appellant, who represents the ordinary shareholders, that they are entitled to the whole of the surplus; but, failing this contention, it is insisted that the division ought to be made according to the capital subscribed, and not to the amount paid up on the shares.

The Companies Act affords very little assistance in terms towards a decision of the question. It provides that, in the case of a voluntary winding up, the property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities, and, subject thereto, shall, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, be distributed amongst the members according to their rights and interests in the company. But this leaves undetermined what those rights and interests are.

The learned counsel for the appellant argue that, except in so far as the provisions of the Companies Acts necessarily create a distinction between the rights of its members and those of partners, the principles of the law of partnership are applicable, and ought to be applied; and they urge that, in the case of a partnership, unless the terms upon which it is entered into provide otherwise, surplus assets are distributable amongst the partners in the proportions in which they are entitled to share the profits. Even assuming that the doctrine laid down with regard to the division of surplus assets in the case of a partnership be correct (upon which I pronounce no opinion), I am unable to see how it establishes the appellant's claim, that the ordinary shareholders should receive the whole of the assets. The appellant's argument appears to assume that the preference shareholders are not entitled to any share of the profits of the company. I do not think this is the case. What they are to receive is, indeed, limited in its amount, but it is none the less a share in the profits. To treat them as partners receiving only interest on their capital and not entitled to participate in the profits of the concern, or to regard them as mere creditors whose only claim is discharged when they have received back their loan, appears to me out of the question. They are members of the company, and as much shareholders in it as the ordinary shareholders are; and it is in respect of their thus holding shares that they receive a part of the profits. I think, therefore, that the first contention of the appellant wholly fails.

The other point raised by the appeal is, to my mind, one of considerable difficulty. There is no decision bearing directly upon the point, and it must, therefore, be determined upon general principles of equity. Some stress was laid in the court below upon the decision in the case of Sheppard v. The Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Co.; but I do not think that case can be relied on as an authority, except where the circumstances are precisely similar. All the noble and learned lords who took part in the consideration of that case in this House rested their opinions upon the very special facts of the case, and intimated that they were not laying down any general principle.

The view taken by the court below has presented to my mind from the outset some formidable difficulties. I cannot but feel that it would in some cases be most inequitable to take into consideration in distributing the surplus assets only the amount of capital paid up by the several classes of shareholders, and to make the distribution accordingly. In the Court of Appeal Cotton and Fry, L.JJ., were guided to their conclusion by the provisions contained in the articles of association of this particular company. With all deference, I do not think that they really afford the assistance that was supposed. The 85th article of association prescribes that the net profits of each year shall be divided pro ratâ upon the whole paid-up capital of the company, and that the directors may declare a dividend to be payable thereout on the shares in proportion to the amounts paid up thereon. But this article is clearly inapplicable to the preference shareholders, who do not share pro ratâ in the profits of the year. Their rights are determined by the resolution creating the new capital, which provided that the new shares were to entitle the holders thereof to a dividend of five per cent. per annum "upon the amount for the time being called up thereon," and taking precedence over all dividends on the ordinary shares. This clearly by implication excludes in the case of these shares the operation of article 85. Cotton, L.J., after pointing out, I think correctly, that, under the articles, both as regards the ordinary shareholders and the preference shareholders respectively inter se, the right to the dividend was to be on the footing of its being in proportion to the sum paid up on the shares, proceeds to say:—"That is the footing upon which to decide it. All question of preference is now at an end, and the shareholders are to be dealt with as having equal rights, because the provision in the articles creating the preference shares as regards dividend to arise on the working of the capital is at an end. We must deal with them all as shareholders having equal rights without reference to profits; and, in my opinion, when that is so, and when there is the indication in the articles of association, which form the contract of partnership, that profit is to be divided when it is a going concern and arising from the working of the business in accordance with the sums paid upon each share, then, in this particular case, and having regard to that provision, the true equitable mode of dividing this sum is to divide it among all the shareholders in accordance with, and in proportion to, the amount paid up by them on their shares." I have a difficulty in seeing how the provisions of the articles alluded to show that the equitable mode of distribution is that suggested. It is conceded that they cease to be applicable when the company comes to be wound up; but, if they are to be regarded at all, I think that their full effect must be borne in mind. It is not the case that when the company was a going concern the profits earned were to be divided in accordance with the sums paid on each share. The share of the profits to which the preference shareholders were entitled was limited in amount. It did not depend upon the proportion which the profits bore to the total paid-up capital. And the ordinary shareholders were, in fact, receiving a proportion of the profits exceeding that which they would have been entitled to had such profits been divided to each shareholder in proportion to the capital paid up. I do not say that this indicates the mode in which the surplus assets should be distributed; but it does appear to me to show that it does not follow from the method in which profits were divided that the equitable mode of dividing surplus is to let all the members share alike in proportion to the amount paid up on their shares. In the present case, too, it cannot be doubted that in estimating the price to be paid by the canal company the future prospects of the Bridgwater Co., the probable development of its property and the increase in its value was taken into account. In these future prospects the preference shareholders had no concern save in so far as they improved the security for the payment of their interest. If that security was already ample, the benefit arising from the increased value of the company's undertaking would, down to the time of its being wound up, enure entirely to the ordinary shareholders. And yet, in so far as the price represented this increased future value, the result of the decision is to give to the preference shareholders approximately one-half of it. Now I do not mean to say that any principle can be laid down which will insure perfect equality in this respect, but that which has been adopted appears to me to tend to raise the inequality to a maximum. The articles of association do not appear to me to afford the means of deciding this case upon any special grounds peculiar to this company. Their provisions are such as are commonly to be found regulating the distribution of profits in the case of joint-stock companies. I think the determination of the question at issue must be arrived at upon principles wider and of more general application. In my opinion one consideration of essential importance, if an equitable distribution of the assets is to be attained, has been altogether lost sight of. The payment of £3 10s. per share was not the only contribution made by the ordinary shareholders to the assets of the company. They had each come under liability to pay the balance due on the shares held by them. Such a contribution might in many cases be just as valuable, and tend just as effectually to the prosperity of the company, as if they had actually paid the amount. I cannot think that this ought to be disregarded in estimating the respective rights and interests of members in the company and its property. In the case of Sheppard v. The Scinde Railway Co., Bowen, L.J., said, "Was the sum produced in any way by the liability to pay calls? That is a question of fact, and I am satisfied that the liability to pay calls was not in any way an element in the production of this purchase-money." I am not by any means prepared to say the same of this company. On the contrary, I think it most probable, looking to the large sums of money raised on loan at a moderate rate of interest, that the liability of the shareholders did add very materially to the ease with which these loans were obtained, and to the consequent development and prosperity of the undertaking. In the same case Fry, L.J., said: "It seems to me that in this case distribution must be proportionate to contribution. But it is said, suppose the property to have been produced, not by unequal contributions, but by unequal liabilities to pay, the proceeds must be distributed according to the unequal liabilities. I agree that in that case the distribution must be guided by the amount of the liabilities. I conclude that in this case the assumption of liability by the shareholders has not in any way produced the property, and that it cannot be said that the capital has been in the least increased by the liability." In the present case that learned judge appears to have discarded altogether these considerations, apparently because he thought the matter settled by the terms of the articles of association; but, for the reasons I have given, I cannot concur in this view. I am fortified by the observations of the two learned judges I have quoted in the view that a scheme of distribution which overlooks an important part of the contribution can scarcely be regarded as equitable. It would be impossible, to my mind, to enter upon an inquiry in each individual case how much the liability incurred and the money provided had respectively contributed to the prosperity of the company or the value of its property. Some general rule must be laid down. I quite admit that it may be urged with force that if the distribution is to follow not the paid-up, but the subscribed capital, the liability would always be treated as of as much value as actual money. But if there must be a general rule, and I have to choose between so regarding it or treating it as valueless, I believe the former would, on the whole, be the more equitable course. I, of course, exclude such a case as that of the Scinde Railway, where the constitution of the company determined the amount of purchase-money to be given for the undertaking, and, by the mode in which it was to be ascertained, indicated what was the equitable mode of distributing it. In making these observations with reference to the unpaid liability upon shares, I do not desire to be understood as indicating that they are decisive of the question how surplus assets are to be divided, but only as explaining why I cannot feel satisfied that the principle which has been adopted in the court below is the correct one. Let me put an illustration which occurred to me whilst the appeal was under argument. Take the case of a company whose entire paid-up capital was obtained by the issue of preference shares bearing a limited rate of interest, nothing being paid upon the ordinary shares. The prosperity of such a company might be very largely due to the liability of the ordinary shareholders, which might be just as valuable to the company as if they had paid a large sum on their shares, yet in such a case, if the undertaking were sold, the whole of the surplus, after discharging the liabilities of the company and returning their capital to the preference shareholders, would, on the principle adopted by the court below, have been the property of such shareholders, and it must have been declared that the ordinary shareholders had no title to it, or to share in its distribution; that, though members, they had no "rights or interests" in the company. I admit that the case I have put is an extreme, though it is not an impossible, one; but I think it may well be put to test the equity of the principle laid down. It may be said that in the case I have put the profits could not be payable according to the amount paid up on the shares, and that in that case some other principle must be applied and the amount subscribed, or some other test must be taken. But if this be so the principle on which assets were to be distributed would be altered—it may be in a manner most detrimental to the ordinary shareholders—as soon as any call, however small, was made on the shares.

I turn now to the considerations which have led me to the conclusion that the surplus ought to be divided amongst the shareholders according to the shares which they hold in the company.

The present company has been prosperous, and the result of the winding up is to leave a considerable surplus of assets over liabilities after returning all the capital. But I think we are naturally led to inquire how the different classes of shareholders would have been dealt with if the reverse had been the case, and a loss had resulted. This has been the subject of decision. It has been held, and I think rightly, that in such a case, where there is no provision to the contrary in the articles of the company, the loss is not to be borne in the proportion in which it has been declared in the present case that the surplus is to be distributed. In the case of the Anglesey Colliery Co., 14 W. R. 708, L. R. 2 Eq. 379, it was held by Lord Hatherley when Vice-Chancellor, and his judgment was affirmed on appeal—14 W. R. 1004, L. R. 1 Ch. 555—that the liquidators were entitled to make a call for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the members so that the losses should fall equally on all, without regard to the amount which they had paid up on their shares. And in the case of Ex parte Maude, where some of the shareholders had paid £20 and others £25 a share, and a surplus was left after discharging the liabilities of the company, the liquidators were held to be bound to pay out of these assets £5 to each shareholder who had paid £25, before distributing the surplus rateably. One of the articles of that company provided that the directors might declare a dividend to be paid to the shareholders in proportion to the number of their respective shares "and the amount paid up thereon respectively," and this was relied on as showing that the loss ought to be proportioned to the amount paid up. Mellish, L.J., however, said:—"In my opinion we cannot draw any inference from article 114 beyond that which it states, and we cannot infer that the shareholders meant to make such an important alteration as that, in the case of the company being wound up, the losses should be divided in proportion to the amount paid up, and not to the amount subscribed." And he held that the true view of the Companies Act was that the losses were to be borne, not in proportion to the amount paid up, but to the subscribed capital. Where the articles are silent on the subject, why should a different rule prevail as regards surplus assets? Where there is no agreement as to either it would seem only natural and equitable that loss should be borne and benefits shared in the same proportion. And in my opinion this is the true principle to apply. In the course of the argument I put the case of a company being wound up, having a large asset of doubtful value, and not capable of immediate realization. In such a case it might be necessary or prudent to call up the unpaid capital in order to discharge the liabilities of the concern, even though it turned out that this asset was more than sufficient to meet them. If the capital were thus called up the surplus would be distributed rateably amongst all the shareholders; whereas, supposing the judgment under appeal to be correct, if the asset had been first realized the distribution amongst the two classes of shareholders would have been very different. The rights and interests of the shareholders in the company would thus be made to depend on the urgency of the creditors or the timidity of the liquidators, a result neither satisfactory nor equitable. I observe that the same consideration occurred to Mellish, L.J., in the case I have just referred to. He said:—"If any other construction were adopted it would make the way in which the losses are borne depend upon the accident whether the assets could be immediately valued, or whether it was necessary to make a call to pay the debts. If the £5 per share had been called up to pay pressing debts it could not be denied that the assets when got in would be divided pro ratâ—that is to say, the losses would be borne by shareholders in proportion to their subscribed capital. Here it happened that the assets were immediately realized, or that the creditors did not press for payment, so that a call was not necessary before the assets were divided; but that accident ought not to alter the way in which the assets are to be divided." Surely all this applies with equal force to the profit resulting on the winding up of the undertaking. The truth is, that each member who has subscribed for a £10 share owns the same share in the company whether it be or be not paid up; and if he is so regarded for the purpose of meeting losses, I cannot see that it is equitable that he should be otherwise dealt with when we are considering to what share of the profit he is entitled. When the whole of the capital has been returned both classes of shareholders are on the same footing, equally members and holding equal shares in the company; and it appears to me that they ought to be treated as equally entitled to its property. It may be that the principle which I recommend your lordships to adopt will not secure absolutely equal or equitable treatment in all cases; but I think that it will in general attain that end more nearly than any other which has been proposed.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and that it should be declared that the balance of the proceeds of sale ought to be divided amongst the holders of all the shares in the Bridgwater Navigation Co. (Limited) in proportion to the shares held by them respectively.

I understood at the close of the argument that it had been agreed that the costs of the appellant and the respondents, taxed as between solicitor and client on the higher scale, should be paid out of the assets of the Bridgwater Navigation Co.

I accordingly move your lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that the declaration I have just read be made; and that it be further declared that the costs of the liquidators and of the appellant and the respondents, both in the court below and in your lordships' House, as between solicitor and client upon the higher scale, may properly be retained and paid by the liquidators out of the assets of the Bridgwater Navigation Co.

Lord Fitzgerald.—My noble and learned friend who has just spoken has, in his exhaustive judgment, not only carefully given all the facts and criticized and disposed of the various contentions, but he has also examined the case in all its bearings, and fully and clearly indicated his reasons for not adopting the decision of the Court of Appeal. I concur in the conclusion at which he has arrived, though I do not find it necessary to say that I accept all his reasons. I am to be followed by a second elaborate speech from Lord Macnaghten, the notes of which I have read, and as he arrives at the same result I need not express my concurrence a second time. Coming between such weighty authorities, I confidently anticipate your lordships' sanction to my being concise.

The Bridgwater Canal Co. (Limited), formed in 1872, had become the proprietors of an extensive and valuable undertaking, which appears, as far as we can judge, to have been worked ably and profitably with an increasing business down to 1880, when the company deemed it expedient to raise £600,000 for the purpose of paying off a mortgage of the like amount, and their financial plan appeared to be as follows:—The company had already called up £250,000 of their subscribed capital; they made a further call of £1 a share, amounting to £100,000, and, in the exercise of the powers which they undoubtedly had, they passed a resolution calling into existence their uncreated capital by the creation of 30,000 further shares of £10 each, to be paid up in full within the two years succeeding. The terms and conditions on which the new shares were to be issued and the new shareholders to be received in respect of those shares as members of the company are fully stated in the letters of allotment:—"Allotment Letter, dated 27th April, 1880.—The Bridgwater Navigation Co. (Limited) 5 per Cent. Preference Shares.—Sir,—I beg to inform you that, at an extraordinary general meeting of the members of the Bridgwater Navigation Co. (Limited), held on the 27th April, 1880, the following resolution was passed:—That the balance of the uncreated capital of the company—namely, £300,000—be now created, and that there be issued 30,000 new shares of £10 each on the following terms and conditions—namely:—(1) The new shares to entitle the holders thereof to a dividend after the rate of 5 per cent. per annum upon the amount for the time being called up thereon, and taking precedence of and priority over all dividends and claims of the holders of the ordinary shares of the company. (2) The calls upon the new shares to be payable as follows:—£1 per share on the 30th of June, 1880. £1 10s. per share on the 31st of December, 1880. £2 10s. per share on the 30th of June, 1881. £2 10s. per share on the 31st of December, 1881. £2 10s. per share on the 30th of June, 1882. (3) Interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum to commence from the date when each call becomes due. (4) Any moneys paid and received with the consent of the directors in advance of calls to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. That, in the first instance, the new shares shall be allotted to the holders of ordinary shares registered in the books of the company at this date as near as may be in the proportion of three new shares for every ten ordinary shares. That any new shares not accepted by the members to whom they are allotted remain at the disposal of the directors, to be issued at such times on such terms and in such manner as they may think fit for the benefit of the company. An allotment of your proportion of the new shares is annexed hereto."

The subsequent practice of the company seems to have been to pay out of profits to the preference shareholders the preference dividend of £5 per cent. and the nett residue of the annual profits, after deducting all outgoings and providing for a reserve, was distributed equally amongst the holders of the original £10 shares on which £3 10s. only had been paid up.

The next step was the statute sale of the whole undertaking to the Manchester Ship Canal Co.

It seems to have been a successful stroke of business for the Bridgwater Co., and probably was not a losing one to the Manchester Co., as they got a property necessary for the purposes of their great undertaking, and got it as a going and profitable concern, with fair prospects of increasing annual profits. The Bridgewater Co. as a working company having thus come to an end, a voluntary winding up was resorted to. The liquidators paid off every liability, and they further paid to the preference shareholders their whole capital with interest at 5 per cent. and to the ordinary shareholders their capital with their share of profits. The Bridgwater Co. thus became clear of every liability, and the liquidators found that there remained the clear surplus of £550,000 to be distributed amongst those who had been the shareholders, whether ordinary or preference. The question is on what principle is that surplus to be divided?

The case came first before North, J., and the Court of Appeal adopted his decision North, J., says:—"I find, therefore, that the parties have not entered into any contract as to the mode of division of this surplus, and that it is to be divided on equitable principles. There is little direct authority to assist me in the matter." I quite concur so far with the learned judge. He adds: "But the question I have to decide is not what is a reasonable mode, but what is the equitable mode, of distributing the increment in question. In my opinion the recent case before the Court of Appeal of Sheppard v. The Scinde, Punjaub, and Delhi Railway Co. is so like the present as not only to assist me, but to furnish an authority I ought to follow." That case as an authority on the present appeal has been already disposed of by my noble and learned friend. North, J., then quotes a passage from the judgment of Cotton, L.J., in the Scinde case. "I think the general law is, that after providing for the capital at the credit of each partner the surplus assets should be distributed in the proportions in which the capital has been contributed by the partners." There is the principle on which North, J., acted as the equitable mode of distributing the surplus. The Court of Appeal adopted it.

I have felt myself unable to act on this supposed rule as applicable to such an undertaking as the Bridgwater Canal Co. (Limited), and there is no authority for doing so. It may fit an ordinary common law partnership, but, when applied to an association such as is now before us, it works out inequality and injustice, and not equity. The error seems to me in supposing that there is an exact analogy between an ordinary commercial partnership and a statutable undertaking called into existence under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts and regulated by the statute and its own memorandum of association and articles. There may be likeness in some particulars, but there is no real analogy.

Then, what rule is to guide this distribution? There is, in my opinion, no contract to guide us in the circumstances which have arisen, and there is nothing to be found in the memorandum of association, or in the articles, or in the statutes, to give us any real help. The resolutions calling into existence the preference shares are equally a blank on the subject, but I have no doubt that the able men who then directed the affairs of the company, if they had foreseen the probability of a surplus or winding up, would have been the last to agree to give up the lion's share to the preference shareholders.

Then on what rule or principle are we to proceed? I concur in what my noble and learned friend has adopted as the equitable principle to be acted on. There is a clear stage to act on. The shareholders have been all reduced to one common level. Each shareholder of a share represents a former share in the company, and we have some authority that between the several classes of shareholders each represents £10 in the subscribed capital of the company, and that for the present purpose and in this particular case it matters not whether the £10 had been actually paid up in full or subscribed for and partially paid.

We have some authority for this in the Oakbank Co. v. Crum, which, though not an authority in point, at least imports that the proper interpretation of "share" is the shareholder's proportion in the subscribed capital of the company which appears in his name on the register of shareholders.

I am clearly of opinion that the only equitable principle to be acted on in this case is that of equality. That is an equitable principle, and in giving effect to that rule each and every shareholder should receive in respect of his share an equal proportion of this surplus.

Lord Macnaghten.—The question involved in this appeal appears to be novel. No direct authority on the point was cited. Nor am I aware of any, except a decision of Stirling, J., In re London and Brighton

Stock Exchange (Limited), 12th of August, 1887, which is only to be found in the Times reports (4 Times L. R. 2). The case of The Scinde Railway Co., which was treated as an authority in the courts below, has since been reviewed in this House, and in affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal every one of the noble and learned Lords who addressed the House relied simply and solely on the special circumstances of the case.

The question before your lordships is this:—In the liquidation of a company limited by shares, what is the proper mode of distributing assets not required for payment of debts and liabilities, or for the costs of the winding up, or for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, so far, at any rate, as such rights have hitherto been understood and recognized? As incidental to that question your lordships have to consider whether the mode of distribution can be in any way affected by one or more of the following circumstances: (1) That the shares of the company were paid up unequally, some being fully paid up, others being paid up only in part. (2) That the fully paid-up shares were issued separately as preference shares, carrying a preferential dividend of five per cent. without any further right to participate in the profits of the business. (3) That by the regulations of the company dividends on the company's shares were payable in proportion to the amounts paid up thereon.

The answer, as it seems to me, must depend on the principles applicable to companies limited by shares, and on the provisions contained in the Companies Act, 1862. It is, perhaps, rather beside the mark to discuss the general doctrines of partnership, and to examine particular cases of partnership contracts. The scheme of the Act and the directions to be found there are, I think, a safer guide than any analogies can be.

Every person who becomes a member of a company limited by shares of equal amount becomes entitled to a proportionate part in the capital of the company, and, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, entitled, as a necessary consequence, to the same proportionate part in all the property of the company, including its uncalled capital. He is liable in respect of all moneys unpaid on his shares to pay up every call that is duly made upon him. But he does not by such payment acquire any further or other interest in the capital of the company. His share in the capital is just what it was before. His liability to the company is diminished by the amount paid. His contribution is merged in the common fund. And that is all.

When the company is wound up, new rights and liabilities arise. The power of the directors to make calls is at an end; but every present member, so far as his shares are unpaid, is liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for the payment of its debts and liabilities, the costs of winding up, and such sums as may be required for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves.

In the case of compulsory winding up the Act says, in section 109, that "the court shall adjust the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, and distribute any surplus that remains amongst the parties entitled thereto."

In the case of voluntary winding up the language is not quite the same, and the directions are rather more explicit; not that there can be any difference as to the proper mode of distributing assets in the two cases; no one has suggested that. A sufficient reason for the difference of language is, I think, to be found in the circumstance that while the privilege of voluntary liquidation is confined to companies under the Act, any partnership or association consisting of more than seven members may be wound up compulsorily. To meet every case of compulsory liquidation it was necessary to use the most general language. Besides, it is obvious that specific directions useful and proper for the guidance of voluntary liquidation are not so requisite when the liquidation is under the court. As Lord Cairns points out in Webb v. Whiffen, L. R. 5 H. L. 711, "it was naturally thought important in the case of voluntary windings up to make specific provisions and to give specific directions as to matters which were supposed to be so plain and so necessarily consequential upon the general scheme of the Act that in a winding up under an order of the court it was not thought necessary to give express directions upon these matters of detail." I cannot, therefore, agree with Cotton, L.J., that sections 109 and 133 are to be read together, with the result that the more general language of section 109 is to neutralize or obscure the primâ facie meaning of the more specific directions given in the case of a voluntary winding up.

The consequences that are to ensue upon the voluntary winding up of the company are to be found in section 133. It is there provided:—"The property of the company shall be applied in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu, and, subject thereto, shall, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, be distributed amongst the members according to their rights and interests in the company." Then the section goes into details as to the powers of the liquidators, and ends by saying that "the liquidators shall pay the debts of the company and adjust the rights of the contributories amongst themselves."

Now, in the case of members of a company limited by shares, what are "their rights and interests in the company" in the absence of any special regulation, and what are the rights of the contributories amongst themselves which have to be adjusted in the winding up?

Amongst the rights to be adjusted the most important are those which arise when there is a difference between shareholders in the amount of calls paid in respect of their shares. Before winding up no such rights exist; whatever has been paid by the shareholders of one issue in excess of the contributions of their fellow shareholders of a different issue must have been paid in pursuance of calls duly made, or in accordance with the conditions under which the shares were held. While the company is a going concern no capital can be returned to the shareholders, except under the statutory provisions in that behalf. There is therefore, during that period no ground for complaint, no room for equities arising out of unequal contributions. In the case of winding up everything is changed The assets have to be distributed. The rights arising from unequal contributions on shares of equal amounts must be adjusted, and the property of the company, including its uncalled capital not required to satisfy prior claims, must be applied for that purpose. But when those rights are adjusted, when the capital is equalized, what equity founded on inequality of contribution can possibly remain? The rights and interests of the contributories in the company must, then, be simply in proportion to their shares. This was the view of Stirling, J., in the case I have referred to. Your lordships, however, were reminded more than once that "the Act does not say so." You were told that if that had been the meaning of the Legislature nothing would have been more easy than to have said so in so many words. It is easy, no doubt, to make a slip. But I should have been rather surprised if the framers of this Act, which is a model of careful and accurate drafting, had forgotten that the provisions for voluntary liquidation apply to some companies which have not a capital divided into shares.

The ordinary shareholders say that the preference shareholders are entitled to a return of their capital, with five per cent. interest up to the day of payment, and to nothing more. That is treating them as if they were debenture-holders, liable to be paid off at a moment's notice. Then they say that at the utmost the preference shareholders are only entitled to the capital value of a perpetual annuity of five per cent. upon the amounts paid up by them. That is treating them as if they were holders of irredeemable debentures. But they are not debenture-holders at all. For some reason or other the company invited them to come in as shareholders, and they must be treated as having all the rights of shareholders, except so far as they renounced those rights on their admission to the company. There was an express bargain made as to their rights in respect of profits arising from the business of the company. But there was no bargain—no provision of any sort—affecting their rights as shareholders in the capital of the company.

Then the preference shareholders say to the ordinary shareholders:—"We have paid up the whole of the amount due on our shares; you have paid but a fraction on yours. The prosperity of a company results from its paid-up capital; distribution must be in proportion to contribution. The surplus assets must be divided in proportion to the amounts paid up on the shares." That seems to me to be ignoring altogether the elementary principles applicable to joint-stock companies of this description. I think it rather leads to confusion to speak of the assets which are the subject of this application as "surplus assets," as if they were an accretion or addition to the capital of the company capable of being distinguished from it and open to different considerations. They are part and parcel of the property of the company; part and parcel of the joint-stock or common fund which at the date of the winding up represented the capital of the company. It is through their shares in the capital, and through their shares alone, that members of a company limited by shares become entitled to participate in the property of the company. The shares in this company were all of the same amount. Every contributory who held a preference share at the date of the winding up must have taken that share and must have held it on the terms of paying up all calls duly made upon him in respect thereof. In paying up his share in full he has done no more than he contracted to do; why should he have more than he bargained for? Every contributory who was the holder of an ordinary share at the date of the winding up took his share and held it on similar terms. He has done all he contracted to do; why should he have less than his bargain? When the preference shareholders and the ordinary shareholders are once placed on exactly the same footing in regard to the amounts paid up upon their shares, what is there to alter rights which were the subject of express contract?

Observe how unreasonable this contention on the part of the preference shareholders is. They do not propose to unravel the accounts of the company or to inquire how long the company had the benefit of the contributions from each of the two classes of shareholders, or what was the position of the company when those contributions were made. It may be that the founders of the company made a lucky hit at the outset. Good management may have had something to do with the success of the company. And, after all, something may perhaps be put down to the fact that the Ship Canal Co. was forced to buy a property which lay directly in the track of its undertaking. The preference shareholders discard all these considerations. They take the date of the winding up as the date which governs the rights of the shareholders in the distribution of what they call surplus assets. They say:—"Our payments, then, were in excess of the payments of the ordinary shareholders." But that is a mere accident. There was a time, not very long ago, when the contributions of the ordinary shareholders were in advance of those of the preference shareholders. If the company had gone on they might soon have been on a level again. The prosperity of the company was not due to the contributions of the preference shareholders. They did not come on the scene till just before the last act. It so happens that the very same directors' report which records their final payment calls attention to the Ship Canal as a practical project. When the preference shareholders were invited to come in the prosperity of the company was assured. The business was flourishing; the shareholders were receiving dividends of eight per cent., with occasional bonuses; and the directors were in a position to borrow at four per cent. Instead of borrowing the company resolved to issue these preference shares, on the condition that they should be fully paid up within a limited time. As the company chose to admit Mr. Rigby's clients as shareholders they must have the rights of shareholders; but I cannot see why they should claim more.

Then it was said on behalf of the preference shareholders that the provision for payment of dividends in proportion to the amounts paid up on the shares leads to an inference that the distribution of surplus assets was to be made in the same proportion. I do not think that it leads to any inference of the kind. It is a very common provision nowadays, though it is not what you find in table A. And it is a very reasonable provision, because, during the continuance of the company, and while it is a going concern, it prevents any sense of dissatisfaction on the part of those who have paid more on their shares than their fellow shareholders of a different issue. But when it has come to an end I cannot see how it can be used to regulate or disturb rights with which it had nothing to do even while it was in force.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be varied, and that it should be declared that, subject to the payment of the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding up, including the costs of all parties in this application here and in the courts below, the assets of the company remaining undistributed, other than the reserve fund, which is not the subject of this application, ought to be distributed among all the shareholders in proportion to their shares.

Order appealed from reversed, and order of North, J., varied by declaring that "the balance of the proceeds of sale of the said undertakings to the Manchester Ship Canal Co. remaining after satisfaction of all the debts and liabilities of the Bridgwater Navigation Co. (Limited), and after adjusting the rights of the shareholders inter se (other than their rights in respect of the purchase-money) and after payment of the costs of the liquidation and repayment to the shareholders (both ordinary and preference) of the capital respectively paid on their shares ought to be divided amongst the holders of all the shares of the Bridgwater Navigation Co. (Limited), in proportion to the shares held by them respectively"; subject to this variation the order of North, J., affirmed; ordered that the costs of the liquidators and of the appellant and respondent Schofield in this House and in the court below, as between solicitor and client upon the higher scale, may properly be retained and paid by the liquidators out of the Bridgwater Navigation Co. (Limited); cause remitted to the Chancery Division.

REG. v. COWPER. (a.)

County court—Costs—Particulars to be signed by solicitor — Lithographed form — County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 6, r. 10, Appendix.

Under ord. 6, r. 10, of the County Court Rules, 1889, read with the Appendix, in order to entitle a plaintiff to the costs of entering a plaint by a solicitor, the solicitor must sign the particulars, and it is not sufficient for him to enter them on a form which bears his lithographed name.

So held by Fry, L.J. (Lord Esher, M.R., dissenting), affirming the decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 207, 24 Q. B. D. 60).

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.), reported ante, p. 207, 24 Q. B. D. 60.

Upon the issue of a summons in the Croydon County Court in an action of Rees v. Tassell a lithographed form of copy of particulars was indorsed, "Claim, £2 16s. 5d.; court fees, 4s; solicitor's costs, 4s."; and the name and address of the firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiff were lithographed below the indorsement. The defendant paid the sum of £3 0s. 5d. into court. At the hearing the registrar ruled that the plaintiff's solicitors were not entitled to an order for payment of the 4s. claimed as solicitor's costs, on the ground that they had not complied with the rules by signing the particulars. The deputy-judge having upheld this decision, a rule was obtained against him by the plaintiff to show cause why he should not hear and determine the matter. The Divisional Court discharged the rule.

By the County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 6, r. 10, "the solicitor of a plaintiff suing by a solicitor shall indorse on the particulars his name or firm and place of business, and shall state thereon where he will accept service of proceedings in the action or matter on behalf of the plaintiff, otherwise the costs of entering the plaint by the solicitor shall not be allowed."

In the appendix to the rules there is the following provision as to costs on the lower scale; No. 1, "Where the particulars and copies are signed by a solicitor, and the amount claimed exceeds £2 and does not exceed £5, there may be entered upon an ordinary summons and upon a default summons, 4s."

And in the note to the appendix:—"No other costs are to be allowed than the above where the amount claimed does not exceed £10 unless the judge certifies otherwise."

The arguments used and cases cited were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it is proper to consider what the intention and reason of the rule in question were, and what circumstances it was passed to meet. Does the rule insist on actual handwriting for the "signature," or will a lithographed signature suffice? The object of the rule no doubt was to have the name of a solicitor, or firm of solicitors, appended to the particulars in order that if any wrong was done the court might have an officer of the court over whom it had a peculiar jurisdiction whom it could hold responsible. That seems to me to be the only object of the rule. That being so, does this lithographed form carry out or interfere with that object? It has been urged that the lithographed form may be misused by a clerk of the solicitor's stealing it and filling it up for his own purposes. I cannot think such an occurrence probable, but if he did do so he would be liable to be punished for robbery and forgery. Then it is suggested that some bill collector who was not an attorney at all might get hold of the form and use it for the purposes of extortion. But even supposing that he did get hold of such a form, he could not get the money without coming to the court, and it is most improbable that the registrar would not detect that he was an unauthorized person. In my opinion, if a solicitor authorizes the filling up of such a lithographed form as this, and allows it to issue, he cannot deny his responsibility for what it contains, and the object of the rule is satisfied. The solicitor intended the lithographed name to represent his signature, and he has issued it as a signed statement of particulars. I cannot see why we should require anything more. Except the signing of a will, there is no case where the actual handwriting is necessary, and where such a lithographed signature as this would not be sufficient. It would certainly be sufficient under the Statute of Frauds, and it would be a good signature to a bill of exchange. Then it is argued that it is not a signature, because it was on the form before it was filled up. If that argument is good, it would be equally forcible where the form had been actually signed before it was filled up. I know of no rule that would go that length. For these reasons I am unable to see why we should put anything more than the ordinary business meaning on the word "signed." To do so would, in my opinion, be pressing the language of the rule unduly. I therefore think that this form of particulars satisfies the requirements of the rules.

FRY, L.J.—I have the misfortune to differ from the Master of the Rolls. I think that the decision of the Divisional Court was correct. We have to deal with matters of form, which are regulated by ord. 6, r. 10, of the County Court Rules, 1889, and by the appendix to those rules. The rule provides that the solicitor shall indorse on the particulars his name and address, and the appendix provides that where the particulars are signed by a solicitor he shall be entitled to certain fees. In the present case there is a lithographed form, which contains at the end the lithographed name of the solicitors and their place of address. It is impossible, to my mind, not to see that this was intended to comply with the rule requiring indorsement, and was not intended as a signature at all. We have no information as to the person who filled up the form, and we are asked to say that the lithographed name at the end is a signature within the requirements of the appendix. In my judgment it is not. I think that it was intended that there should be an actual signature of the particulars by the solicitor. The object of the rules was to make the solicitor pledge himself to the accuracy of the particulars. The court has a right, I think, to require its officers to intervene to that extent. It is obvious that in many cases, as in the present, the particulars will be acted upon on an undefended summons when there is no evidence before the court. The registrar will then have to rely on the signature of the solicitor as a guarantee of the accuracy of the particulars. A mere lithographed name, which is part of the form, does not furnish any such guarantee. There is nothing to show that the particulars have come under the personal cognizance of the solicitor, or of anyone directly authorized by him to act on his behalf. In my opinion it would be defeating the object of the rule to hold otherwise, especially since, as I have said before, in my opinion, it was not intended to be a signature at all. The name is there alio intuitu—to satisfy the rule as to indorsement. No doubt the objection is a formal one, but the rules were passed to regulate matters of form, and I do not think that it would be right to neglect them. I agree, therefore, with the decision of the Divisional Court, and in my opinion this appeal fails.

In re DALE AND PLANT (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Proof—Salary of managing director—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 38, sub-section 7—Debt due to member of company in his character of a member.

A company was formed for the purpose of buying and carrying on a business formerly carried on by the vendor, and it was agreed that the vendor should, for a period of ten years, act as the managing director of the company. The articles of association provided that the vendor should receive a fixed annual salary as the managing director, and that every director should be the holder of a certain number of shares. The company having gone into liquidation before the ten years expired, the vendor claimed in the winding up as a creditor for a sum due to him for arrears of salary as managing director, and for a sum assessed as damages for breach of the contract to employ him as such for ten years.

Held, that these sums were not due to the claimant "in his character of a member, by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise," within the meaning of section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, and therefore that he was entitled to prove for them in the winding up, in competition with the other creditors.

Adjourned summons.

This company was formed for the purpose of taking over and carrying on the business of dryesalters, &c., formerly carried on by James Dales and Samuel Allen Plant, and it was agreed that Dales and Plant were, for the term of ten years from the 31st of March, 1886, to remain as managing directors of the company.

The articles of association provided that Dales and Plant were to be the first managing directors upon the terms contained in the agreement; that the qualification of every director was to be the holding in his own right of not less than ten shares; that the directors were to be paid for their services out of the funds of the company the remuneration following—viz., Dales and Plant each £300 per annum, and each of the other directors such sum as the company in general meeting should from time to time determine; that every director was to vacate his office if he ceased to be a holder of at least ten shares; that Dales and Plant were to be styled managing directors and to remain on the board so long as they continued in the employment of the company under the agreement or any extension thereof, and the determination of the agreement, or any extension thereof, was not to invalidate their appointment as directors.

Before the expiration of the ten years, an order was made for the winding up of the company, and in the winding up, Plant claimed to rank as a creditor for (inter alia) a sum of £118 13s. 4d. arrears of salary as managing director; and for damages for breach of the agreement to employ him as managing director for ten years at a salary of £300 a year, and which damages the chief clerk had found to be £1,500.

By section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, "No sum due to any member of a company in his character of a member by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise shall be deemed to be a debt of the company payable to such member in a case of competition between himself and any other creditor not being a member of the company."

Chadwyck Healey, in support of the summons.—Section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, does not apply here. It was held in In re Leicester Club and County Racecourse Co., Ex parte Cannon, 34 W. R. 14, 30 Ch. D. 629, that a director's unpaid fees were debts due to him in his character of member, and to be postponed to outside creditors, but that case was based on Dunston v. Imperial Gas Light and Coke Co., 3 B. & Ad. 125, which was a very peculiar case, and a ground of the decision was that the payments were in the nature of gratuities. Section 38, sub-section 7, could not have been intended to prevent a person who entered into an ordinary contract to do work for, or supply goods to, a company, from proving in competition with other creditors merely because he happened to have taken shares in the company. In this case the salary was remuneration for skilled work done for the company by the present claimant. The words of the sub-section "dividends, profits, or otherwise" evidently point to a claim by a shareholder for sums due in respect of his shares by way of dividend, bonus, or the like. It is true that in this case the managing director must necessarily be a shareholder, but he might have remuneration as a director, which would fall within the sub-section, and at the same time under a special contract be entitled to special remuneration for extraordinary work, as to which he would be in the position of an ordinary creditor of the company.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Levett, for the liquidator.—This claim clearly falls within the principle of the decision in the Leicester Club case. The claimant was entitled to this remuneration only in his character of a member. The articles require that the managing director shall be a director and shareholder, and he is liable to vacate his office if he ceases to be a shareholder. The case falls within the words "or otherwise." Those words do not qualify the word "member," but the words "sum due." If it is of the essence of the contract that there should be membership on the part of the person contracting with the company, money due to him under the contract is due to him in his character of member.

KAY, J.—I do not agree with the argument which has been addressed to me on behalf of the liquidator. This is a very simple point, and, to my mind, a very clear one. Here is a man appointed managing director. He was so appointed, as appears clearly enough, because he had special knowledge of the business which this company was going to carry on; and by the articles of association he was to receive certain remuneration for the management of the business of the company. Now it is quite true that a director was the only person who could be so appointed, and it is true also, or I assume it to be the fact, that no one could be a director who was not a shareholder. It is said that all remuneration agreed to be paid to the claimant for his special skill and attention in managing the business of the company is payable to him in his character of member. I do not agree. Suppose this case was that of a solicitor, a man specially trained in a peculiar business which is of great importance to the community, and that such solicitor happened to be a member of a company, and sent in his bill of costs for business done for the company. In the winding up of the company could it be said that the solicitor should not prove in competition with the other creditors because he was a shareholder? Obviously that proposition could not be maintained for a moment. It was so admitted in the argument. But it is said that if the articles of association provided that no one should be a solicitor to the company unless he was also a shareholder, then the payment made to him would be a payment to him in his character of member. I do not follow that. The payment to him in respect of his bill of costs cannot be payment to him in his character of member, whether the articles of association do or do not contain such a provision. The payment in either case is to him in his character of solicitor, and not in his character of member. Take another case. Suppose a company bought a million bricks from a brickmaker. If he happened to be a shareholder, no one could doubt that that circumstance would not prevent him from proving in competition with the other creditors. But suppose that the articles of association contained provisions that no bricks should be bought of any person who was not a shareholder in the company. Is, then, the money paid as the price of the bricks, money due to the vendor in his character of member? Certainly not. It is money due to him in his character of brickmaker or brick seller, and the fact that one of the articles provided that the company should not buy of anyone not a member would not make the price of the bricks money due to him in his character of member any more than it would be if there were no such article.

Then, it is said, and this, to my mind, is the strongest part of the argument, that section 38, sub-section 7, of the Companies Act, 1862, is introduced into the Act of Parliament by analogy to the partnership law. A debt due to a partner could not be proved in competition with outside creditors where the partnership was dissolved. That is true. But the answer is that a shareholder is not a partner, and this section does not introduce all the partnership law with respect to every shareholder. It only introduces—I daresay it may be by analogy to the law of partnership—the particular provision which has now to be construed. That provision is this—(his lordship read the material part): What does "character of member" mean? The words that follow seem to me to show that clearly. The words are "by way of dividends"—that is, on his shares—"profits"—that, again, is in respect of his shares—"or otherwise"—the words "or otherwise" must mean something analogous to dividends or profits on his shares. That shows the meaning. Dividends are due to him in his character of member; profits are due to him in his character of member; there may be something else equally due to him in his character of member which this clause was intended to include. To my mind it is clear that the clause does not include money due for goods which a member has supplied to the company, otherwise it would be so expressed. Nor can it include payment for particular work which he has special skill in doing, and which he has done for the company. I am of opinion that this money, which ought to have been paid to this claimant solely as managing director, is money for which he may prove in competition with other creditors. The only case cited is that of In re Leicester Club and County Racecourse Co., where a director claimed for fees, and the articles of association provided that "the remuneration of the directors for their services shall be such sum as the company in general meeting may from time to time determine, which shall be divided amongst the directors in such manner as they shall from time to time think fit." It was held in that case that the remuneration came within the words "money due to him in his character of member." I say nothing about that case except that it is not the case now before me, and it seems to me very plain that this is not money due to the claimant in his character of a member of this company, and that he is entitled to prove for it in the winding up in competition with the other creditors.

FARRAR v. COOPER. (a.)

Practice—Arbitration—Injunction to restrain proceeding with arbitration—Particulars of differences—Futile result—Jurisdiction—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 8—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 12.

Partnership articles provided that, in case any dispute should arise between the three partners relating to the partnership, they should forthwith each nominate a referee, and that the referees should determine all matters in dispute, or, in default of agreement, appoint an umpire. Questions arose, and two of the partners appointed referees to "settle and determine all questions, disputes, differences, and matters that may be in dispute or difference" between the partners. The third partner objected that there was no point in dispute within the clause. He asked for information as to the alleged differences, and was told that particulars would be furnished at the proper time. He now moved to restrain his partners from proceeding with the arbitration finally, or until they had specified what disputes they wished to refer, or that he might be at liberty to revoke the submission to arbitration.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to grant the injunction, but that an arbitration without particulars and without the consent of the plaintiff would be merely futile; and that that was no ground for restraining the proceedings.

Motion.

This was an application by a partner to restrain the other members of the firm from proceeding with an arbitration, on the ground that they had not told the plaintiff what points they wished to refer, and that he would be seriously prejudiced by the proceedings.

The partnership articles were dated the 30th of June, 1880, and made between William Cooper, of the first part, Benjamin Farrar, of the second part, and Henry Cooper, of the third part. The 26th clause was as follows:—"That in all cases of dispute on the method of business adopted by the said partners, or one of them, or as to any question in relation to the said partnership, the decision and instructions of the majority or two members of the said partnership shall be final and effective, and be binding on the partner not assenting to or concurring in the said decision and instructions." The 27th provided:—"That in case any dispute shall arise between the said partners, their executors or administrators, either during the continuance of the said partnership or after the determination thereof, either on the construction of these presents or the settlement of the books and accounts thereof, or the settling, dividing, or applying the profits and losses of the said partnership, or any other matter, cause, or thing relating to the same, then and in such case the said partners, their executors or administrators, shall forthwith nominate three disinterested persons, one of whom to be chosen by each of the said partners, which said three persons shall determine all such matters aforesaid by their award in writing under their hands, and in case such referees cannot agree upon an award within thirty days next after such reference, then the same shall be referred to and be determined by such one other disinterested person as the said referees shall for that purpose appoint as umpire between them, who shall determine the same by writing under his hand within ten days after he shall be so appointed umpire, and the said partners, their executors, administrators, or assigns, shall and will abide by and perform the award which shall be made by the said referees or their said umpire without further suit or trouble whatsoever." By the 28th clause it was further agreed:—"That this submission to reference shall be made a rule of the Chancery Division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice upon the application of either of the said parties hereto, and every award thereunder shall also be made such rule, and be prosecuted as a judgment of the said court," and that no action should be commenced by one partner against another until he should have neglected or refused to appoint a referee, or the time limited for making an award should have expired.

Questions arose between the parties which the Coopers desired to refer to arbitration. Farrar, on the other hand, insisted that all disputes could be settled under the 26th clause.

On the 20th of February, 1890, W. Cooper and H. Cooper, by separate instruments in similar form, appointed two arbitrators "to settle and determine all questions, disputes, differences, and matters that may be in dispute or difference between myself and my copartners, or either of them, and falling within the provisions of the said in part recited" articles of partnership.

Notice of the appointment was given to the other partners, stating the appointment "for the purpose of awarding, ordering, and determining all disputes, differences, doubts, or questions which have arisen between me and you . . . or either of you, concerning the construction of the said indenture of the 30th day of June, 1887, or the settlement of the books and accounts of the said partnership, or the settling, dividing, or applying the profits and losses of the partnership, or any other matter, cause, or thing relating to the same, and for all other purposes, if any, for which I am entitled to nominate an arbitrator in connection with the said partnership." The notice further called upon the other partners to appoint their arbitrators. Farrar's solicitors asked what were the points it was wished to arbitrate upon, and were told that when the proper time arrived particulars would be furnished. He thereupon issued a writ, and now moved "that the defendants may be restrained . . . from proceeding with the arbitration of which they have given notice to the plaintiff finally, or until they have specified to the plaintiff what disputes and differences have arisen which they desire to have settled by arbitration, or that the plaintiff may be at liberty to revoke the submission to arbitration contained in the deed of partnership."

Marten, Q.C., and Jason Smith, for the motion.

Renshaw, Q.C., and R. M. Bray, for the defendants.—The court will not assume that the arbitrators will act improperly, nor stay proceedings, unless it sees that injustice will be done. There is no jurisdiction to interfere: North London Railway Co. v. Great Northern Railway Co., 31 W. R. 490, 11 Q. B. D. 30.

Marten, Q.C., in reply.—That case applies only to proceedings under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act: London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Cross, 34 W. R. 201, 31 Ch. D. 354. The court has jurisdiction to stay proceedings in the arbitration: Maunsell v. Midland, Great Western, &c., Co., 11 W. R. 768, 1 H. & M. 130; Piercy v. Young, 28 W. R. 845, 14 Ch. D. 200; Mylne v. Dickenson, Geo. Cooper, 195; Beddow v. Beddow, 26 W. R. 570, 9 Ch. D. 89; Hedley v. Bates, 28 W. R. 365, 13 Ch. D. 498; Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 12; Russell on Arbitrations, 5th ed., p. 459.

Kekewich, J.—There is no desire on my part to interfere with the domestic tribunal of arbitration in partnership cases. Many judges have expressed their entire approval of that course, and business men often prefer to refer disputes to arbitration, and especially cases which cannot be conveniently decided in court. Therefore, nothing that I say must be considered as a wish on my part to interfere with arbitrations, but it seems to me that the first principle of arbitration is that, having secured a competent man intending to do his duty honestly, you must lay before him the points to be decided, and unless these points are laid before him by all the parties it is impossible for him to give a decision. In the present state of affairs I am reluctant to indicate any opinion upon the construction of the articles, but clauses 26 and 27 are wholly different in language and in intention. Whether there are any disputes within the 26th clause is not now in question, although the affidavits show that some of the parties think there are. The words of clause 27 are not quite in common form, and may require close consideration, but that will be for determination hereafter. The defendants have not condescended to tell the plaintiff what they require to refer to arbitration. In a curt letter of the 25th of February they say: "You appoint an arbitrator and then we will tell you what we are going to refer." The plaintiff says he wants to know what is to be referred before making the appointment. His selection of a referee will depend on the subject-matter to be referred. If it is a question of construction he may desire to appoint a lawyer, if it is a question of book-keeping and accounts he may prefer an accountant. The conduct of the defendants puts him in an extremely unfair position. The only result of an arbitration without settling the particulars beforehand will be to get an award which cannot be enforced or have any practical effect. The question how the costs are to be borne may give rise to difficulties. Therefore, no arbitration without the consent of the plaintiff can be binding on him or be of any legal, practical value. But does it follow that I must restrain these proceedings of the defendants?

I entirely adopt what was said by Lindley, L.J., in London and Blackwall Railway Co. v. Cross, referring to North London Railway Co. v. Great Northern Railway Co. He says:—"The case does not decide that in no case is it right to restain persons from proceeding to arbitration; there are cases in which it is quite right to do so." Mr. Marten has cited other cases to the same effect. Lindley, L.J., does not say, and I do not say, in what cases it is right to restrain them. I do not think there would be anything to prevent my restraining the defendants in a case where I saw that injustice would result from the arbitration; but where I do not see that, but only, as in this case, that futile proceedings are likely to result, I do not think it necessary to grant an injunction. I remember a case before the late Master of the Rolls in which I was for the plaintiff. An application was made to restrain directors from passing certain resolutions with reference to preference shares, and it was stated that the resolutions, if passed, would be useless. The Master of the Rolls asked why he should interfere; they could pass any resolutions they thought fit. Those resolutions, if the plaintiff was right, would not bind him; they would be mere waste paper. He had no right to interfere, and he refused the injunction on that ground.

In my opinion I ought to refuse to interfere in this case on the same ground. I do not think that these proceedings would have any binding authority or could be enforced against the plaintiff, they would be futile, and, that being so, I simply make no order on the motion. The plaintiff has been provoked into coming here, and the costs will be costs in the action.

CRAWFORD v. ROYAL INFIRMARY. (a.)

Executor—Renunciation of probate by one executor—Power of selection of beneficiaries.

A testator by his will appointed three persons his executors, and gave the residue of his estate to certain charitable institutions named in his will, or such others "as my executors herein named" might appoint. One of the executors renounced probate.

Held, that the renunciation of the office of executor did not operate to prevent him claiming the right of joining with the continuing executors in selecting the charitable institutions to share in the residue.

Keates v. Burton, 14 Ves. 434, not followed.

Further consideration.

J. K. Mainwaring, by his will, dated October 12, 1877, after bequeathing certain legacies, gave "to my executors herein named the sum of fifty pounds each, for the trouble they may have in the execution of this my will, and also to mark my friendship and regard for them." The will then proceeded:—"I hereby appoint J. D. Crawford, J. Forshaw, and William Jones executors of this my will," and after giving various charitable legacies, the will contained the following gift:—"The residue of my estate I leave and bequeath to the above-named charitable institutions, or such others or additional as my executors herein named may select, to be divided in such proportions as they may approve of."

One of the executors, J. Forshaw, named in the will renounced probate, but claimed, notwithstanding, to take part in the selection of the charitable institutions to share in the testator's residuary estate, and the case was now brought on to decide whether he had a right to do so.

Neville, Q.C., and Crawford, for the plaintiffs, the continuing executors.—The question in whether this is a right of division given to the persons who may happen to be executors, or a right personal to the particular executors named in the will and not attached to the office. This power of distribution is part of the administration of the testator's property, and once the character of executor is put off this power goes with it. The will, in fact, imposes the condition of the existence of a specific character, before the power can be exercised. Keates v. Burton, 14 Ves. 434, is a case in point. There a power of control over a certain interest was given to executors, who renounced, and it was held the interest became accordingly absolute. As one executor has renounced he cannot exercise the power, [KEKEWICH, J.—It is a recognized practice that a person made trustee and executor can renounce the latter office, and yet retain the former character.] But here he would be at once executor and not executor.

Warmington, Q.C., and P. O. Lawrence, for Forshaw.—It has been held in this case that Forshaw is entitled to his legacy, even though he has renounced the executorship; he was named in the will, not merely as an executor, but for other purposes, and he may, if he likes, decline either part of the duties named. Keates v. Burton is not really reported on the point of the executor's renunciation, but on the construction of the will.

Neville, Q.C., in reply.—The claimant in Keates v. Burton was the assignee of Christie, and it had there to be decided whether the power of limiting the interest could be exercised, and it was decided it could not. In this will this power is given to them as executors, and if any one of them divests himself of that character he cannot join in the selection.

KEKEWICH, J.—If I thought Keates v. Burton really decided the question I should follow it, but it does not appear to me to do so. No doubt, in deciding other points, the judge in that case states that the power there given to the executors could not be exercised. But that was merely stated as one of the circumstances which had taken place, and not for the purpose of making it a ratio decidendi. This case must be decided on the words of the will, and the question is, was this power given to the executors as part of their office. The duties of an executor are not easy to define, but directly you have a residue or fund clear of debts and legacies, that immediately becomes a trust fund, and then the executor becomes at once a trustee. It seems to me there is a clear distinction between executor and trustee, and that the exercise of this power cannot be one of the duties of the executor. There is certainly in this will a gift of a legacy to each executor, but I do not think the motive actuating that gift controls the latter clause whereby a power is given of selecting certain beneficiaries. The last direction in the will is in these terms:—[His lordship read the clause.] It is suggested that the correct way to read this will is to read in the names of the executors, and then the mere renunciation of that character by one of them would not affect the right to exercise this power, and that, I think, is the correct view. Mr. Forshaw was one of the executors "herein named," and I think, therefore, he can still exercise this power.

MORGAN v. HUTCHINS. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 1, sub-section (1)—Defect in condition of machinery—Dangerous machine.

The fact of a machine being dangerous to the workman whose duty it is to use it, although it is perfectly effective for the purpose for which it is used, is "a defect in the condition of the machinery" within section 1, sub-section (1), of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, which, when combined with negligence on the part of the employer, entitles the workman to recover damages in an action brought under that sub-section.

Walsh v. Whiteley, 36 W. R. 876, 21 Q. B. D. 371, explained.

Appeal from the Bristol County Court.

The material facts were as follows:—

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff was a boy in the employment of the defendants at their factory. It was his duty to feed a pressing machine with sheets of leather by placing them between rollers which were to press them. Close beside the rollers was an arrangement of cog wheels by which the machine was worked. There was no fencing between these cog wheels and the place where the boy worked. In attempting to straighten a piece of leather which was about to be pressed by the rollers his hand slipped and was caught in the cog wheels, with the result that two of his fingers were taken off. No want of care on the part of the plaintiff was alleged.

The action was brought under section 1, sub-section (1), of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, for personal injuries caused by reason of a defect in the condition of the machinery.

At the trial the Government Inspector of Factories stated that the machine would be very dangerous even to an adult workman owing to the cog wheels not being fenced off; that this could easily have been done; and that, in the year 1885, he had pointed this out to the defendants.

The jury found that the machinery was defective, and awarded damages to the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Radcliffe, for the appellants.—There was no evidence of a defect in the machinery. A defect in machinery is something which prevents it from doing its work: M'Giffin v. Palmer's Shipbuilding Co., 31 W. R. 118, 10 Q. B. D. 5. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., referred to Heske v. Samuelson, 32 W. R. 595, 12 Q. B. D. 30.] Mere danger, however great, does not constitute a defect: Walsh v. Whiteley.

Upjohn, for the respondent.—Walsh v. Whiteley is in my favour. [He was stopped by the court.]

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the county court judge left the right questions to the jury, and that there was abundant evidence for them to come to the conclusion to which they came. It is always a difficult thing where general words like these are used to express in words a definition of what cases come within them and what do not. To define the word "defect" so as to include all possible cases is a thing which I would not attempt. Still, by the lights of common sense and authority, one may decide whether a particular case comes within the words. Personal injury to a workman is actionable if it be caused "by reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer," and to that statement of the law must be added, according to the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Walsh v. Whiteley, that there must be negligence on the part of the employer.

Now in this case the personal injury was caused by the condition of the machinery used in the employer's business—the word "condition," according to the dictionaries, including the surrounding circumstances; that is, the way in which the machinery is to be used; the defect need not be in the machine itself. One of the surrounding circumstances of this machine is that it is to be used by men and even by boys; it must have human skill brought to bear upon it to make it useful. That it was dangerous one cannot doubt, because accidents had happened with it before, and a perfectly disinterested person, the inspector of factories, said so in the strongest manner possible, and had told the employer so, as long ago as 1885, and had urged upon him the necessity of fencing the cog wheels. If danger is a defect it was unquestionably present here, and that owing to the negligence of the employer, for he was well aware of it, and had been warned of it.

The only question remaining is, Is manifest danger to the workman a defect within the meaning of section 1, sub-section (1)? If the Court of Appeal has decided that it is not, of course I am bound to defer to their decision. But I cannot find any such case. There are cases which look that way, but they do not decide that point.

The principle on which the case of Heske v. Samuelson was based seems to me to carry with it the point which we are now deciding, for there the machine was perfectly proper and effective in itself, yet, because it was not made safe for other persons, it was held to be defective by the Court of Appeal. This seems to me to show that in certain cases the fact of the machine being dangerous is itself a defect. Then it was said that Walsh v. Whiteley decided differently, and it is binding upon us. But in that case there is no difference between the Master of the Rolls and the other judges on this point—they all held that danger is a defect, but the majority held that there must also be negligence on the part of the employer. What underlay their decision was that an essential part of the dangerous defect was that it must be traceable to the negligence of the owner. In this case negligence on the part of the owner, which was wanting there, is abundantly present. The governing principle upon which the majority of the court decided that case is different from that on which I am now deciding. I think that here the condition of the machine was defective owing to its dangerous character, of which the defendant was warned over and over again.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This section does not apply unless personal injury has been caused to the workman: where that is so the Act protects him beyond what the common law did. Under the common law he was considered to run the risk, and he could only recover if the defect were known to his master and not to himself. That rule was intended to be modified by this section. [His lordship then read sub-section (1) of section 1, and continued:—] This is a section intended to protect the workman, and yet the argument for the employer is that, although the machine was defective with regard to the safety of the workman and actually caused him injury, it is not a defect in the condition of the machinery within this section. It was even argued that if a secret defect existed in machinery which caused danger but did not interfere with the working of the machine, that was not a defect. The strange result of such a doctrine might be that this section would protect workmen who were not using the machine and not those who were using it. This machine has to be fed by a workman and is useless unless there is a man to work it. Is not that part of the "condition" of the machine? The workman is a necessary part of the machine while it is doing its work. If it is dangerous to him is that not a defect in the machine, of which he is a necessary part? Surely it is. The Act of Parliament might as well be put in the fire if the argument to the contrary were not held to be fallacious. If the machine is dangerous to the man without whose assistance it cannot be worked, and that without any fault of his own, that is a defect in the condition of the machinery. That was the opinion of all the judges in Walsh v. Whiteley. If the majority had not thought so, they would not have had to consider the other point—the question of negligence on the part of the employer. In that case they held that although there was a defect there was no evidence of negligence, and therefore no right to recover. I am not going to act against that decision either here or in the Court of Appeal, but the ground of that decision is not applicable to the present case. No one has suggested that there was any want of care on the part of the plaintiff, and the negligence of the employer was proved. This case is outside the case in the Court of Appeal and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Hay v. Justices of the Tower Division of the County of Middlesex. (a.)

Licensing—Spirit licence—Person convicted of felony—Disqualification—Free pardon, effect of—Wine and Beerhouse Act (1869) Amendment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29), s. 14—9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 3.

A free pardon under the Queen's sign manual relieves the convict not only of the sentence inflicted on him by the court, but of all penal consequences of the conviction.

Where, therefore, a man has been convicted of felony, and has afterwards received the Queen's pardon, he is not subject to the permanent disability to hold a licence to sell spirits by retail, imposed by section 14 of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 29 upon a person convicted of felony.

Case stated by quarter sessions.

The following were the material facts:—

The respondent Hay was, on the 28th of May, 1883, convicted of having received goods knowing them to have been stolen, and was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. On the 8th of November, 1883, he was released on licence, and on the 9th of May, 1885, he received a free pardon under her Majesty's sign manual. On the 8th of July, 1889, he applied at the licensing sessions to the justices of the Tower Division for a transfer to him of a licence of a fully-licensed house. The justices refused the application, being of opinion that they were precluded from granting a licence to Hay by the terms of section 14 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act (1869) Amendment Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29).

This section enacts that "every person convicted of felony shall for ever be disqualified from selling spirits by retail, and no licence to sell spirits by retail shall be granted to any person who shall have been so convicted as aforesaid."

Hay appealed to quarter sessions, who considered that he was not disqualified from holding a licence, the effect of the free pardon being to remove the disability imposed on convicted persons by section 14. They therefore decided in favour of Hay, but, at the request of the licensing justices, stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Morton Smith, for the appellants (the licensing justices).—The language of section 14 is peremptory. A man who has been once convicted can never afterwards hold a licence. There are similar provisions as to beer and wine licences: 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, s. 7; 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 22. [Pollock, B.—Are there not old authorities as to the effect of a free pardon?] Yes; a pardon is said to take away "poenam et culpam": Hale Pleas of the Crown, vol. 2, p. 278; to give a man "new capacity and credit": Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, vol. 2, p. 548; but it does not remove a conviction. So to hold would bring about this difficulty—9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 3, provides that a man who has served his term of imprisonment shall be in the same position as one who has received a free pardon, so that there would be no one to whom section 14 would be applicable except convicts who were actually serving their time or were out on ticket of leave. The form of the pardon is always the same, so that it never appears whether it was granted on the ground of the man's innocence or because he gave information against other criminals; it therefore does not follow that a man who has received a pardon is a proper person to hold a licence.

He referred to Leyman v. Latimer, 26 W. R. 305, 3 Ex. D. 15, 352; Cuddington v. Wilkins, Hobart, 67, 81; Bullock v. Dodds, 2 B. & Ald. 258; Reg. v. Vine, 23 W. R. 649, L. R. 10 Q. B. 195; Sir H. Finch's case, Godbolt, p. 288. [Pollock, B., mentioned Sir John Bennet's case, Cro. Car. 55.]

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (R. S. Wright with him), for the respondent.—The case is to be decided on principle, and the principle is to be found in the judgment in Cuddington v. Wilkins (at p. 81). The object of section 14 is to protect the public against persons of bad character, convicted felons, holding licences, and was never intended to apply to persons who had received a free pardon. A free pardon not only clears the offence, but all "dependencies, penalties, and disabilities incident thereto"; it removes the criminal intention, it restores a man's right to sit in Parliament: Erskine May Parliamentary Practice. The difficulty suggested as to the effect of 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, does not really arise, for that Act was passed merely for the object of amending the law of evidence with respect to convict witnesses.

Morton Smith, in reply.—As to sitting in Parliament, that right is given by statute, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, s. 2. But here a permanent disqualification is imposed by statute, and no pardon can get rid of it: Bac. Abr., tit. Pardon, H. The Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, was not passed merely as to evidence; it was so held in Leyman v. Latimer.

Pollock, B.—The question involved in this case is one of considerable importance, both personally to the respondent and generally, and it is very clear what is the point in question. The facts are simply these. John Hay, who had been convicted of receiving goods knowing them to have been stolen in May, 1883, and who was released in the following November, and received a free pardon under the Queen's sign manual on the 9th of May, 1885, applied at the licensing sessions for the Tower Division in July, 1889, for a transfer of the licence of the Duke's Arms public-house. The justices thought they had no power to grant the application, which was therefore refused. John Hay appealed to quarter sessions. The quarter sessions held that the free pardon removed the disqualification imposed by the conviction, and allowed the appeal. In my opinion they were right in so doing.

The question arises on section 14 of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 29. [His lordship read the section.] Our attention was very properly called to the fact that this was not a new enactment, a similar provision having been made by earlier Acts as to wine and beer licences. Before we come to consider the authorities as to the effect of a free pardon it is well to notice that this was a pardon under the sign manual, not under the great seal, but it was admitted that such a pardon was by the Act 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 28, s. 13, made equivalent to a pardon under the great seal.

The Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 32 was relied on by the appellants, as showing that a convict who has undergone his sentence is to be considered to be in the same position as one who has received a free pardon. But it must be remembered that that Act was passed to enable a convict to give evidence; the section with which we are now dealing was passed to protect the public and to give them some guarantee as to the character of the person who keeps a public-house. What we have to consider is the effect of a free pardon upon the status of a man who has been convicted of an offence. Now it seems to me that the pardon goes beyond doing away with the punishment—it that it also purges the offence itself. In 2 Hale P. C., at p. 278, it is said "the king's pardon takes away poenam et culpam in foro humano." In 2 Hawkins P. C., ch. 37, section 48, the pardon (it is said) makes the convict "as it were a new man and gives him a new capacity and credit." And, again, Chitty (Criminal Law, p. 775) lays it down that the effect of a pardon is to give a man "a new capacity, credit, and character." These are but text-books, but we have also dicta authorities: there is Cuddington v. Wilkins which was dealt with and approved in Leyman v. Latimer, where the whole court was of opinion that when the pardon came it took away not only the penalty but the fault as well. It was said that that did not show that there was a purging of everything, of all the consequences of a conviction, but Sir John Bennett's case appears to me to be clear on both points. It seems to me therefore that both on the language of the Act, and on principle and authority, that the decision of the justices in quarter sessions was right. In the case of Reg. v. Vine, which was relied upon by the appellants, it was not shown that the offence was purged, and that case has no bearing on the present. I do not feel called on to deal with the difficulty which is said to arise under the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, s. 2. It was said that that section places a man who has endured the punishment to which he has been condemned in the same position as a man who has received a free pardon. Whether that be so or not I do not decide. The question for us is as to the effect of a free pardon, and on that question we have clear authorities with us and no authority to the contrary.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to the alleged conflict of statutes and the argument drawn from the case of the man who has served his sentence, I will say a few words. Everyone knows that all sentences do not involve penal servitude or imprisonment for life; sentences are in the discretion of the justices or the judge by whom the case is tried. Even in cases of felony only a day's imprisonment is sometimes inflicted where some exceptional circumstances exist. All this was well known to the Legislature when they passed this Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29), and in section 14 the words "for ever" must have some meaning; they would have none if a man who had had only a month's imprisonment could demand a licence. I think that disposes of that argument. The Legislature intended that whatever the length of the sentence might be the disqualification should last all the man's lifetime.

As to the effect of the Queen's pardon, my short ground is this—that it not only removes the actual punishment imposed by the judge who sentences the man, but it also has the effect of dissolving all the penal consequences which attach to the conviction. Any other interpretation would lead to monstrous consequences. To say that when a man had had the grave misfortune to be unjustly convicted, and the Queen's pardon had been granted to him upon that ground, he should still be disqualified from following his vocation, and that the pardon could take away all the effects of the conviction except that one, would be contrary to common sense. It is said that a great thief may receive a free pardon by turning round and denouncing his companions in crime, and that such a person ought not to be in a position to obtain a licence. I do not know how that may be, but the probability is that such a person would not obtain a free pardon; a remission of part of the sentence would be sufficient to meet his case. I have come unhesitatingly to the conclusion that the Queen's pardon takes away, not only the punishment ordered by the judge, but all the penal consequences of the conviction. It follows that the justices in quarter sessions were right, and the appeal fails.

Q. B. Div. (Pollock, B., and Wills, J.) Jan. 18.

OLD (Appellant) v. ROBSON (Respondent). (a.)

Trade union—Society registered as trade union, but containing some of the objects of friendly society—Right of members to sue society for sick benefit—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), s. 4—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 22.

The Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners was registered as a trade union under the Trade Union Act, 1871. The rules contained the usual rules in restraint of trade, providing for the fining, suspending, and expelling of members for violating the rules of the society as to trade matters. They also contained rules similar to those of a friendly society, giving to members allowances in cases of sickness, infirmity, and want of employment, and other benefits.

Held, that, as the objects of the society were partly in restraint of trade, the society was, at common law, an illegal association, and therefore, by section 4 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, no agreement between members to provide benefits to members could be enforced in any court of law.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate and a justice of the peace for the borough of Middlesborough.

The appellant was secretary of the society called the "Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners," and the respondent, Robson, who was a joiner, was a member of the society. On the 5th of July, 1889, the respondent preferred a complaint before the magistrates at petty sessions against the appellant as secretary of the society, under section 22 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, charging him with having "refused to pay him a certain weekly allowance of twelve shillings for sick benefit or relief to which he was entitled as a member of the society, by reason of his being unable to follow his employment, contrary to the rules of the society."

The Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners was a society registered as a trade union under the Trade Union Act, 1871, but at the same time it gave members a right to certain allowances in cases of sickness or infirmity. The respondent, as a member of the society, had made the above claim under the rules for sick benefit relief, which the society refused to grant.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was contended for the society that the society was a "trade union," and not a "friendly society," and that section 4 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, precluded the court from exercising jurisdiction in the matter: Farrer v. Close, 17 W. R. 1129, L. R. 4 Q. B. 602.

For the respondent it was contended that the claim was for sick benefit, and that the society was a friendly society, and the rules of the society were put in, in support of such contention.

The magistrates, after perusing the rules of the society, found that the object of the society was substantially the same as specified in the Friendly Societies Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 56), and on the authority of Knowles v. Booth, 32 W. R. 432, they made an order for the payment of the twelve shillings claimed and costs.

The question of law was whether the "Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners" is a "trade union," or substantially a "friendly society."

The society was registered as a trade union, but, in addition to the rules which dealt with trade matters and which were in restraint of trade, it contained rules providing for the benefit of members, for the support of members in cases of sickness, accident, superannuation; for the burial of members and their wives; for what was called unemployed benefit, or allowance to members out that the administration proceedings might, pursuant to section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, be transferred to the Northampton County Court, as the county court having bankruptcy jurisdiction, to administer the testator's estate. There was evidence that the estate was insolvent, that the testator's debts amounted to about £9,000, and that his assets did not exceed £4,000. The banking company alleged both that the greater part of the plaintiff's debt was barred by the Statute of Limitations, but that the executors, being friendly to the plaintiff, would not plead the statute against him, and also that the executors intended to retain a debt due to themselves which was also barred by the statute. For these reasons the banking company contended that a transfer of the administration to the Bankruptcy Court ought to be made.

The plaintiff's summons for administration and the banking company's summons for transfer were heard together on February 3, 1890, by Chitty, J., in chambers, and he made an order for administration on the plaintiff's summons, but refused the application for transfer.

On February 14, 1890, a motion by the banking company to have the order made in chambers discharged, was dismissed by Chitty, J., on the ground that the power given to the court by section 125, sub-section (4), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was discretionary, and that no sufficient reason had been shown for exercising the discretion by ordering a transfer in the present case.

The banking company appealed.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, section 125, provides:—"(1) Any creditor of a deceased debtor whose debt would have been sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition against such debtor, had he been alive, may present to the court a petition in the prescribed form, praying for an order for the administration of the estate of the deceased debtor according to the law of bankruptcy; (2) upon the prescribed notice being given to the legal personal representative of the deceased debtor, the court may, in the prescribed manner, upon proof of the petitioner's debt, unless the court is satisfied that there is a reasonable probability that the estate will be sufficient for the payment of the debts owing by the deceased, make an order for the administration in bankruptcy of the deceased debtor's estate, or may, upon cause shown, dismiss such petition with or without costs; (3) an order of administration under this section shall not be made until the expiration of two months from the date of the grant of probate or letters of administration, unless with the concurrence of the legal personal representative of the deceased debtor, or unless the petitioner proves to the satisfaction of the court that the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy within three months prior to his decease; (4) a petition for administration under this section shall not be presented to the court after proceedings have been commenced in any court of justice for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate, but that court may in such case, on the application of any creditor and on proof that the estate is insufficient to pay its debts, transfer the proceedings to the court exercising jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and thereupon such last mentioned court may, in the prescribed manner, make an order for the administration of the estate of the deceased debtor, and the like consequences shall ensue as under an administration order made on the petition of a creditor; (5) upon an order being made for the administration of a deceased debtor's estate, the property of the debtor shall vest in the official receiver of the court, as trustee thereof, and he shall forthwith proceed to realise and distribute the same in accordance with the provisions of this Act; (6) with the modifications hereinafter mentioned, all the provisions of part 3 of this Act, relating to the administration of the property of a bankrupt, shall, so far as the same are applicable, apply to the case of an administration order under this section in like manner as to an order of adjudication under this Act; (7) in the administration of the property of a deceased debtor under an order of administration, the official receiver shall have regard to any claim by the legal personal representative of the deceased debtor to payment of the proper funeral and testamentary expenses incurred by him in and about the testator's estate, and such claims shall be deemed a preferential debt under the order, and be payable in full, out of the debtor's estate, in priority to all other debts."

Everitt, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for the appellant.—The plaintiff's claim against the estate is favoured by the executors, and if this insolvent estate is administered in the Chancery Division, the banking company and the other creditors of the testator cannot raise the objection that the plaintiff's debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations, because the plaintiff's debt will then be the foundation of the decree: Fuller v. Redman, 26 Beav. 614, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 38. The application of the banking company is made under section 125, sub-section (4), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which enacts that on such application, and on proof that the estate is insufficient to pay its debts, "the court may transfer" the administration proceedings to the proper Bankruptcy Court. "May" in this sub-section must be construed as "must." In sub-section (1) and (2) of the same section "may" clearly has the effect of "must." Under section 79 of the Companies Act, 1862, which enacts that a company "may" be wound up by the court, it has been held that, as between a creditor and the company, it is not a discretionary matter with the court to say whether the company shall be wound up or not: Bowes v. The Hope, &c., Scidy, 13 W. R. 790, 11 H. L. Cas. 389; Buckley on The Companies Acts, 5th ed., p. 196. Though the natural meaning of the word "may" when used in an Act of Parliament is permissive and enabling only, yet there may be circumstances which may couple the power with a duty to exercise it: Backwell (Alderman) case, 1 Vern. 152; Julius v. Bishop of Oxford, 28 W. R. 726, 5 App. Cas. 214; Knowles v. Roberts, 38 Ch. D. 263, per Bowen, L.J., at p. 271, 36 W. R. Dig. 157. In the case of In re Weaver, Higgs v. Weaver, 33 W. R. 874, 29 Ch. D. 236, Pearson, J., held that the power to transfer given by section 125, sub-section (4), was a discretionary power, but that case is not binding on this court.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and T. R. Warrington, for the defendants, the executors.

Bryne, Q.C., and P. S. Gregory, for the plaintiff.—Section 125, sub-section (4), does not in any way render it imperative on the court to transfer the administration of the estate to the Bankruptcy Court; the words of the section are purely discretionary. The view of Pearson, J., in In re Weaver, Higgs v. Weaver, was adopted by Stirling, J., in In re York, Atkinson v. Powell, 35 W. R. 609, 36 Ch. D. 233, and he expressed an opinion that the existence of the executor's right of retainer was no special ground for making an order for transfer. In the administration in bankruptcy of the estate of an insolvent debtor, the Bankruptcy Court will follow the practice of the Chancery Division: In re Crowther, Ex parte Ellis, 36 W. R. 189, 20 Q. B. D. 38.

Everitt, Q.C., in reply.—The whole object and machinery of the Bankruptcy Act is to provide equality for all creditors; the express provision in sub-section 7 of section 25 for payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, as a preferential debt, shows that no other creditors can be preferred. In the case of insolvent estates the object of the Bankruptcy Act will be fettered by not transferring the administration to bankruptcy. The object of section 125 is that the mode of administration in bankruptcy may be applied in the administration of the estate of a deceased insolvent, though not so as to include the property of third persons. Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Gould, 35 W. R. 569, 19 Q. B. D. 92.

Cotton, L.J.—The appellant contends, in the first place, that, on the words of the Act, it is imperative on the judge to make the order for transfer. The words are that the court may, in such a case, make an order for transfer, and, in my opinion, those words can never do more than empower the judge (not making it imperative on him) to make the order asked for. The real question to be decided in all these cases—where the words only give the judge power to make an order for transfer, which he could not have made were it not for those words in the Act of Parliament—is whether or not there is anything which can be collected from this or any other part of the Act to require, and make it the duty of the judge to exercise the power given to him by those words. That is the principle laid down in the case of Julius v. Bishop of Oxford by Lord Selborne, and I refer to it because the principle of law is there stated correctly and shortly.

I think great misconception is caused in attempting to argue that "may" means "must." It never can mean "must" so long as the English language retains its meaning; but it gives the power, and it may be a question when (a judge having the power to do that which is given him by "may") it becomes his duty to exercise that power. There is nothing said in the Act as to the duty of the judge to exercise the power given him, but it is argued that the whole object of the Act of Parliament was to secure equality amongst the creditors, and that, therefore, as the leaving of the administration in the Chancery Division may give priority to some creditors—as, for instance, by enabling the executor to retain his own debt, or the plaintiff creditor to get payment of his debt, because the statute is not pleaded against him—this renders it the duty of the judge (when there is an application by a large creditor), to make the order asked for, because the object of the section is to have the equality, provided for by the law of bankruptcy.

Let us first consider that. In my opinion, if Parliament had meant to do away with the rule of retainer, which is a legal rule allowed in the Court of Chancery in administering the estates of deceased persons, it would have done so in express terms. Parliament is quite strong enough to do so, and that is the only power that can do so. But it is wrong to suppose that that rule was an equitable doctrine. So far from that being so, the Court of Chancery only empowers an executor to retain out of legal assets his own debts. He cannot apply that doctrine as regards equitable assets; so that shows that the Court of Chancery does recognize fully the equitable right of equal payment of creditors of equal degree. As regards the executor not pleading the statute, the Court of Chancery does not hold an executor liable for not pleading the statute; but the executor, as the person legally liable for the debt, has, from his position, the alternative, as settled by the Court of Chancery, of pleading or not pleading the Statute of Limitations when a creditor comes forward whose right might possibly be barred (I do not say it is here, but assuming it were) by the Statute of Limitations. A claim might, however, be set up, to which the statute was never intended to apply, and, therefore, although the statute might be pleaded, there may be circumstances that render it wrong to plead the statute, and it is never looked upon with any great favour.

Then it is said that the Bankruptcy Act shows, not directly, but indirectly, that it is intended to do away with this power, as regards the executor, by saying that the receiver in bankruptcy is to have regard to any funeral expenses incurred by the personal representative, and that those are to be paid in priority to other debts. Well, that is one case that is provided for, possibly others were never thought of by Parliament, but in my opinion, the right of retainer being a right which the personal representative would not have in the administration in bankruptcy, the mere existence of that right, recognized by the Chancery Division which has not been recognized in the Court of Bankruptcy, is not a ground for exercising the discretion, or for compelling the judge to exercise the power given him by the section, and that really is the only point.

It may be (I do not express an opinion on it) that Stirling, J., was right in saying (in the case of In re York) that the fact of the existence of the right of retainer would not be a ground for not exercising the power of transfer; but there were in that case circumstances which did render it desirable that there should be a transfer. It is still a question to be considered, and one we may have to consider hereafter, whether the transfer of an administration to bankruptcy would prejudice or injure an executor in his right of retainer. But in my opinion neither that, nor the fact that the executor has not thought fit to plead the statute against the plaintiff, can be treated as a ground, if there be no other ground, for making it desirable to make an order for transfer. In my opinion if it were intended in the case of a bankrupt or insolvent estate, that there should be no such right on the part of an executor to retain, or that an executor should be bound to plead the Statute of Limitations against every creditor on the part of whom there might be an application, Parliament ought to have said so, and I think it would have said so.

In my opinion there is a power of discretion given in the word "may," and there is not anything sufficient in point of law to show that it was the duty of the judge to exercise that power in this particular case.

I call attention to this—that we have a great many provisions in the Bankruptcy Acts in order to secure property—not only the property the bankrupt has at the time of the bankruptcy, but what he has parted with and prevented himself from having at the time of his bankruptcy; but what the law considers unfair preference in the case of a bankrupt's creditors, is not really applicable to deceased debtors, even though they are insolvent, for in the latter case it has been held that the sections referring to voluntary settlements executed a certain time before the bankruptcy, have no application to the case of deceased persons, though at the time of their death they were insolvent.* That shows that Parliament did not intend by this section to apply all the procedure of the Bankruptcy Acts in the administration of the estates of insolvent debtors.

In my opinion Chitty, J., was right, and, although I quite hold that this is a discretion which may be appealed, I think that he exercised that discretion rightly in this case.

Lindley, L.J.—There is no ground for transferring this action from the High Court to the Court of Bankruptcy except the broad and very important ground, that if the transfer is made, the assets will be administered in a very different manner. That is true, and it is also true that to many minds the mode of administering assets in bankruptcy is preferable to the mode of administering assets elsewhere. The mode of administering assets in bankruptcy is statutory, and depends on statutory enactments carefully worked out, whereas if they are administered elsewhere, it rests on technical principles not altogether satisfactory.

The right of an executor to retain, is a common law legal right. It depends on the rule that a man cannot sue himself, and out of that rule, developed the right to retain. That right has been thought so ill of by

The banking company appealed.

In my opinion there is a power of discretion given in the word "may," and there is not anything sufficient in point of law to show that it was the duty of the judge to exercise that power in this particular case.

I call attention to this—that we have a great many provisions in the Bankruptcy Acts in order to secure property—not only the property the bankrupt has at the time of the bankruptcy, but what he has parted with and prevented himself from having at the time of his bankruptcy; but what the law considers unfair preference in the case of a bankrupt's creditors, is not really applicable to deceased debtors, even though they are insolvent, for in the latter case it has been held that the sections referring to voluntary settlements executed a certain time before the bankruptcy, have no application to the case of deceased persons, though at the time of their death they were insolvent.* That shows that Parliament did not intend by this section to apply all the procedure of the Bankruptcy Acts in the administration of the estates of insolvent debtors.

In my opinion Chitty, J., was right, and, although I quite hold that this is a discretion which may be appealed, I think that he exercised that discretion rightly in this case.

Lindley, L.J.—There is no ground for transferring this action from the High Court to the Court of Bankruptcy except the broad and very important ground, that if the transfer is made, the assets will be administered in a very different manner. That is true, and it is also true that to many minds the mode of administering assets in bankruptcy is preferable to the mode of administering assets elsewhere. The mode of administering assets in bankruptcy is statutory, and depends on statutory enactments carefully worked out, whereas if they are administered elsewhere, it rests on technical principles not altogether satisfactory.

The right of an executor to retain, is a common law legal right. It depends on the rule that a man cannot sue himself, and out of that rule, developed the right to retain. That right has been thought so ill of by

* Ex parte Official Receiver, In re Gould, 35 W. R. 569, 19 Q. B. D. 92.

Chancellors and those who have had the development of chancery jurisdiction that they have declined to follow the law where they have had equitable assets to deal with. That right is, nevertheless, perfectly well known to every lawyer, and Parliament has never yet faced the difficulty and abolished that right, and we all know that any legislation on the subject is so worded as not to prejudice it. So here Parliament has said nothing to the effect that the right to retain shall be abolished. Again, there is, in administration in the Chancery Division, the right of the creditor who has obtained judgment to priority in the administration over other creditors. That is unknown in administrations in bankruptcy, so far as I know. Now, is it right to say that, in consequence of these two systems of administration being co-existent, whenever there is an insolvent estate being administered in Chancery, it must be transferred to the Bankruptcy Court? It really comes to that. I cannot spell that out of the section. If Parliament meant that, it should have used very different language, and should not have said "may" so often, and contrasted it with "shall." As a matter of construction I am convinced, having regard to the principle laid down in Julius v. The Bishop of Oxford, that this is a discretionary power, and I cannot say that Chitty, J., has exercised his discretion wrongly. It is an important question whether it would be just to other people to exercise his discretion the other way; I do not know how that may be; but I am not prepared to differ from him in what he has done.

LOPES, L.J.—Sub-section (4) of section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, authorizes a transfer from the High Court to the court exercising jurisdiction in bankruptcy (that is, in this case, the county court) in the case provided for by that sub-section, and the first question which is raised is this, Whether that power of transfer is discretionary or imperative? It is contended by Mr. Everitt that there is no discretion in the judge, but that he is bound to transfer.

Now the word used in sub-section (4) is "may," and the word "may" is beyond all question potential—it implies a power, but if it is coupled with a duty imposed on the court, or on the person to whom it is given, to use that power in a certain particular way, it then, no doubt, becomes imperative, and there is plenty of authority for that proposition.

Now in this case I can see no such duty, and, in my opinion, the power conferred by the word "may" is discretionary.

But then it is said that, even if there is a discretion in the judge, in this particular case he has wrongly exercised such discretion, and the ground upon which it is said he has wrongly exercised his discretion is, because the effect of his exercising his discretion in the way he has, is this—that it preserves to the legal personal representative, and to the plaintiff creditor, an advantage which they would possess if the administration takes place in the Court of Chancery. These rights of the legal personal representative, and the plaintiff creditor are rights which they possess, and I cannot say that the recognition of these rights is any ground for holding the discretion to be wrongly exercised. It is perhaps an anomaly that there should be two co-existing systems, and that the distribution of assets should proceed in a different way, depending very much on whether the proceedings are taken first in the Court of Chancery or in the Court of Bankruptcy; but that is a matter for Parliament, and is a matter with which we have nothing to do.

I think, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed.

DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE AND OTHERS v. O'CONNOR. (a.)

Inclosure Act—Reservation to lord of manor—Right of shooting over lands allotted—Rule of construction of Act.

Where, under an Inclosure Act, lands in a manor have been inclosed and allotted as freehold, and, by a reservation clause, certain rights over the lands so allotted are reserved to the lord, the reservation clause, being in derogation of the right of freehold given by the Act, will be construed most strictly against the lord, and nothing short of a positive reservation to the lord, either expressly or by necessary implication, of rights (as, for example, the right of shooting) will suffice to entail upon the lands allotted as freehold a burden inconsistent with the ownership in fee.

Appeal from the judgment of Grantham, J., at the trial of the action. The action was brought for an injunction to restrain the defendant from shooting over certain land which had been allotted under an Inclosure Act (referred to below) to the defendant's predecessor in title.

The plaintiffs were the trustees of the Earl of Carlisle, who was lord of the manors of Upper Denton and Nether Denton, in the Barony of Gilsland, in Cumberland.

The defendant was the rector of Nether Denton, and as such was the present owner of an allotment under an Inclosure Act and award made in 1798.

The Inclosure Act (38 Geo. 3, c. 18, private Act) was entitled "an Act for dividing and inclosing the moors, commons, and waste grounds in the manors of Upper Denton and Nether Denton, within and parcel of the Barony of Gilsland, in the county of Cumberland."

On page 19 of the Act it was provided that "all and every the allotments and appropriations hereinbefore directed to be made shall and are hereby declared to be freehold to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

On page 26 it was provided that "nothing in this Act contained shall be construed or adjudged to defeat, lessen, or prejudice the right, title, or interest of the said Frederick, Earl of Carlisle, lord of the said Barony of Gilsland, and of the said manors of Upper Denton and Nether Denton, his heirs or assigns, or of the lord or lords, lady or ladies, of the said barony and manors for the time being, of, in, and to the coal, lead, tin, copper, stone, or slate, minerals, or metals, within or under the said moors, commons, and waste grounds intended to be inclosed as aforesaid (save and except the stones in the public stone quarries to be set out as aforesaid), or of, in, or to the seigniories and royalties, franchises, and liberties, incident and belonging to the said manors; but that the said Frederick, Earl of Carlisle, and all and every person and persons claiming by, from, or under, or in trust for him as lord of the said barony and manors, and all succeeding lord and lords, lady and ladies, and owners thereof, for the time being, shall and may at all times for ever hereafter have, hold, take, and enjoy all rents, services, courts, perquisites, and profits of courts and mills (except for the grinding and grist of malt), piscaries, fishing, hunting, hawking, and fowling, goods and chattels of felons and fugitives, felons of themselves, and put in exigent, deodands, waifs, estrays, forfeitures, escheats, and all other royalties, liberties, franchises, privileges, pre-eminences, jurisdictions, and appurtenances whatsoever, to the said barony and manors, or to the lord or lords, lady or ladies thereof, for the time being, incident, appertaining, or belonging, or which have been anciently used, exercised, and enjoyed by the lord or lords, lady or ladies, of the same barony and manors (other than and except such right of common, pasturage, and free warren in respect of conies, which is intended to be extinguished) as could or might be claimed by him, her, or them, as owner or owners of the soil of the said moors, commons, and waste grounds, in as full, ample, and beneficial a manner, to all intents and purposes, as he, she, or they could or might have held and enjoyed the same in case this Act had not been made."

Grantham, J., held that the right of shooting over the allotments was reserved by the Act to the lord, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed.

Gully, Q.C., and Mattinson, for the defendant.

Bigham, Q.C., and Edward Pollock, for the plaintiffs.

The following cases were referred to: Greathead v. Morley, 3 Man. & G. 139; Ewart v. Graham, 7 W. R. 621, 7 H. L. Cas. 331; Bruce v. Helliwell, 5 H. & N. 609, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 33; Lord Leconfield v. Dixon, 16 W. R. 157, L. R. 3 Ex. 30; and Sowerby v. Smith, 23 W. R. 79, L. R. 9 C. P. 524.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiffs claim a declaration that they, as trustees for the Earl of Carlisle, are entitled to the exclusive right of shooting over that part of the original waste land which has been allotted to the defendant's predecessor in title. The defendant claims to be entitled to the right of shooting by virtue of his ownership of the freehold of the allotment. The question turns solely upon the construction of this particular Inclosure Act. It is said that it is an Act which in one sense is to be considered as an agreement between the various parties. It may be that the Act must be considered as drafted upon an agreement between the parties, but still it is an Act of Parliament and must be construed according to the rules, if any, which have been laid down for the construction of such Acts as these. The first inquiry, then, is, whether any rules of construction have been laid down for construing such Acts. It seems to me that Sowerby v. Smith in the Exchequer Chamber is the leading case in which a rule is laid down. That was a decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with this court, and the principles laid down in that case are binding upon us, unless there is something which takes that case out of the ordinary rule. It was suggested that the case is not binding upon us because, it was said, it was in conflict with another case also in the Exchequer Chamber, and that when two cases in the same court as this are in conflict, this court is free to say which it will follow. The court, however, ought not to come to the conclusion that two cases in the same court are in conflict unless it is clearly convinced that they are. I agree that if the two cases are in conflict this court must say with which of the two it agrees. If, therefore, the case of Lord Leconfield v. Dixon were in conflict with Sowerby v. Smith we should have to say which we should follow. For my part I should prefer to follow Sowerby v. Smith. I shall consider presently whether or not they are in conflict. The judgment delivered by Cockburn, C.J., in Sowerby v. Smith was a carefully considered judgment, and the effect of it is that in such an Act as this, where in one part one finds that a portion of the waste is allotted as freehold, the fact of the freehold being allotted gives the allottee the right of shooting in as full a manner as is possessed by any other freeholder in this country, unless from another part of the Act it appears that, notwithstanding the grant of the freehold, the allottee is not to have the right of shooting, but that that right is reserved to the lord. Primâ facie, the allottee has the right of shooting, and it lies upon the lord to show that, notwithstanding the grant of the freehold, the right of shooting has been reserved to him either in express terms or by necessary implication. Cockburn, C.J., says (23 W. R., at p. 80, L. R. 9 C. P., at p. 531):—"The land having been allotted as freehold, the ownership must carry with it all the incidents which ordinarily attach to a freehold interest, unless by the special provisions of the Act some right has been reserved to the lord which would derogate from the ordinary rights of ownership in the soil; and the question turns, therefore, entirely on the effect of the reservation clause." Further on (23 W. R., at p. 81, L. R. 9 C. P., at p. 532) he gives an additional rule of construction:—"It appears to me that the effect of the clause"—he is speaking of the particular clause there in question, but the rule is applicable generally—"which being in derogation of the right of freehold given by the Act to the allottees of the lands inclosed, must, I think, be construed most strictly against the party claiming under it, is simply to preserve to the owner of the manor such rights as were of a manorial character." I take that rule to be that as the claim of the lord depends upon the reservation clause, which is in derogation of the right of freehold granted to the allottees, that clause must be construed most strictly against the person claiming under it. That rule is expanded by him (23 W. R., at p. 82, L. R. 9 C. P., at p. 537):—"Independently, however, of authority, I arrive at the conclusion that nothing short of a positive reservation to the lord of the right of sporting over the enclosed lands, if not in express terms, at all events in language necessarily leading to such a conclusion, will suffice to entail on land allotted as freehold a burden of a feudal and onerous character inconsistent with the ownership in fee." Nothing can be clearer than that. The lord's alleged right depends upon the reservation clause. That clause must be construed strictly, and cannot be held to reserve a right over another man's land unless it does so in express terms or in language necessarily leading to that conclusion. In my opinion it must be taken that Lord Bramwell, though he delivered a separate judgment, concurred in that judgment.

It is said that Lord Leconfield v. Dixon is in conflict with that case. If it is, we are left free to follow which we think right, and when I look at the closely reasoned judgment of Cockburn, C.J., in Sowerby v. Smith I can gather a clear and distinct principle and rule laid down in it, whereas, though I look with affectionate respect at the judgment of Bovill, C.J., in Lord Leconfield v. Dixon, I must confess I can gather no rule or principle laid down there. I venture to say that, if the case of Lord Leconfield v. Dixon had come up for decision after Sowerby v. Smith, and the court had to apply the rule laid down in the latter case to it, I should greatly doubt whether I could say that the reservation clause was so clear as to reserve the right of sporting to the lord. There are, however, words in the reservation clause in that case which are not to be found in the reservation clause in Sowerby v. Smith—"hawking, fowling, and all beasts and birds considered as game, . . . and all other royalties, liberties, privileges, and appurtenances, except such as are expressly taken away by this Act." Those words were relied upon by Bovill, C.J., as showing the implied reservation. It is not, therefore, necessary now to say that those words are not sufficient to raise the necessary implication. It is clear from the argument in Lord Leconfield v. Dixon in the Court of Exchequer, as reported in 36 L. J. Ex. 102, that the court had to consider those words, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber overruled the decision because, in their opinion, sufficient weight had not been given to them. The right of sporting was, therefore, held to be reserved to the lord, not in express terms, but by necessary implication. That case, therefore, in that view of it, comes within the rule laid down in Sowerby v. Smith.

Then, as to the case of Ewart v. Graham, there can be no doubt that the right there claimed was, though not expressly, still by necessary implication reserved. That was the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, and it was upheld in the House of Lords. That case clearly comes within the rule. There is more, however, to be gathered from Ewart v. Graham. The case of Greathead v. Morley was overruled by the Exchequer Chamber in Ewart v. Graham. The House of Lords, however, refused to say that Greathead v. Morley was to be taken as overruled. Accordingly that case, as it is not overruled, must be considered also. It seems to me that it also lays down the same rule, though not in such distinct terms as Sowerby v. Smith.

The result, therefore, is that we see the rule laid down in the earliest of the above cases, and in more distinct terms in the latest case, and of the two cases which came between them, one comes clearly within the rule, and the other cannot be said not to be within it. None of the cases, therefore, in my opinion, conflict.

(His lordship then said that the language of the reservation clause in the present case was ambiguous, and did not clearly, either expressly or by necessary implication, reserve the right of shooting to the lord. Construing the reservation clause, according to the rule above laid down, strictly against the lord, he could not hold that the right of shooting had been reserved.)

BOWEN, L.J., concurred.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I shall not refer to the authorities further than to say that I adopt the conclusions of the Exchequer Chamber in Sowerby v. Smith as laying down the law which we should follow. If there is any difference between that case and the earlier one of Lord Leconfield v. Dixon, I do not hesitate to say that I prefer the rule laid down in the later case. It lays down an intelligible rule for the construction of such Acts as these. There is one case which was not referred to by the Master of the Rolls—namely, Bruce v. Helliwell—and that case seems to me to be quite consistent with the rule laid down in Sowerby v. Smith (The Lord Justice then held that the reservation clause was obscure, and did not make it clear that the right of shooting was reserved to the lord.)

TURPIN v. PAIN. (a.)

Practice—Official referee—Form of report—Method of taking accounts—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 56.

An official referee is not bound to take accounts referred to him under section 56 of the Judicature Act, 1873, in the strict way used in the Chancery Division before a chief clerk in chambers, though he may adopt that method so far as the circumstances of the case seem to him to admit. He is not compelled, in cases of complicated accounts, to proceed upon any particular accounts and to refer to each item in the report, but may strike a balance upon the result of the inquiry generally. The parties may use the notes of the inquiry and of the evidence for the purpose of tracing any item allowed or disallowed which they may desire to question.

(a.) Reported by W. H. QUARRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion.

Mary Ann Taylor, widow, died on the 27th of August, 1872, having by her will appointed the defendants, Philip Pain and William Pain, executors and trustees thereof, and thereby directed them to carry on her business of a farmer upon her farm called Goosehcys, in the parish of Romford, in the county of Essex, and to employ the capital embarked therein, with any other part of her personal estate required for that purpose, during the remainder of the term for which she held the said farm; and she directed the defendants to stand possessed of the profits arising therefrom upon the trusts thereinafter declared concerning her residuary estate, and after the expiration of the said term she gave her implements of husbandry, household furniture, and effects unto her son, Philip Thomas Taylor, and gave her residuary personal estate, including the profits of her said business, upon trust to provide for the maintenance of her children during their minorities, and when the youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years in trust to divide the same amongst her children, Philip Thomas Taylor and the four plaintiffs, Mary Ann Turpin, Emma Giblin, Fanny Taylor (since deceased), and Amy Taylor.

The defendants proved the will on the 21st of October, 1872, and carried on the farming business from the date of the death of the testatrix until the 29th of September, 1877. During this period they allowed Philip Thomas Taylor to act as bailiff, and with his sisters, the plaintiffs, to occupy the farmhouse, and made him payments for the expenses of the farm and of the household. On the 29th of September, 1877, the term for which the farm was held expired; Philip Thomas Taylor then became tenant, the plaintiffs continuing to live with him in the house until 1880, when he became insolvent, and the assets to which he had become entitled under the will of the testatrix were realized, and the farm given up. The defendants then took a house elsewhere for the plaintiffs, and continued to make payments for their support and education. The plaintiff, Amy Taylor, the youngest of the beneficiaries under the will, attained the age of twenty-one years on the 14th of October, 1885.

The defendant Philip Pain was a farmer, and the defendant William Pain a cattle dealer. They had kept the ordinary cheque and pass books, and had the usual accounts kept in these respective businesses relating to purchases and sales of live and dead stock belonging to the Goosehcys Farm; beyond these they had kept no proper accounts, and the executorship accounts were consequently in a very complicated condition.

On the 24th of August, 1886, the plaintiffs commenced this action, claiming administration of the testatrix's personal estate.

On the 4th of February, 1887, an order for administration was made, and an order for a receiver, with the usual accounts to be taken, and an inquiry what parts, if any, of the testatrix's personal estate were then outstanding or undisposed of. On the 14th of May, 1887, an order was made discharging so much of the order of the 4th of February as directed the taking and making of the accounts and inquiries therein mentioned. On the 14th of May, 1887, on the action coming on for trial before Kekewich, J., an order was made directing various accounts and inquiries, and, amongst others,

(1) an account of the dealings of the defendants in the business at Gooseheys Farm from the date of the death of the testatrix up to the 29th of September, 1877; (2) an account of receipts and profits of the defendants in respect of the estate of the testatrix other than those comprised in account No. (1).

By an order of the 15th of December, 1887, it was by consent ordered that on the chief clerk's certificate under the judgment of the 14th of May, 1887, it should be certified that the accounts brought in by the defendants respectively under the said judgment should include both the estate of the testatrix and of her husband, Philip Taylor, deceased, such accounts not distinguishing the items relating to these respective estates. By an order of the 11th of November, 1889, it was ordered that it should be referred to Mr. Hemming, Q.C., one of the official referees, under section 56 of the Judicature Act, 1873, to take, among other accounts, the accounts numbered (1) and (2) directed by the judgment of the 14th of May, 1887, and to report thereon, regard being had to the order of the 15th of December, 1887. Separate accounts were filed by the defendants, who had severed their defences, and were represented by separate counsel and solicitors.

The official referee refused to go into the accounts as between the two defendants, and for the purpose of his inquiry ordered the separate accounts to be amalgamated. He examined witnesses and the books and vouchers, the inquiry lasting nine days, and made his report on the 24th of December, 1889. By this he stated, having set out the facts at considerable length, that it was generally impossible to distinguish between payments made by the defendants to Philip Thomas Taylor for the purpose of carrying on the farm, to be expended in wages and other outgoings, and those made to Philip Thomas Taylor for the purpose of household expenses for the maintenance of himself and of the plaintiffs, most of such payments never having been specifically appropriated; and that he had allowed such sums in the accounts, notwithstanding any such irregularity, as payments made by the defendants for maintenance and education, the defendants having acted for the benefit of the estate. He further reported that as to account (1) the defendants had, from the death of the testatrix up to the 29th of September, 1877, in the course of their dealings with the farming business, received £9,758, and had paid £9,823, leaving a balance of £65 in their favour; and that as to account (2), the defendants had, in respect of other receipts and profits, received £5,061, and expended £5,080, leaving a balance of £19 in their favour.

The plaintiffs now moved that the report of the 24th of December, 1889, might be remitted to the same official referee, or in the alternative to another official referee or to a special referee, that directions might be given to such referee that the accounts be taken in the way usual in the Chancery Division, before a chief clerk, and vouched in the ordinary way, that the referee should take the accounts rendered by the defendants and filed before the date of the order of reference, and that directions be given to such referee to state in his report which of the items in the accounts rendered by the defendants had been allowed and disallowed by him respectively, and show what, if any, sums not mentioned in such accounts he had charged against the defendants.

On the 28th of February, 1890, after the motion had been opened, it was adjourned for a week at the suggestion of the judge, in order that he might make some further inquiries of the official referee, and that counsel for the defendants might show from the referee's notes the way in which the sums allowed by him had been arrived at.

On the 6th of March the referee made a further report to the judge to this effect:—The accounts brought in by the defendants were, after the lapse of time which had occurred, insufficient to enable them to produce an approximate account. The defendants had severed in their defence. One of them had given such materials as he had or could discover from the plaintiffs to an accountant to do what he could with them, and the other had intrusted his solicitor with a like duty. Accounts had then been produced which were not in harmony with one another, and were too defective in form to supply the basis of investigation in the usual way. The defendants could not verify these on oath, and the accountant could only say that his account was as good as it could be made from the existing materials. Under these circumstances the following course had been adopted. The official referee had collated such documents as could be found with the vivâ voce evidence of everyone who knew anything about the matters in question, including that of Philip Thomas Taylor, who had a book in which he had informally made entries of the sales and purchases effected by the defendants in carrying on the farm, as well as notes of the money expended by himself for wages, maintenance of his four infant sisters, the plaintiffs, at the farmhouse, and other petty outgoings. With these materials the aggregate expenditure and receipts of the trustees were arrived at, and a further account obtained, though not one which the official referee could have taken as the basis of investigation on the method pursued in chambers in the Chancery Division. The notes of this inquiry would afford as great facilities as an ordinary chief clerk's certificate for rearguing before the court all points taken before the official referee, and less difficulty would occur in tracing any specific matter than would result from a search through the affidavits, though the report would not afford materials for opening up new questions on items not made the subject of inquiry before the referee.

Maclean, Q.C., and J. H. Redman, for the motion.—The report may be adopted wholly or partially only; it merely presents the general conclusions of the official referee. There is nothing specific to enable the plaintiffs to examine and dispute, if necessary, separate items: Burrard v. Calisher, 30 W. R. 540, 19 Ch. D. 644. The report ought to be remitted, and directions given for the accounts to be vouched in the ordinary way.

Romer, Q.C., and G. Curtis Price, for the defendant Philip Pain.

Byrne, Q.C., Haldane, Q.C., and W. R. Sheldon, for the defendant William Pain.—No further inquiry is necessary or should be ordered: Walker v. Bunkell, 31 W. R. 661, 22 Ch. D. 722. The official referee has wide powers as to the way in which he is to hold his judicial inquiry under section 56 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and to take evidence: Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co., 35 W. R. 822, 19 Q. B. D. 155. He is not compelled to take accounts in the way usual in the Chancery Division; these involved accounts have been taken in the best way possible.

Maclean, Q.C., replied.

Chitty, J.—An order was made in this action directing various accounts and inquiries, including (1) an account of the dealings and transactions of the defendants in carrying on the business of the testatrix at Gooseheys Farm from the time of her death until the 29th of September, 1877, and (2) an account of the receipts and payments expended in respect of the estate of the testatrix other than those comprised in number (1). Against the trustees there is no charge of dishonesty, but there is difficulty in making out their accounts, which clearly have not been properly kept. The order was taken in chambers, and an attempt was made to work through the accounts in the usual way—that is, the accounts being brought in by the accounting parties, verified by affidavit, and then, if necessary, the accounting parties being cross-examined as to matters in contest. The vouching then takes place, before a junior clerk as a rule, and then the chief clerk's certificate is prepared in a form which enables the parties to single out the items allowed and disallowed by reference to the account filed, and bring any objection before the court by way of a summons to vary.

This method, it was found, broke down in the present case. Two years were spent in chambers, and two separate accounts were brought in, each defendant accounting as well as he could for certain parts of the estate. The result was that the matter was so entangled that this ordinary system, which is well adapted to accounts properly kept, would possibly have ended had things gone on, in a similar result to McIntosh v. The Great Western Railway Co., 3 W. R. 472, 4 Giff. 683—namely, that the parties would have been obliged probably to settle the matter, or the beneficiaries would have been kept out of their money for an indefinite period. The delay which can and does take place in taking some very intricate accounts almost amounts to a denial of justice. Trustees ought, of course, to keep accounts, and I am not in a position to draw distinctions between accounts to be kept or those not to be kept, for I should have to weigh the capacity of each man in golden scales, and say who should or who should not keep accounts, perfect or imperfect. Such varying distinctions have never been made. Putting wilful default out of the question, the object of taking the accounts is to arrive at a just conclusion for what sum the accounting parties must account, and the proper remedy with regard to the non-keeping of accounts in a proper case is to disallow the costs of taking the account, or to direct the trustees to pay it. With that I have nothing to do in this case.

A failure having practically taken place in the ordinary method, an order was made referring the matter to one of the official referees under section 56 of the Judicature Act, 1873, that is to report only; to take the accounts, including those numbered (1) and (2), and to report thereon to the court. The official referee has made a report first stating of what the estate of the testatrix consisted at her death, including her deceased husband's estate, and also of what the estate now consists, to both of which there is no objection. He then states the circumstances of the case, and what the trustees did, from which it appears that they did not act strictly, but did the best they could, as trustees for the family, according to their judgment. The referee then reports that dealing with these two accounts the trustees have, as to number (1), received £9,758, and have paid £9,823, leaving a balance of £65 in their favour; and as to number (2), received £5,061, and have paid £5,080, leaving a balance of £19 in their favour. That is the report.

This motion now asks me to remit the report to the referee (or to some other referee, which part was not pressed), and to give a direction to the referee that the accounts be vouched in the ordinary way. The official referee is not bound to take the accounts in the same way as the chief clerk. If it were so, provision would be made by the General Orders to that effect. There is an advantage in some accounts in taking them before the referee according to the existing practice. He does not proceed by affidavits and then by cross-examination on the affidavits, but by having the witnesses, accounts, and books before him, and by sitting continuously and taking vivâ voce evidence. The referee has made full notes of the inquiry, which are before me, and contain all the materials upon which he proceeded. This method is similar to that adopted by the masters in the Queen's Bench Division. I am of opinion that the referee may adopt the method employed by the chief clerk in taking accounts so far as he may find it convenient and likely to advance the ends of justice. Special items in the account may be specially referred to as allowed or disallowed, but in such a case as this, where the farming and household accounts are mixed up with the advances, I say the referee could not properly have taken the accounts in that way, by having accounts regularly taken before him in the usual manner. Therefore the applicants fail upon this point. Then I am asked to give directions to the referee to take the accounts rendered by the defendants before the date of the order of reference, and to give directions to the referee to state in his report which of the items therein had been allowed and disallowed by him, and what sums, if any, not mentioned in such accounts he has charged against the defendants. These two points resolve themselves into this. The plaintiffs say that the report is practically final, and that they cannot attack it. The referee is not directed to conclude the matter—that is, to try it as if it were the trial of the action and enter judgment—he is directed under section 56 to inquire only. He has, it is said, made a report in such a manner that the parties cannot select an item and bring it before the court as a matter with regard to which they contend the referee has erred. It is obvious that the referee has not stated on what accounts he has proceeded, and he has not proceeded upon any account with specific numbers to every item, but has found the total receipts and payments and has found a balance. According to arrangement I have seen the referee, and have had a detailed statement upon these points which have been urged. He tells me in substance that he cannot go through his materials again and indicate by reference the items allowed or disallowed. Further, it should be observed that the notes of the referee are in court, and can be read by anyone desirous of so doing, and the second report says that less difficulty would probably occur in tracing therein any particular item than would result from hunting it down through a vast mass of affidavits.

Now this is a peculiar case. Did I think the report could not in any way be attacked, I might accede to this proposition so far as this, to direct the referee, on the face of his report, to point out generally or specifically, as the case permitted, the items allowed or disallowed, by reference to some document. But I am satisfied by the second report that there are the materials at present with which to attack the report as a matter of substance, if there are special grounds for doing so. No doubt this would involve much labour, but the parties who were before the referee will be able, if necessary, by reference to his notes, to pick out the material points and bring them before the court. I have referred to the Dunkirk Hall Colliery Co.'s case, 26 W. R. 841, 9 Ch. D. 20. There it was a question of ascertaining damages, but it was a complicated case and the notes very voluminous. In that case those who objected to the report had to go through the notes in a similar way, but the fact that much time and labour are necessary for such a task is no reason why I should, in such a special case as this, insist on form to such an extent as to substantially inflict injustice on some of the parties to the action. I am not asked to adopt or reject the report, but simply to send it back; so the result is that I do not remit the report to the official referee. The trustees' costs will be their costs in any event, without prejudicing the question of two sets of costs to them. Liberty to apply upon further consideration.

In re WORMALD. FRANK v. MUZEEN. (a.)

Married woman — Gift to married woman of life interest for her separate use without power of anticipation—Gift over on death or on her anticipating the income—Mortgage of her life interest—Forfeiture.

A married woman entitled to a life interest in a fund for her separate use without power of anticipation, with a gift over "on her anticipating the income," assigned her life interest by way of mortgage.

Held, that, as the assignment was wholly inoperative, she had not in fact anticipated her income, and therefore her life interest had not determined.

Originating summons.

This was a summons taken out by the sole surviving trustee of the will of J. Wormald to determine the question whether, in the events which had happened, a gift made by the testator of the income of his residuary estate to his sister, Mary Elizabeth Muzeen, had or had not determined.

The testator died on the 24th of March, 1874, having, by his will, dated three days before his death, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees on trust to pay an annuity of £300 a year to his wife for life, and subject thereto to pay the income of his residuary estate to his sister Mary Elizabeth Muzeen "for her separate use, free from the debts and control of any husband, without power of anticipation, and for and during the term of her natural life, and from and after her decease or on her anticipating" the income or any part thereof the residuary estate was to be held on trust for all her children equally as tenants in common. The widow died in July, 1881, and Mary Elizabeth Muzeen was at the testator's death and is at the present time the wife of Muzeen. There was only one child of the marriage. Mary Elizabeth Muzeen, by deed dated the 3rd of June, 1889, purported to assign her life interest by way of mortgage.

H. J. Wood, for the surviving trustee, the plaintiff, submitted to the court the question whether the life estate had determined.

Arnold White, for Mrs. Muzeen.—The alleged mortgage is merely an attempt to anticipate, it is not an anticipation, and there is, therefore, no forfeiture.

Dunham, for the child of the marriage.—The execution of the mortgage is a forfeiture of the life interest. Mrs. Muzeen, being a married woman, could not anticipate the income, the words "on her anticipating" must therefore mean on her attempting to anticipate, or they are wholly inoperative. By mortgaging her life interest she had attempted to anticipate the income, and her life interest had accordingly determined.

NORTH, J.—I cannot in this case adopt the view that the expression "on her anticipating," means "on her attempting to anticipate." The trust is to pay the income of this estate to Mrs. Muzeen "for her separate use, free from the debts and control of any husband, without power of anticipation, and for and during the term of her natural life, and from and after her decease or on her anticipating the income or any part thereof," there is a gift over. Now has she anticipated? No. She could not do so, because she was a married woman both at the time of the testator's death and at the time of the execution of the mortgage deed. It is said that to attempt to anticipate and to anticipate are the same thing. I am of opinion that this is not so. The testator's intention clearly was that his sister should have the income for her life, and if she should anticipate the fund should go to her child. She has, however, not done so, as the assignment was wholly inoperative and does not affect her life interest.

Practice—Costs—Payment into court—Plea of tender—Plea not stating that tender was before action—Taking out sum in satisfaction—Plaintiff's right to costs—Ord. 22, r. 7.

In answer to a claim for money lent, the defendants pleaded that the only sum due was £38, which they had tendered to the plaintiff and now brought into court in satisfaction of the whole claim—the plea of tender not stating the tender to have been made before action; and the plaintiff took out the sum in satisfaction of his claim.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to have his costs taxed, as there was a plea of tender on the record, which was not disposed of, and that it was not essential that the plea of tender should have stated that the tender was before action brought, if that fact could be inferred.

Appeal from an order of Field, J., at chambers.

The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants to recover a sum of £87 for money lent and for money received by the defendants on behalf of the plaintiff.

The defendants pleaded that the only sum due was a sum of £38 15s., which sum they had tendered to the plaintiff, who refused to accept it, and they now brought that sum into court in satisfaction of the whole claim. The plaintiff took out that sum, under ord. 22, r. 7, in satisfaction of his whole claim, and he gave the defendants notice accordingly.

The plaintiff then applied to a master to tax his costs in the action, but the master refused to tax the costs, on the ground that he had no authority to tax the costs, and that there was a plea of tender on the record which had not been disposed of.

On appeal Field, J., affirmed the order of the master.

The plaintiff appealed.

H. Lynn, for the plaintiff.—The action was at an end, and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to have his costs taxed and paid by the defendants. The plea of tender did not state that the tender was made before action, and cannot have the same effect as a plea of tender before action brought. There was an alternative plea of a payment into court in satisfaction: Wheeler v. United Telephone Co., 33 W. R. 295, 13 Q. B. D. 597.

W. Evans, for the defendants.—The plaintiff ought to have given notice of discontinuance instead of taking the money out in satisfaction. It is not essential that the plea of tender should state that the tender was made before action; that fact may be inferred.

DENMAN, J.—There is a distinction between cases relating to a payment into court with a mere denial of liability, and cases in which there is a plea of tender with a payment in satisfaction. In the former case the plaintiff might take out the money and proceed to tax; in the latter case, not so. If the defendants were right in their plea of tender the action should never have been brought, and no costs would have been incurred, so that, unless the plaintiff can disprove the plea of tender, it is only right he should have to pay the costs. It has always been held that in pleading a plea of tender it is not essential that the words "before action" should be inserted in the defence if that may be otherwise inferred.

Wills, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Ward v. Folkestone Waterworks Co. (a.)

Local government — Waterworks — Constant supply— Prevention of waste—Obligation of consumer to put down special apparatus—Breaking up of roads—Right of company to cut off supply—Folkestone Waterworks Acts, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. x.), ss. 13, 14, and 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. xxv.), ss. 5 (2), 6—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 43, 48, 51, 52.

By a local Waterworks Act passed in 1858, it was provided that "All persons supplied with water by the company shall provide proper ball or stop-cocks, or other necessary apparatus of approved construction, for regulating such supply," under the penalty of having their pipes cut off or the water cut off from their premises. By an Act passed in 1888, the company was compelled to afford a constant supply of water, and took power to attach to the water-pipe outside of each house a stop-valve of the screw-down kind, in order to prevent waste, subject to the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to breaking up of the streets for the laying of pipes. The company called upon an occupier to put down such stop-valve, and, on his making default, cut off his water supply.

Held, that the company was liable to be convicted for "refusing to furnish a supply of water to an occupier" under the provisions of section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and that a stop-valve to prevent waste outside of a house was not a "necessary apparatus for regulating the supply of water."

Case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 33.

The appellant was the occupier of a dwelling-house in the borough of Folkestone, and on the 13th of September, 1889, he was served by the respondents with a notice requiring him to provide and insert in his communication pipe under the pavement of the street a stop-valve of the screw-down kind within seven days after the receipt of the notice. The appellant was willing to comply with the notice, but was unable to obtain the consent of the corporation to his breaking up of the pavement.

On the 25th of September the respondents gave the appellant notice that if he did not at once comply with their demand his supply of water would be cut off, and on the same day the appellant tendered to the respondents the water rate then due, which the respondents refused to accept.

On the 26th of September, as the appellant had not complied with the demand, the respondents cut off the water supply from his house. The appellant thereupon summoned the respondents under section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, for unlawfully refusing to furnish him with a supply of water.

The respondents were bound by the Folkestone Waterworks Act, 1888, to furnish a constant supply of water, and the justices found as a fact that it was necessary, for the prevention of waste, that screw-down valves should be inserted in the communication pipes.

It was contended by the appellant that by section 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, he was compelled to obtain the consent of the corporation before attempting to comply with the notice, and he had been unable to obtain their consent, but that in any case the respondents had no power to insist upon his inserting a stop-valve in his communication pipe as a condition precedent to his obtaining a supply of water.

It was contended by the respondents that they had such power under the provisions contained in sections 13 and 14 of the Folkestone Waterworks Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. x.), which are as follows:—

Section 13.—"It shall be lawful for the company from time to time, for the purpose of preventing the waste or misuse of water, to prescribe the size, nature, and strength of the pipes, cocks, cisterns, and other apparatus to be hereafter altered or fixed, and to interdict any arrangements and the use of any pipes, cocks, cisterns, or other apparatus which may tend to such waste or misuse as aforesaid."

Section 14.—"All persons supplied with water by the company shall provide proper ball or stop-cocks or other necessary apparatus of approved construction for regulating such supply, and shall keep the same in good repair, so that the water may be properly drawn off and effectually prevented from running to waste, and in case any such person shall, after being required by the company, neglect to provide such ball or stop-cock or other necessary apparatus, or to keep the same in good repair, the company may cut off the pipes or turn off the water from the premises of such persons respectively, until such ball or stop-cocks or other necessary apparatus shall be provided or repaired as the case may require."

By the Folkestone Waterworks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. xxv.), s. 5, sub-section (2), the company was compelled to "afford for the domestic use of the inhabitants a sufficient supply of pure water constantly laid on"; and by section 6 of the same Act "The company may, outside of and at or near the point at which the communication-pipe for the conveyance into any premises of the water supplied by the company enters those premises, attach to that pipe a sound and suitable stop-valve of the screw-down kind . . . and every such valve shall be protected by a proper cover and guard-box, and the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to the breaking up of the streets for the laying of pipes, shall extend and apply to, and for the purpose of inserting, the said valve, cover, and guard-boxes."

The justices were of opinion that the respondents had power under their Act of 1858 to require the appellant to provide a stop-valve and guard-box, and to fix it in the street or pavement to prevent the waste of water, and that, upon his default, they had power, under section 14 of that Act, to cut off his supply of water, and that, upon the true construction of the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, the appellant had legally power to open the pavement for the purpose of fixing a stop-valve in spite of the corporation refusing its consent.

They accordingly dismissed the summons, and the question for the court was whether or not they were right in so doing.

Duke, for the appellant.—Sections 13 and 14 of 21 & 22 Vict. c. x., which empower the respondents to require all persons supplied with water to provide "proper ball or stop-cocks or other necessary apparatus for regulating such supply," do not apply to the case of a stop-valve of the screw-down kind, "the other apparatus" must be something ejusdem generis with ball or stop-cocks—that is to say, some apparatus to be used inside a house in connection with the cistern. The object of a screw-down valve in the street is to prevent the flow of water when the supply is not required, but that cannot be called an apparatus for "regulating the supply." Further, there is no statutory power in any occupier of a house to break up the pavement for the purpose of doing anything to the communication pipe which brings water into his house. It is clear, therefore, that whatever powers the company possessed they could not be exercised in the absence of consent by the corporation to the breaking up of the street.

G. Denman (Murphy, Q.C., with him), for the respondents.—The only limitation imposed upon the company in regard to "other apparatus" is that it should regulate the supply. It is found as a fact in this case that stop-valves are necessary for the prevention of waste, and they serve precisely the same purpose in the way of regulating supply, as ball and stop-cocks do, to the cistern. In East London Waterworks Co. v. Vestry of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green, 35 W. R. 37, 17 Q. B. D. 475, it was held that "covers or guard-boxes to protect stop-valves placed for the purpose of regulating the supply of water in the communication pipes" were works necessary to the undertaking within section 28 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. In regard to the power of the appellant to break up the pavement, that is provided for by section 52, which says that "any such owner or occupier may open or break up so much of any street as shall be between the pipe of the undertakers and his premises . . . for any such purpose," and such purpose must include the repairs and alterations necessary to a communication pipe which the occupier is expressly allowed to lay down by section 48.

Cave, J.—In this case the waterworks company claim the right to compel the consumer of water to put down a screw-down valve in the street in the pipe which connects his premises with the company's main, and it lies upon them to show, upon very clear and unmistakable language, that they have that right. It is said that that right is given to them by the Act of 1858. Now so far as section 13 of that Act is concerned I do not think it touches this case, for it does not give the company power to compel the consumer to put down any apparatus at all, it merely empowers them, in the event of his choosing to put down certain apparatus, to prescribe what the kind shall be and to prohibit him from putting down anything which is not of an approved description. Section 14 is more to the point, for it does give the company power to compel the consumer to adopt certain precautions to prevent waste. It says "All persons supplied with water by the company shall provide proper ball or stop-cocks." We all know what a ball or stop-cock is—it is an apparatus used in a cistern for the purpose of admitting water into the cistern when it is not full, and excluding the water when it is full. Then the section goes on "or other necessary apparatus of approved construction for regulating such supply . . . so that the water may be properly drawn off and effectually prevented from running to waste." The apparatus there spoken of must be something akin to a ball-cock, something, that is to say, which will prevent the water from running to waste consistently with its admission into the cistern as occasion may require. But the object of the screw-down valve which it is sought here to compel the consumer to put down, is not to regulate the supply in the same manner in which the ball-cock regulates it, but to shut it off altogether. It seems to me therefore clear that the company had not, under that section either, the right which they seek to establish.

But, further, at the time when the Act of 1858 was passed the company were compellable only to give an intermittent supply. They were not required to give a constant supply till 1888. And from the finding in the case that screw-down valves are necessary where there is a constant supply, we must assume that they were not necessary when the supply was only intermittent. When by the Act of 1888 the company came to be compelled to furnish a constant supply, it became necessary to consider what new protection they would require against waste, and what new powers might be necessary to enable them to give the constant supply with the least possible inconvenience and damage to themselves. They accordingly, by section 6, took power to themselves to insert these stop-valves in the communication pipes, without which power any interference by them with the communication pipes, which are the property of the consumers, would be a trespass. But nowhere in the Act is any express provision to be found enabling them to require the consumer to put down these stop-valves, or to pay for the expense of putting them down, and if it had been intended that they should have that power one would have expected an express provision to that effect. Moreover, the consumer has no statutory power to break open the street for any such purpose. It is to the company, and to the company alone, that power to do so is given under section 6.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the justices came to a wrong conclusion, and that they ought to have convicted the respondents. The case must be remitted back to them.

A. L. Smith, J.—I must protest against an attempt to construe an Act of Parliament by the light of legislation passed thirty years after its date. Under the Folkestone Waterworks Act, 1858, the only thing which the company could compel the consumer to do, in order to prevent their water from running to waste, was to provide a sufficient ball or stop-cock, or some other apparatus of the same kind, in connection with the cistern. Such a thing as a stop-down valve in the communication pipe was at that time wholly unnecessary, and its use was never contemplated by anyone. Then came the Act of 1888, by which the company were for the first time placed under the obligation of maintaining a constant supply. And the company then, wanting more protection for themselves than was afforded by the ball-cock, procured the insertion of section 6 in the Act. That section enables them to provide the additional security against waste afforded by the screw-down valve, but only to provide it at their own expense. The mere fact that the valve is to be inserted in the consumer's pipe does not show that the consumer is to pay for it. I can see nothing in that section compelling the consumer to put down or pay for these stop valves, and the provisions of the earlier Act cannot be enlarged to meet the altered condition of things brought about by the later Act. It seems to me, therefore, that the justices in this case have erred, and that the company, having unlawfully cut off the water, are liable to a penalty.

Case remitted to justices.

PAIN v. BOUGHTWOOD. (a.)

Adulteration of food — Alteration of article—Milk—Abstraction of fat from—Selling milk so altered—Scienter—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 9.

In a prosecution under the 9th section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling an article of food which has been so altered by abstraction of any part of it as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, it is not necessary to prove that the seller had knowledge of the alteration; but he may be convicted of an offence under the section, even though he had no knowledge of such alteration.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellant, an inspector of nuisances, summoned the respondent for having sold an "article of food, to wit, milk, in its altered state, without notice or making disclosure of the alteration, from which 28 per cent. of its original fat had been abstracted, so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, contrary to the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), and the Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30)."

At the hearing of the summons, it was proved that the appellant bought a pint of milk at the shop of the respondent, which was duly divided into three parts, one of which was sent for analysis to the public analyst. The certificate of the analyst stated that 28 per cent. of the fat had been abstracted, and as a result only 1·47 of fat remained. Except this certificate, no evidence was given that the milk was altered, and the defendant gave evidence that he had no knowledge of any such alteration, and his daughter, who sold the milk and managed the shop, also denied all knowledge of the alteration.

The magistrate held that, as the 9th section contemplated disclosure by the seller of any alteration in the article, it was necessary to prove knowledge of the alteration, and, there being no such proof, he dismissed the summons. The question for the opinion of the court was whether this decision was right in point of law.

Section 9 of the Act enacts that "no person shall, with the intent that the same may be sold in its altered state without notice, abstract from an article of food any part of it so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, and no person shall sell any article so altered without making disclosure of the alteration, under a penalty in each case not exceeding twenty pounds."

J. V. Austin, for the appellant.—The magistrate ought to have convicted the respondent of an offence under the 9th section, although the respondent did not know of the alteration in the milk. With regard to the 9th section of the Act, this point has never been settled. The only point is whether mens rea is necessary or not, for a conviction under the 9th section. The learned magistrate held that it was necessary, but I submit it is not necessary. Under sections 3 and 4 no person could be convicted without proof of knowledge. The learned magistrate thought that as the word "intent" was used in the one part of the section it applied to the whole section, and he thought it would be hard if the seller of an adulterated article were convicted, although he did not know of the adulteration; but section 25 protects the seller in such a case, as, by that section, he can protect himself by getting a written warranty from the person from whom he bought. The case of Betts v. Armistead, 36 W. R. 720, 20 Q. B. D. 771, a case under the 6th section of the Act, is conclusive in the present case. There it was held that an offence could be committed under that section though the seller did not know of the adulteration. There are some cases which are perfectly analogous to the present, as for example the case of Cundy v. Le Cocq, 32 W. R. 769, 13 Q. B. D. 207, where a licensed person was convicted of an offence, under the 13th section of the Licensing Act, 1872, of supplying drink to an intoxicated person, although he did not know of the condition of the person supplied. The case of Lane v. Collins, 33 W. R. 365, 14 Q. B. D. 193, though at first sight it appears to be against me, is really in my favour. The earlier Act, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 84, s. 1, contained the words "to the knowledge of such person"; these words are omitted in the later Act, and that shows, that knowledge of the alteration is not necessary to constitute the offence. The learned magistrate was wrong in holding that mens rea was necessary to constitute the offence.

The respondent did not appear.

GRANTHAM, J.—I have no doubt what our judgment ought to be; our judgment ought to be for the appellant.

In 1875 the Legislature passed an Act of Parliament, repealing all the former Acts, and incorporating their provisions in one Act. Now the Legislature dealt first of all with the question of the adulteration of food and drugs, by mixing with them injurious ingredients; these provisions are contained in sections 3 and 4; then there is a special proviso in section 5 which shows that a person shall not be convicted under sections 3 and 4, if he shows that he did not know that the article was adulterated, and that he could not with reasonable diligence have obtained that knowledge. Then came section 6, which prohibited the sale of articles of food and drugs not of the nature, substance, or quality demanded by the purchaser, and a person cannot be convicted under that section if he comes within the exemptions there specified. That being so, the Legislature went on to enact section 9 without any such exemptions. Now that section is evidently aimed against two classes of persons, against the person who abstracts something from an article of food so as to affect injuriously its quality, and against the person who ultimately sells the article so altered. If it had not been so, the provision of the section would have been entirely useless, so that the section not only provided that the person should be liable who injuriously affected the quality of an article by abstracting something from it, but it also provided that no person should sell the article so altered. A protection is given by section 25, which gives a defendant a power of exonerating himself by showing that he bought the article in the same state in which it was sold, and by getting a warranty to that effect from the person from whom he bought, and if he does not do this, the Legislature thinks he has made himself a party to the fraud. There is thus every provision in the Act to enable an honest dealer to protect himself, as, if he gets this warranty, he can use it as a defence, and if he does not get it, he must be made personally liable.

I think, therefore, this appeal must be allowed.

CHARLES, J.—In my view this case is concluded by the case of Betts v. Armistead. It seems to me that the case of Core v. James, 20 W. R. 201, L. R. 7 Q. B. 135, points in the direction of mens rea being necessary in cases of this kind, but I do not feel myself at liberty to follow the case of Core v. James, as that case was cited to the court in Betts v. Armistead, and was not followed. That being so, Betts v. Armistead, is an authority for saying that in a case of this kind mens rea is not necessary. I feel bound to follow that decision, and I think

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.) Feb. 12; March 21.

In re Jones. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Discharge — "Conduct and affairs" of bankrupt—Conditional order—Consent to judgment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28—Practice.

In 1885 judgment for £500 was recovered against the bankrupt in an action for breach of promise of marriage. In 1886 the bankrupt's father died, leaving considerable property to all his children except the bankrupt. An offer of £250 in satisfaction of the judgment having been refused by the plaintiff in the action, the bankrupt, in April, 1889, filed his own petition, on which a receiving order was made, the only creditor being the plaintiff in the breach of promise action, who proved for £596. The discharge of the bankrupt was granted by the county court judge, subject to the condition that he should consent to judgment being entered against him for £250.

Held, that the county court judge was justified in taking into consideration the affairs of the bankrupt, and that, looking at the offer made previous to the presentation of the petition, and at the circumstances and position of the bankrupt, the order requiring him to consent to judgment was a right order.

The "conduct" of the bankrupt which the court is required, by section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to take into consideration on the hearing of an application for discharge is not confined to the instances of misconduct specified in sub-section (3) of that section, or in section 24. (Ex parte The Board of Trade, In re Betts and Block, 35 W. R. 530, 19 Q. B. D. 39, and The Board of Trade v. Block, 37 W. R. 259, 13 App. Cas. 570, distinguished.) But the conduct referred to must be conduct in some way connected with or arising out of the bankruptcy.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Lloyd in the county court at Wrexham, granting the bankrupt his discharge only on condition that he should consent to judgment being entered against him under section 28, sub-section (6), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, for the sum of £250.

The case raised a question with reference to the species of conduct which the court is entitled to take into consideration on application by a bankrupt for his discharge.

In July, 1885, the bankrupt was defendant in an action for breach of promise of marriage, in which the plaintiff recovered judgment for £500. In January, 1886, the bankrupt's father died, leaving personalty valued for probate duty at £2,315, and also real property worth £1,300 or £1,400. By his will, made five days before his death, all his children took substantial benefits except the bankrupt, to whom a legacy of £10 only, payable on his mother's death, was left. On April 11, 1889, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt on his own petition. The assets were practically nil, and the only creditor was the plaintiff in the breach of promise action, who proved for £596, made up of damages, costs, and interest on the judgment debt. Shortly before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, the bankrupt's family offered the plaintiff £250 in satisfaction of her judgment, which, however, was refused.

Upon these facts the county court judge gave the bankrupt an order of discharge subject to his consenting to a judgment for £250 being entered up against him, such judgment to be deemed to be satisfied if the bankrupt paid the official receiver £200 within a month.

The bankrupt appealed.

E. Cooper Willis, Q.C., and F. C. Willis, for the bankrupt.—The county court judge had no power to impose any condition whatever. The bankrupt had committed no offence under either section 28 or section 24, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and by the decision in In re Betts and Block, Ex parte the Board of Trade (35 W. R. 530, 19 Q. B. D. 39) in the Court of Appeal, and The Board of Trade v. Block (37 W. R. 259, 13 App. Cas. 570) in the House of Lords; the bankrupt was entitled to an absolute order of discharge. Section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is a quasi-penal section, and must be read strictly. A bankrupt is entitled to an unconditional discharge if he has not committed any offence under section 28, or section 24. Even if the county court judge had power to make this order he ought not to have done so. Such a condition ought not to be imposed unless there is some likelihood of the bankrupt acquiring property afterwards, and that is not the case here.

They also referred to Ex parte Shackleton, In re Shackleton, ante, p. 288; Ex parte Arnaud, In re Bullen, 36 W. R. 836; In re Brockelbank, Ex parte Dunn, 37 W. R. 537.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The House of Lords in Board of Trade v. Block did not lay down the narrow rule on which the appellant relies. The argument in that case was limited to the fact whether a refusal to submit to medical examination was conduct under section 24 which could be taken into account on an application for discharge. In In re Cook, Ex parte Cook, 6 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 224, this court took into consideration the general conduct of the debtor. On the other point, the family of the bankrupt was a well-to-do family, and, assuming that the court had power to make it, the order was a lenient one.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21.—Lawrance, J., read the judgment of Cave, J., with which A. L. Smith, J., concurred, which, after stating the facts as above set out, proceeded as follows:—

For the appellant it is contended that the learned judge had no power to take the above facts and circumstances into consideration, and ought to have granted an unconditional order of discharge. Section 28, sub-section (2), of the Act of 1883 provides that "On the hearing of the application (for a discharge) the court shall take into consideration a report of the official receiver as to the bankrupt's conduct and affairs, and may grant or refuse an absolute order of discharge or suspend the operation of the order for a specified time, or grant an order of discharge subject to any conditions with respect to any earnings or income which may afterwards become due to the bankrupt or with respect to his after-acquired property; provided that the court shall refuse the discharge in all cases where the bankrupt has committed any misdemeanour under this Act or Part II.

of the Debtors Act, 1869, or any amendment thereof, and shall, on proof of any of the facts hereinafter mentioned, either refuse the order or suspend the operation of the order for a specified time or grant an order of discharge subject to such conditions as aforesaid." By sub-section (6) "the court may, as one of the conditions referred to in this section, require the bankrupt to consent to judgment being entered against him by the official receiver or trustee for any balance of the debts provable under the bankruptcy which is not satisfied at the date of his discharge; but in such case execution shall not be issued on the judgment without leave of the court, which leave may be given on proof that the bankrupt has since his discharge acquired property or income available for payment of his debts." Now, looking at this section according to its natural grammatical meaning, it seems clear that the court is to take into consideration the bankrupt's conduct and affairs, and after such consideration may, in the exercise of a judicial discretion, grant, refuse, or suspend the order of discharge or grant it subject to conditions. Then comes a proviso which in certain cases takes away this discretion and compels the judge to refuse or to modify the order.

According to its natural and grammatical construction, the proviso does not cover the whole of the ground taken up by the first part of the section, and still leaves room in cases not covered by the proviso for the exercise of the discretion of the judge. What, then, is to be understood by the words "conduct and affairs"? We were invited by the appellant to hold that the conduct which can be considered by the judge is limited to the species of conduct referred to in sub-section (3), and that no conduct outside that sub-section and section 24, can be looked at. In support of this contention reliance was placed on Block's case. In that case the debtor, after his bankruptcy, had refused to comply with the request of the trustee that he should be medically examined, in order that an insurance might be effected on his life with the view of selling a reversionary interest he possessed to the best advantage. It is obvious that, unless a duty to comply with such a request is somewhere imposed on the bankrupt, a refusal to submit to medical examination is not misconduct, and, therefore, that it was necessary to find something in the Bankruptcy Act from which it could be inferred that it was the duty of the bankrupt to submit to such an examination. That case turns entirely on the question whether there is or is not such a duty to be inferred, and it was held, both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, that no such duty is imposed on the debtor, and, that being so, such refusal was not misconduct within the meaning of section 28, and consequently not conduct which the judge would consider on the application for a discharge.

Our attention was, however, particularly called to certain dicta in that case which deserve our respectful consideration. In the Court of Appeal, Lord Esher, M.R., remarked that the conduct which is to be taken into account under section 28 in determining whether the bankrupt should be discharged, if it be not one of the matters specified in that section, must be something described in section 24. The observations of Lopes, L.J., in the same case were also urged upon us. His lordship says:—"In my opinion the word conduct in section 28 does not include what I will call general misconduct. For instance, it could not, I imagine, he said, to include immoral conduct, however culpable or however unreasonable; nor, again, in my opinion, would it include a breach of an obligation not connected with the bankruptcy, such, for instance, as a breach of promise of marriage, however dishonourable and however unreasonable the conduct of the bankrupt in that respect might be." In the House of Lords Lord Macnaghten is reported to have said: "The question is, Was such a refusal conduct which ought to have been taken into consideration when the bankrupt applied for his order of discharge? That depends on sections 24 and 28 of the Act. The case does not fall within any of the cases specified in section 28. The appellants are, therefore, driven to rely on section 24." The argument founded on these dicta was, that they established the position, that the only conduct of the bankrupt which could be taken into consideration was that specifically described in sub-section (3) of section 28. Now, in the first place, this argument gives no meaning to the word "affairs" in section 28, sub-section (2). It has been pointed out by Lindley, L.J., in Ex parte Arnaud, In re Bullen, that the condition which may be imposed under sub-section (6) is not to be imposed as a general punishment for misconduct. His lordship there says:—"There is no evidence that the man (the bankrupt) will ever have any after-acquired property, and, under these circumstances, I think primâ facie one ought not to tie a man up with such a judgment (under sub-section (6)). A man ought not to be placed in such a position unless something is likely to be gained by it." In these observations, if I may respectfully say so, I entirely concur, and in the case of Ex parte Shackleton, In re Shackleton, I endeavoured to express the same idea.

But the conclusion I draw from the use of the word "affairs" in section 28, and from this particular condition in sub-section (6), is, that it was not the intention of the Legislature that a man who was not able to pay his debts at a given time, but who had reasonable expectations of acquiring property afterwards, should take advantage of the Act to get rid of his debts on payment of a small dividend, or perhaps none at all, and, by getting an unconditional discharge, put himself into a position to enjoy without molestation from his creditors that property which he had every reason to believe would shortly devolve upon him. Let me take the very common case of a man who has reason for thinking that he will take large pecuniary benefits under the will of his father, or an uncle, or some other wealthy relative. Such expectations are very naturally shared by those who are acquainted with his position, and tradesmen and others are ready to give such a man credit in the expectation of being paid when these expectations are realized. If the contention of the appellant is correct, such a man might, after he had enjoyed the benefit of this credit, and when all his creditors were content to wait until these expectations were realized, file his petition in the Bankruptcy Court, and, in the absence of fraud, demand his discharge without paying his creditors any dividend, thus leaving himself free to enjoy the benefits of his relative's generosity without spending a sixpence with those who had trusted him in the expectation of being paid out of this fund. That such a state of things could be brought about without any actual fraud on the part of the expectant heir is obvious to anyone with the least knowledge of the world and of the way in which credit is given to persons of that class. Take, again, a case such as that of In re Clarkson, Ex parte Allestree, where, on a consideration of the bankrupt's affairs, this court modified the order of discharge in the manner pointed out by sub-section (6). It was, indeed, suggested there that the bankrupt had brought himself within sub-section (3) because he had pleaded a defence to an action for breach of promise of marriage, which defence he had afterwards withdrawn; but, assuming that the plaintiff in an action of breach of promise of marriage is a creditor within sub-section 3 (e), the expense the plaintiff was put to by the pleading a defence which was afterwards withdrawn could be but small, and, substantially, the result would have been the same if the defendant had let judgment go against him by default.

In my judgment, therefore, the learned judge was justified in taking into consideration the affairs of the bankrupt, and if on such consideration he came to the conclusion that the bankrupt would probably come into possession of property in the future, and had presented his petition in order that he might get rid of this creditor first, and enjoy his subsequently acquired property without having to pay any portion of this debt, it was within his power to make the order which he has done. In my opinion, looking at the offer to pay £250 which was made shortly before the petition was presented, and to the circumstances and position of the bankrupt, the judge was justified in coming to that conclusion, and I have very little doubt that the £250 will ultimately be paid.

These considerations are sufficient to dispose of this appeal, but I should like to add a few words with reference to the dicta in Block's case, above cited, because in some quarters they have been taken as amounting to a decision that the "conduct" referred to in section 28 must be confined to the instances of misconduct specified in sub-section (3) or in section 24. Now the subject of complaint in Block's case was that the bankrupt refused to submit to a medical examination which the trustee desired him to submit to in order that the trustee might insure the bankrupt's life. This was conduct of a negative character, and in order to establish that such a refusal is misconduct, it is necessary to show that the bankrupt is by law required to do the thing which he has refused to do. The only sections which were referred to for this purpose were sections 24 and 28. Section 28, sub-section (2), refers to particular kinds of misconduct enumerated in sub-section (3). Sub-section (7) prescribes the conduct of the bankrupt after his discharge. Section 24 imposes certain duties on the bankrupt with reference to giving information to the trustee and creditors, and aiding in the realization of his property, and the distribution of the proceeds among the creditors. According to the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal and of the House of Lords respectively, neither of these sections required the bankrupt to submit to a medical examination, and therefore he was not guilty of any misconduct within section 28. This view of the subject amply explains all that was said by Lord Macnaghten, and leaves only the dicta of the Master of the Rolls and Lopes, L.J., to be dealt with. The Legislature has nowhere expressly defined what is the "conduct" which is to be considered under section 28, sub-section (2). To my mind, it is quite impossible to hold that the proviso in that sub-section is co-extensive with the first part of the sub-section, for if that were so, and if no conduct could be considered except such as is specified in sub-section (3), it would necessarily follow that misconduct coming within section 24 could not be considered, nor yet conduct coming within section 29, which, however, by the express language of the Act is to be considered. There is, therefore, necessarily conduct to be considered other than that specified in sub-section (3), and it is conduct which the Legislature has considered may be dealt with by a lighter punishment than the conduct specified in sub-section (3), for the Legislature has invested the judge with more discretion with regard to it. Of course, the word "conduct" must have some limitation. It cannot apply to the man's behaviour from the time he became responsible for his actions down to the day of the hearing. As was held in the case of In re Brockelbank, Ex parte Dunn, the conduct referred to must be conduct connected with, or arising out of, the bankruptcy. So far as I can judge, that is all Lopes, L.J., meant to say in that part of his judgment in Block's case which has been cited above. Of what nature is the conduct specifically referred to in sub-section (3). It is conduct of various kinds connected with the bankruptcy, as, for instance, in the case of a trader neglecting to keep proper books, or continuing to trade after he knew himself to be insolvent, or in the case of any bankrupt contracting a debt without reasonable prospect of payment, bringing on the bankruptcy by blamable speculation or extravagance, putting a creditor to expense by a frivolous or vexatious defence to an action, undue preference, former bankruptcy, fraud, or fraudulent breach of trust.

It is difficult to reduce these kinds of conduct to any general head. They are all connected with the bankruptcy under investigation except (g), which refers to a previous bankruptcy or arrangement with creditors. They are all acts of commission except (a), the omission to keep proper books of account. Let us suppose the bankrupt has been guilty of conduct analogous to that referred to in sub-section (3), and injurious to his creditors in the same kind of way, is he, nevertheless, to be entitled as a matter of right to an absolute order of discharge? Suppose it were proved that the bankrupt had caused his clerks to keep the books required by clause (a), but had neglected to look at them, and therefore had continued to trade after he was insolvent without knowing himself to be so; or suppose that he had not brought on, but had contributed to, the bankruptcy by rash and hazardous speculation or unjustifiable extravagance in living; or had brought on his bankruptcy by gambling or by culpable neglect of his business; or that he had put any one of his creditors to unnecessary expense by a frivolous or vexatious action or counter-claim against him; or that he had dissipated his assets by making payments which were undue preferences within section 48 but not within sub-section (3) (f), which substitutes a different starting point for the three months to run from, or which would be undue preferences if the petition had been presented three days earlier; or, to take a case not so cognate to the cases in section 28 as those already given, suppose that the bankrupt's assets were insufficient to pay any dividend, or that there had been a very large loss or disappearance of assets shortly before the bankruptcy which the bankrupt had failed to account for satisfactorily; surely it cannot be in all these cases the bankrupt is entitled to insist upon an unconditional and immediate discharge as soon as his public examination is concluded.

None of these considerations were before the Court of Appeal in Block's case. The court was not dealing with blameworthy acts of commission which had brought on the bankruptcy, or had caused any creditor to trust the bankrupt, or which had squandered the assets before they were handed over to the trustee. It was dealing with a refusal to do an act after all the assets had been handed over to the trustee, and which, in the opinion of the majority of the court, was a refusal to do something which had no relation to his property or to the distribution of it. And therefore it was necessary to find, either in section 28 or section 24, an express or implied prohibition of such conduct, or, at all events, of conduct of an analogous nature, and, as the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords held, no such express or implied prohibition is to be found. I need hardly say that I accept unhesitatingly the decision of the House of Lords in Block's case, which, indeed, affirms, in effect, a decision of my own, but I do not understand the dicta referred to, to have the wide import which has been attributed to them, because I believe that the Master of the Rolls and Lopes, L.J., had before them very different considerations from those I have been discussing above.

Ex parte The Trustee.
In re Ridgways. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Compromise by trustee of claim against bankrupt's estate—Approval of committee of inspection—Rejection by general body of creditors—Practice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 57, 89.

A compromise agreed upon by the trustee in respect of a claim made against the bankrupt's estate was approved by the committee of inspection, but, at a subsequent general meeting of the creditors, a resolution was passed refusing to accept the compromise. The trustee applied to the court for leave to carry out the compromise, notwithstanding this resolution.

Held, that, the resolution of the creditors having been passed by them bonâ fide, and with a view to their own interests, the compromise ought to be abandoned.

Application by the trustee in the bankruptcy for leave to carry out a compromise.

In February, 1885, a receiving order was made against the debtors, A. and T. G. Ridgway, the statement of affairs showing secured creditors to the extent of £40,000, holding mortgages over freehold and leasehold properties, which it was then estimated would realize something like £33,000 in excess of the sum advanced upon them, and an arrangement was entered into between Mr. Price, who was at first appointed trustee of the bankrupt's estate, and Messrs. Robinson & Fisher, a firm of auctioneers, whereby the latter agreed to advance a sum of £42,000 in order to pay off the secured creditors with interest, taking, as they alleged, as security a charge upon the whole property.

Mr. Price subsequently died, the present applicant, Mr. Hurlbatt, being appointed trustee in his place, and, the mortgaged properties not proving to be so valuable as was anticipated, a dispute arose as to the nature of the security held by Messrs. Robinson & Fisher, in consequence of which notice of motion was, in January, 1889, served by them upon the trustee.

After due consideration of the matter, which was a very complicated one, the trustee came to the conclusion that the claim was one with regard to which it would be expedient to effect a compromise in order to avoid litigation, and, terms having been arranged, they were submitted to the committee of inspection, who approved them by a majority of three to two. At a subsequent general meeting of the creditors, however, a resolution rejecting the compromise was passed.

Application was now made to the court by the trustee for leave to carry out the compromise notwithstanding this resolution of the creditors.

Herbert Reed, for the trustee.—The trustee is clearly of opinion that the terms of compromise which have been agreed upon are the best thing for the creditors and the estate, and those terms were approved by the committee of inspection notwithstanding strong opposition raised by General Kaye and Mr. Smyth, two members of the committee. The subsequent resolution of the creditors rejecting the compromise was obtained by means of proxies, which were sent to General Kaye at his request. The court has full power to overrule that resolution if it thinks fit, by the decision in Ex parte Cocks, In re Poole, 31 W. R. 105, 21 Ch. D. 397. The trustee has no personal interest in the matter, his only wish being to do what is best for the estate. The notice of motion by Messrs. Robinson & Fisher asks, among other things, for an injunction to prevent a dividend being paid, and so the whole proceedings are tied up. The broad question in dispute is whether Messrs. Robinson & Fisher only stand in the room of the original mortgagees, or whether they have, as they allege, a right of consolidation and a covering charge on the assets in case of any deficiency. The question is very complicated, and the trustee is of opinion that litigation ought to be avoided.

Whinney, for Messrs. Robinson & Fisher, did not address the court.

Sidney Woolf, for the objecting creditors.—General Kaye and Mr. Smyth were not committeemen wishing to cause a disturbance. They refused to agree to the proposed compromise because they are of opinion that by it Messrs. Robinson & Fisher get more than they are entitled to, and are also released from all liability in respect of any negligence in dealing with the estate. General Kaye alleges that there was negligence in the sale of certain farms, and he objects to any release from liability being given. Section 89 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that the trustee shall, in the administration of a bankrupt's property, have regard to any directions that may be given by resolution of the creditors at any general meeting, or by the committee of inspection, and any directions so given by the creditors at any general meeting shall, in case of conflict, be deemed to override any directions given by the committee of inspection. The case of Ex parte Cocks, In re Poole, is distinguishable. The creditors there were not acting bonâ fide and for the best. It must be made out, before the court will interfere, that the creditors have in some manner failed in the duties imposed upon them.

Cave, J.—I am of opinion that the leave applied for by the trustee should not be granted. According to the provisions of the statute, the trustee has power, with the permission of the committee of inspection, to make a compromise, but section 89 provides that the trustee shall, in his administration of the property of the bankrupt, have regard to any directions that may be given by resolution of the creditors, and any directions so given by the creditors at any general meeting shall, in case of conflict, be deemed to override any directions given by the committee of inspection. Then by subsection (3) of section 89 the trustee may apply to the court for directions in relation to any particular matter arising under the bankruptcy.

Now in this case the compromise which the trustee proposes to enter into has received the sanction of the committee of inspection, but on the matter being submitted to a general meeting of the creditors the majority of those were opposed to this compromise, and under these circumstances the trustee comes and asks me, notwithstanding the resolution of the creditors, to let him enter into this compromise.

No doubt the court has power to entertain this question, but by what considerations it should be guided in dealing with such an application is not so plain. In the case referred to, the court did disregard the resolution of the general meeting of creditors, and it disregarded that resolution on the ground that it was passed to favour the debtors, and not in the interest of the creditors themselves. In this case it is admitted that no improper motive can be imputed to these creditors who have refused the compromise, but it is said that I ought to overrule their decision on the ground that the compromise is so manifestly beneficial to the estate that the wishes of the majority ought to give way to the wishes of the minority. Now, if I should come to that conclusion, I should really come to the conclusion that the creditors had not acted bonâ fide when it is in fact admitted that they did act so. They are men of business, and understand the business with which they are dealing, and it is a strong thing to ask me to overrule their decision as to the mode in which their business shall be carried on when it is admitted that that decision has been arrived at in a bonâ fide manner. I do not say that where it could be shown that the decision was clearly wrong—and it is almost impossible to see how such a decision could be arrived at if everything were bonâ fide—the court would not interfere. But the resolution here is clearly not that. There is perhaps something to be said on both sides. I give the trustee the credit of believing that the compromise he wishes to carry out is the best thing for the creditors. On the other hand, I must give the credit to the creditors of believing that their opinion is the right one. That being so, and having no ground for believing that the creditors had not honestly and bonâ fide striven to understand the matter, and had their own interests in view, I should be doing wrong if I were to overrule their own decision on their own matter, on the ground that the result which they anticipate is not likely to be realized, and may not prove so beneficial as they think it will. I am of opinion, therefore, that the compromise ought to be abandoned.

Court of Appeal.

From Lancaster Palatine Ct. of Chan. } March 7, 8, 10.

CLEGG v. HANDS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease of public-house by brewer—Restrictive covenant—Covenant not to sell beer other than beer purchased from lessor—Lessor defined to include assigns—Sale of brewery by lessor—Conveyance by lessor of reversion in the demised premises to purchaser of brewery, with the benefit of the restrictive covenant—Covenant running with land—Construction of covenant in connection with clause defining "lessor"—Benefit and burden of covenant.

By a lease made between C. & W. (thereinafter called "the lessors," "including in such term each of them, their, each, and every of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns") of the one part, and H. of the other part, a public-house was demised to H. for a term of years, and he covenanted with the lessors not to take, sell, or deal in upon the demised premises any beer other than beer purchased from the lessors or from either of them, either alone or jointly with any other person or persons who might thereafter become a partner or partners with them or either of them, provided they or he should at such time deal in or vend such liquors as aforesaid, and should be willing to supply the same to the said lessee of good quality and at the fair current market price thereof. At the date of the lease C. & W. carried on business as brewers at the A. Brewery, and they were also vendors of beers generally, but they subsequently sold the A. Brewery, with their plant, business, and goodwill, to N. They also conveyed their reversion in the lease of the public-house to him, with the benefit of the covenants in the lease, and expressly assigned to him the benefit of the aforesaid covenant; and, about the same time, or soon afterwards, ceased to carry on business and dissolved partnership. N. did not use the A. Brewery as a brewery, but carried on his brewing business at his adjacent M. Brewery. H. having declined to take his beer from N., the latter brought an action in his own name and those of C. & W. for an injunction in the terms of the covenant to restrain H. from taking or selling beer other than such as should have been purchased from N., either directly or through C. & W.

Held, (1) that, upon the true construction of the covenant taken in connection with the clause in the lease defining "lessors," it was a covenant which included C. and W.'s assigns of the reversion in the demised premises, and was, moreover, not confined to such of their assigns as should continue to carry on the business of brewers at the A. Brewery, and that it was, therefore, not a mere personal covenant, or incapable of being assigned; (2) that the covenant was one which did, in fact, touch or concern the demised premises, and that the benefit of it would accordingly run at law with the reversion; but (3) that, even if the covenant were one the benefit of which would not at law run with the reversion of the demised premises, the fact of the assignment to N. of the brewery business (which must have included the goodwill), and the fact of the benefit of the covenant having been also expressly assigned to N. with the reversion of the demised premises, entitled him in equity to sue upon the covenant; and (4) that, that being so, and H. having presumably got the premises at a lower rent in consideration of his entering into the covenant, and it being in effect restrictive, and not affirmative, the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774, applied, and an injunction ought to be granted.

Appeal from Bristowe, V.C., Lancaster Palatine Court.

The plaintiffs, Messrs. Clegg & Wright, were brewers and vendors of ale and stout, carrying on business at the Alton Brewery, Liverpool.

By a lease dated the 19th of November, 1886, and expressed to be made between James Clegg and Peter Wright (thereinafter called "the lessors," "including in such term each of them, their, each, and every of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns"), of the one part, and Benjamin Hands, the defendant (thereinafter called "the lessee," "including in such term his executors, administrators, and permitted assigns"), of the other part), Messrs. Clegg & Wright demised to Hands a public-house for a term of nine years and a half. Among other covenants by the lessee the lease contained the following:—"The said lessee will not at any time during the continuance of this demise buy, receive, sell, or dispose of, either directly or indirectly, or permit to be bought, received, sold, or disposed of, either directly or indirectly, in, upon, out of, or about the said demised premises, or any part thereof, any ales or stout (other than best stout) other than such as shall have been bonâ fide purchased of the said lessors, or from them, or either of them, either alone or jointly with any other person or persons who may hereafter become a partner or partners with them, or either of them, provided they or he shall at such time deal in or vend such liquors as aforesaid, and shall be willing to supply the same to the said lessee of good quality and at the fair current market price thereof."

In July, 1889, Clegg & Wright agreed to sell their brewery, plant, business, and goodwill to the plaintiff Cain, who carried on business as a brewer at an adjacent brewery, known as the "Mersey Brewery," and was also a vendor of beer not of his own brewing. The purchase having been completed on the 2nd of October, 1889, Clegg & Wright dissolved partnership, and ceased to carry on business. They then conveyed their reversion in the lease of the public-house to Cain, with the benefit of the rent and covenants reserved and contained in the said lease to Hands, and the benefit of the aforesaid restrictive covenant was expressly assigned to Cain. The latter did not use the Alton Brewery premises for the purposes of a brewery, but they were used for other purposes. Hands having declined, under the above circumstances, to take beer from the plaintiff Cain, the latter brought this action in the Lancaster Palatine Court in his own name and the names of Clegg & Wright (with their concurrence) for an injunction to restrain Hands from selling beer other than such as should have been bonâ fide purchased of the plaintiff Cain, either directly or through Clegg & Wright.

Bristowe, V.C., granted the injunction.

The defendant appealed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., Mattinson, and McConkey, for the appellant.—The benefit of this covenant does not run with the reversion in favour of the assignee. The Alton Brewery has been shut up, and the appellant considers that his business would be injured by taking Mr. Cain's ales. The true construction of the covenant is that the lessee was to take his ales from the lessors personally as long as they or either of them continued to brew, either alone or jointly with any partner or partners, not from anybody who might become an assignee of the brewery and public-house, and who, perhaps, might not even be a brewer. The case is governed by Doe d. Calvert v. Reid, 10 B. & C. 849, the facts of which case were on all fours with those here, though we have really a stronger case. On any other construction the covenant will not run. In Vyvyan v. Arthur, 1 B. & C. 410, it was held that a covenant to grind at the lessor's mill all corn grown on the demised premises would only run as long as the ownership of the mill and the demised premises remained in the same person. [COTTON, L.J.—Is not this a reservation in the nature of rent? You hold under this lease? LINDLEY, L.J.—The rent of a "tied" house is usually lower than that of a free house.] No doubt, in one sense, it is a reservation. [COTTON, L.J.—Then do these questions as to covenants running arise?] An assignee cannot sue upon every covenant. This covenant would not run at all on a mere assignment of the reversion without the brewery. In Spencer's case, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., at p. 72, the question whether a covenant runs with the land is put on exactly the same footing as whether it runs with the reversion. A mere right to receive money from a public-house cannot run with land. To uphold this decision would be going far beyond any previous case, and would be going against what are at least dicta of judges specially conversant with this branch of law. The definition of "lessors" at the commencement of the lease is cut down by the covenant, which limits it, for the purpose of the covenant, to future partners of Clegg & Wright, or either of them. A particular statement controls a general statement. If neither Clegg & Wright nor Cain can sue separately, they cannot do so any more by joining together. Even assuming the benefit of the covenant would run, on the assignment of the reversion, with the brewery—that is, as part of the business—it cannot run where the brewery is divorced from the reversion, and where the covenant is, therefore, merely collateral, and does not touch or concern the land: Spencer's case. In Lybbe v. Hart, 29 Ch. D. 8, at p. 19, 33 W. R. Dig. 26, Baggallay, L.J., expressed an opinion that a covenant to "feed" the hay on the farm did not run with the land. Section 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, has not done away with the whole doctrine as to covenants running with the land contained in Spencer's case. The judge below seems to have confused the equitable doctrine of notice to an assign of the lessee with the question of covenants running with the reversion, as here, and to have misapplied the doctrine of the benefit going with the burden.

They also referred to Mayor of Congleton v. Pattison, 10 East, 130; Keppell v. Bailey, 2 Myl. & K. 517; Anon, Godbolt, 120; Purfrey's case, Moore, 243; Sampson v. Easterby, 9 B. & C. 595; Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and J. Rutherford, for the respondents.—This case really turns on the construction of the lease. The covenant is not merely to take beer brewed by Clegg & Wright. The definition of "lessors" is absolute, and includes assigns wherever it occurs. The provision as to partners in the covenant itself was intended to meet a case not met by the definition clause. There is no reference to beer brewed at any particular brewery. We are assignees of the goodwill of the brewing business, the business itself, the brewery premises, and the reversion of the lease of the public-house, and we are entitled to the benefit of this covenant, which was expressly assigned to us. In Doe v. Reid the brewery of the plaintiffs was two miles from that of the original covenantees, and the covenant was to take beer of the covenantees or their "successors in their said trade." [As to the question of covenants running, they referred to Vyvyan v. Arthur and Hooper v. Clark, 15 W. R. 347, L. R. 2 Q. B. 200.] Section 10 of the Conveyancing Act does away with the doctrine in Spencer's case. But we have not here to consider whether the covenant runs with the land, because we have the covenantees themselves, as well as their assignee, as plaintiffs. In Renals v. Cowlishaw, 26 W. R. 754, 28 W. R. 9, 9 Ch. D. 125, 11 Ch. D. 866, Hall, V.C., decided on the ground that the plaintiffs bought without notice of the covenant, and, therefore, had no right to the benefit of it. In Spicer v. Martin, 37 W. R. 689, 14 App. Cas. 12, Lord Macnaghten adopted the judgment of Hall, V.C. The appellant is in possession of the property under the deed containing the restrictive covenant, and is, therefore, bound by it: Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774; Luker v. Dennis, 26 W. R. 167, 7 Ch. D. 227. The right must either have passed to Cain or be remaining in the covenantees, who are co-plaintiffs, so that in either case we are entitled to succeed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., in reply.—It is to be implied from the context and subject-matter that the assigns were to be brewers. This is like a covenant to take wine from a particular wine merchant. Calvert v. Reid cannot be distinguished from this case. Tulk v. Moxhay does not apply, this being really an affirmative covenant to take beer, and not a negative one: Haywood v. Brunswick, &c., Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403; Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham, 33 W. R. 807, 29 Ch. D. 750. [COTTON, L.J.—In that case the covenant was not one to which Tulk v. Moxhay would apply.] Tulk v. Moxhay was a case of burden running, not benefit, as here. The judge below held that Cain could not enlarge his rights by joining Clegg & Wright as co-plaintiffs.

He also referred to Keates v. Lyon, 17 W. R. 238, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 218; Tatem v. Chaplin, 2 H. Blacks. 133; Hooper v. Clark; and Robson v. Drummond, 2 B. & Ald. 303.

COTTON, L.J.—This is a question involving several points, but on the whole it has been very fully and ably argued, and we think we had better at once give the judgment at which we have arrived.

The first question arises in this way. An injunction has been granted to restrain the defendant from buying beer contrary to the covenant in his lease, and the question raised is, therefore, what is the true construction of the covenant. I will take that first, as, in my opinion, the covenant, in the events that have happened, will prevent the defendant from buying his beer except upon the terms of that covenant, if there is nothing else to prevent its being enforced against him. There was a lease entered into between Clegg & Wright and the defendant. Clegg & Wright are described as "hereinafter called the lessors (including in such term each of them and their and each and every of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns)." I read that because a good deal of the argument for the appeal was founded on it. Then the defendant is described as the lessee. Then we come to this, that there is a covenant entered into by the lessee in terms with "the lessors"—that is, with each of them, and their, each and every of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. There is no doubt about that. Then we come to the particular covenant in question. That is this—that "the said lessee will not at any time during the continuance of this demise, buy, receive, sell, or dispose of, either directly or indirectly, or permit to be bought, received, sold, or disposed of, either directly or indirectly" — there is no difficulty about construction there — "in, upon, out of, or about the said demised premises, or any part thereof, any ales, stout (other than best stout), other than such"—this is what the argument has been upon—"as shall have been bonâ fide purchased of the said lessors, or from them or either of them, either alone or jointly with any other person or persons who may hereafter become a partner or partners with them or either of them." It is said that that is not a covenant which includes the assigns, because part of the definition is repeated here in terms which exclude the full application of that definition, that is to say, the description of the persons who are described as "the lessors." But I cannot think that that is so. The covenant, as I pointed out, is entered into with the lessors—that is, the persons named—each or any of them, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of each or any of them. Very probably it was not necessary to add what is here put in, but I cannot think that that prevents the covenant being a covenant with the assigns of those who were the grantors of this lease to the defendant.

But then it is said, as I understand the argument, that it was only intended to include such assigns as should carry on the business of brewers at this particular brewery, which was assigned to one of the plaintiffs, and where the business of brewing is no longer carried on. A case to which reference was made (Doe d. Calvert v. Reid) was much relied upon for the purpose of that construction, but it was a case where the language was different, and, in my opinion, it is clear that that was not the intention in the present case.

Then there is this:—"Provided they or he shall at such time deal in or vend such liquors as aforesaid, and shall be willing to supply the same to the lessee of good quality and at the fair current market price."

Well, I pointed out, or Lindley, L.J., pointed out, in the course of the argument, that there is some protection afforded to the publican by this provision that the beer shall be of good quality, and that it shall be supplied at the fair current market price.

Then, in my opinion, it is shown clearly here that it was not intended to restrict this covenant to the benefit of the persons who carried on this brewery at this particular place, by not in any way referring to the beer, which has to be provided, being made by the landlords or their assigns. The words are "provided they or he shall at such time deal in or vend such liquors." It shows that it was not made or intended to be made a stipulation that the persons entitled to the benefit of the covenant were to be persons who made beer at all. It was not provided that they should still make the beer they were selling, but it was provided that it should be of good quality, and be supplied at the fair current market price. Considerable light was, to my mind, thrown upon the true intention of the parties by what was put before us by Mr. Collins in his reply—that at this time these landlords did not only make beer, but buy beer, and supply those who were not bound by any restrictive covenants to take beer from them alone. That, I think, does show what they were intending to provide for—not that they should supply beer which they themselves made, but that they should go on doing what they were then doing—buying beer—and that they should be willing and able to supply it of good quality and at the fair market price.

Then there was a case referred to. Cases, so far as they give us a rule of construction, are very useful, but it is very seldom, to my mind, that a case on the construction of a particular document tells us much when we come to construe another document, unless it lays down some principle to guide us. In the case referred to (Doe d. Calvert v. Reid) there was an action by brewers against a purchaser of beer for a public-house. The brewers had shut up the brewery, and though they themselves carried on the business of brewers, they did not carry it on at the place where the lessors had carried on their business at the time the lease was granted. The words to which reference was made are these, and I think the case turns upon this almost entirely:—The purchaser shall "take of and from the said John Phillips and Samuel Miall, their executors, administrators, or assigns, or their successors in their late or present trade as brewers, all the porter, ale," &c. It is true there was a covenant there that the covenantors and their assigns should take from the covenantees, their executors, administrators, or assigns, or their successors in business, in those terms. Then what followed? The words "their successors in their late or present trade as brewers," though not in terms limiting the assigns to those in that position, did afford a clue to the construction. The defendant said they were no longer carrying on that trade, because, though they were carrying on the trade of brewers, they were not carrying on the trade of the lessors who were plaintiffs in the suit, and the court held that what was meant was carrying on the same trade—not merely carrying on the trade of brewers, but carrying on the trade which was carried on at that particular brewery.

The construction which I put upon the covenant in the present case is governed by this particular clause which occurs here, and which does not occur in the case of Calvert v. Reid, and which throws a different construction and effect upon the covenant in the present case from that which was given to the covenant by the different words in Calvert v. Reid.

In my opinion it cannot be said in the present case that this was a personal covenant with the particular landlords who granted the lease, or that it was impossible for the benefit of it to be conveyed to anybody else. It is not like entering into a contract with a particular painter to paint your picture, which would mean that he could not hand that over to anybody else. That is a contract made with him personally, and it must not be handed over to anybody else. In my opinion this is not a contract which is incapable of being assigned.

Then it is said that this covenant does not run with the land. I think it does run with the land. That is my opinion, but there are other points on which this case might be decided independently of that. It is a contract relating to the way in which the business of the house is to be carried on; therefore, it is a contract relating to the public-house, just as much, in my opinion, as a contract as to the mode in which the cultivation of a particular bit of land is to be carried on, relates to the land. It affects the value of the reversion; it affects the house; and, in my opinion, it is a contract running with the land. I think, therefore, if that is so, that will enable the judgment to be supported, and will enable the present owner of the reversion in this case to sue.

But there is another ground on which I think the judgment might be supported. Here there has been a sale by the landlord of the goodwill to the plaintiff. He is, therefore, entitled to sue, independently of the question of its running with the land, so far as by assignment the landlord who entered into this covenant could give him the right. That being so, the difficulty which existed in the case before Hall, V.C., is got rid of.

There is no doubt that here there is an assignment of the benefit of the covenant to him, even if it did not pass by the mere assignment to him of the reversion of this public-house. Then, in my opinion, as he is entitled to sue in respect of that, the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay, properly applied, will enable him to enforce that covenant as against the defendant—that is to say, when the defendant obtains this public-house at a less rent, as we may assume he does (because it was put before us in the course of the argument that it might affect the rental value of the house), we ought not to allow him to deal with that public-house, as against the person entitled to the benefit of that covenant, in a way inconsistent with the covenant by reason of which he got the public-house at a lower rent. Therefore, in my opinion, on that ground, even if this covenant did not run with the land, the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor is right.

But then it is said—and that we ought to consider—that this court has decided that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay will not be extended, except to restrictive covenants—that is, beyond the case of a restrictive covenant. In Tulk v. Moxhay it was not a covenant in its terms restrictive, but it implied restriction, because there was a covenant there that the premises were to be used only as an ornamental garden. That implied that the defendant was not to build on it, which was what he was about to do. What was meant was this, we will not enforce this doctrine where the covenants are covenants which, if enforced, will compel the defendant to put his hand into his pocket and spend money. Here the defendant has to have his beer—his very food. This covenant will compel him to buy it from the plaintiffs. But, even if this were a contract to buy all beer from the plaintiffs, that would involve a negative—that he should not buy his beer from anybody else, and therefore, in my opinion, that would not come within the rule which we laid down, I think, in the case of Haywood v. The Brunswick Building Society, where there was a contract which would involve the necessity, if it was enforced, of the defendant putting his hand into his pocket—(it was a company, but I will assume they had a pocket and some money in it)—to do something entirely separate and collateral. In that case the land was granted in consideration of a covenant to build and repair buildings, and that was a covenant which the court refused to enforce, considering the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay not applicable in such a case.

In my opinion, both on the ground that here the covenant did run with the land, and also on the ground that the doctrine of Tulk v. Moxhay does apply, I think the order of the Vice-Chancellor is right.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I agree with Mr. Collins in thinking that this case is one of very great importance, both to brewers and also to tenants who take "tied" houses, because certainly it is rather a startling thing to anybody to be told that when you have agreed to buy beer of a particular brewer you may find yourself bound to take bad beer of somebody else's. Whether you are or not, depends upon the agreement into which you have entered. The whole question here, to my mind, turns upon the true construction of this agreement, and the only difficulty that I think serious is to find out whether this agreement is or is not assignable—that is to say, whether the tenant here entered into an agreement with certain persons relying upon their skill and personal reputation in agreeing to buy beer of them and them alone, or whether he did not enter into a very much wider contract, agreeing to buy beer from them or persons to whom they might assign their business or the public-house. That question, as to whether it is a personal unassignable contract or not, must be gathered from the instrument itself, having regard, of course, to the position of both parties.

The lease has been gone through, and I will refer to it very shortly. The lessors are described as brewers—there is no reference to any particular place of business, or anything of that kind—and the lessee is described as a licensed victualler. Then there is an ordinary lease of a public-house, and then there come covenants by the tenant, that he will use and occupy the premises demised as and for a tavern or public-house only, and will conduct the same so as not to forfeit his licence—I am reading it shortly—and will keep open the premises for the sale of the articles before mentioned, which I will call ale and beer. Then there is a covenant about not getting ale or beer from other people. Now, just let me see whether this lease does or does not contain any indication, either one way or the other, as to whether the benefit of this was capable of being assigned. The very first thing that one comes across is the interpretation clause which follows the names of the brewers, and describes them as hereinafter called "the lessors"—including in such term "each of them and their and each and every of their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns." Those words are never found in what are called personal contracts. If I were to enter into an engagement with an artist to paint my picture I should not put those words in. If he died I should not leave it with his executors to finish what he had not done. Such words are out of place altogether in a contract which is personal in that sense.

Now when we come to the covenant which more particularly relates to this matter, we find that the lessee has agreed with his lessors that he will not during the lease—I am again reading it shortly—sell or dispose of on the premises any ale or stout other than such as shall have been bonâ fide purchased of the said lessors, or from them or either of them alone or jointly with any other person or persons who may hereafter become a partner or partners with them or either of them. That clause lets in partness. The covenant, on the true construction of the agreement, does not exclude such persons as these. It is not that I will only take beer from Clegg & Wright, but it lets in the partners. Well, does it go further? It turns upon the construction of a very few words. Mr. Collins says that by reason of the introduction into this clause of the words "from them or either of them," which occur also in the definition clause, it is tolerably apparent that the definition was departed from. I thought at first sight that there was a great deal in favour of that construction, but when you come to see what the whole clause is, it appears to me that you cannot put that limited construction upon it, and the true construction to put upon it is that which interprets "lessors" in the sense in which it occurs everywhere. That being the case, I think there can be no reasonable doubt that this contract is not a personal and unassignable contract. Accordingly the question then arises whether it has been assigned to Mr. Cain. Well, the answer to that is easy enough. Unquestionably it has. If it is capable of being assigned, it has been assigned. It has been assigned unquestionably and without any controversy in equity by the agreement by the brewers with regard to the sale of the business, which of course includes the benefit of the goodwill, and inasmuch as the purchaser and his assignors are both suing, I see no answer whatever to this action upon that ground.

It has also been said that it is assigned to Mr. Cain by means of his being an assignee of the reversion in the lease. That raises a technical question, which, stated in legal language amounts to this — Whether the benefit of this covenant runs with the land? We have heard the authorities discussed by Mr. Collins, who has studied this branch of the law probably more carefully than anybody living, and he has not persuaded me, I confess, that this is a covenant which does not run with the land. I rather think it does. If you look at the authorities which he has cited, and look at them carefully, this does, in lawyer's language, so "touch and concern" the demise as to "run with" it at common law. But whether that is so or not it appears to me that it is absolutely no answer with regard to that covenant, the benefit of which has been expressly assigned to Mr. Cain, and Mr. Cain is therefore entitled to it.

Then comes a question as to whether this covenant is one which can be enforced in equity, having regard to the doctrine relating to specific performance and injunctions. Mr. Collins has suggested that although this covenant is negative in point of form, it is affirmative in substance, and that an injunction, therefore, ought not to be granted. But when you look at the whole of this lease you find that the covenant which he suggests is affirmative really involves a negative element in it. If you take into consideration the covenant to keep open this place as a public-house and to sell beer there, you cannot treat the covenant that follows as an affirmative covenant to buy beer of the lessors, but you must put in "and of the lessors exclusively." If you get that, you get a negative portion of the covenant, which can be properly enforced consistently with the doctrine applicable to cases of this kind; and therefore, whether you regard it as an affirmative covenant with a negative element in it, or whether you regard it as split up, as it is here, into these two parts, partly affirmative and partly negative, that negative part can be properly enforced.

For these reasons it appears to me that the decision is right, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

DOPES, L.J.—The question in this case is on the construction of the covenant. In the definition clause the word "lessors" includes assigns. It is contended, with regard to this particular covenant, that by the words following "lessors" in the covenant—I mean those words "from them or either of them alone or jointly with any other person or persons who may hereafter become a partner or partners with them or either of them"—being used, it was intended that the operation of the definition clause was to be excluded, and that the covenant must be dealt with entirely apart from the definition clause. I cannot adopt that view. I am bound to say that at first I was somewhat taken with it, but on consideration I think it cannot be maintained. It appears to me that the words, to which I have alluded, following "lessors," were introduced merely to cover the case of any partnership between the lessors and third parties, or their assigns and third parties—not only the assigns of the brewery with which the covenantees were then concerned, but any assigns, provided only that they or he should at such time deal in or vend such liquors as aforesaid, and should be willing to supply the same to the said lessee of good quality and at a fair current price. The covenant, therefore, in my opinion, cannot be said to be a personal covenant.

But then a question is raised as to whether the benefit of this covenant runs with the reversion. It was contended by Mr. Collins that it did not run with the reversion, and that it was purely collateral. The benefit, to run with the reversion, must "touch or concern" the demised premises. Now does this covenant touch or concern the demised premises? It relates to the mode of enjoyment of a public-house. The thing demised is a public-house, and the covenant compels the covenantor to buy the beer of the covenantee and his assigns. In my opinion it touches and concerns the demised premises: it affects the mode of enjoyment of the premises, and, therefore, it runs with the reversion.

I entirely agree with what has been said with regard to the application of the case of Tulk v. Moxhay, and I think this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

DAVIES v. ANDRÈ & CO. (a.)

Practice—Action against firm—Service of writ on person who denies that he is a partner—Person having the control or management of the partnership business—Conditional appearance—Right to defend—Ord. 9, r. 6—Ord. 12, rr. 15, 16—Ord. 42, r. 10.

In an action against a firm the writ was served upon R. at his residence, where some of the partnership business was ordinarily carried on. R. was not informed in what capacity he was served, whether as a partner in the firm or under ord. 9, r. 6, as a "person having at the time of service the control or management of the partnership business" at the place where the service was effected.

Held, by the Divisional Court, that R. was entitled to dispute both the amount claimed and the fact of his being a partner, and that, therefore, unless the plaintiff would give an undertaking not to apply under ord. 42, r. 10, for leave to issue execution against him as a partner, he might enter a conditional appearance, at the same time denying that he was a partner, such conditional appearance to stand until an issue directed as to his being a partner or not had been decided.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of the Divisional Court), that there was no power to order such a conditional appearance.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of Field, J., in chambers, allowing an unconditional appearance to be entered in this action for Ferdinand Rath. The circumstances of the case, and the conclusions which the court drew from the affidavits on both sides, are sufficiently stated in the judgment of Wills, J.

Lawson Walton, for the appellants.—The respondent has no locus standi. He has not been sued either as a partner or otherwise, and he is not entitled to appear and delay us in getting judgment against the true defendants. We have a right to get our judgment against André & Co., and afterwards, if we are so advised, to proceed against Rath as a partner under ord. 42, r. 10; he will then have an opportunity of disputing his liability. The service was a good one against André & Co. under ord. 9, r. 6.

Terrell, for the respondent Rath.—Rath has a right to appear. If the plaintiffs are allowed to get judgment they may say that he was sued as a partner in the name of the firm, and was served as a partner (ord. 12, rr. 15, 16), and they could then levy execution on his goods. Even if they have to proceed under ord. 42, r. 10, Rath might be held to be a partner, and would then be too late to dispute the amount of the claim, judgment having been signed against the firm in his absence.

Walton replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 12.—WILLS, J., delivered the judgment of the COURT.—In this case W. H. Davies, trading as W. H. Davies & Co., sues a firm of the name of André & Co. for a balance of account in respect of goods supplied to that firm from October, 1888, to March, 1889. The writ is addressed to André & Co., of 8, Ribblesdale-place, Hornsey, and it bears an indorsement dated the 2nd of November, 1889, in the following terms:—"This writ was served at 8, Ribblesdale-road, Hornsey, on the defendants by leaving the same with a person in charge of the business on Friday, 1st November, 1889. (Signed) F. SYDNEY SEARLE." The memorandum contains a contradiction in terms, and no doubt the writ was really served by leaving a copy at 8, Ribblesdale-place. On the 8th of November, leave having been obtained from a master, an appearance was entered in these words: "Enter a conditional appearance for Ferdinand Rath, having been served as a partner, but who denies that he is a partner, in the defendant firm of André & Co. (Signed) VALLANCE & Co., solicitors for the said Ferdinand Rath." A summons was heard by Field, J., on the 4th of December to strike out this appearance. No affidavits appear to have been used on this occasion, and the learned judge made the following order:—That the appearance entered by Ferdinand Rath be amended by striking out the word "conditional" and the words "but who denies that he is a partner in the firm of André & Co." On the same 4th of December Ferdinand Rath delivered a statement of defence headed "Between W. H. Davies & Co. and Ferdinand Rath, sued as André & Co.," in which he denied that he ever carried on business as André & Co., or was a partner in that firm, or bought the goods or any of them, or had any of the transactions mentioned in the statement of claim indorsed on the writ. Notice of appeal was given on behalf of the plaintiffs, asking that the said order should be reversed or varied, and that the said appearance might be struck out. On the hearing of this appeal before us three affidavits were used. [His lordship then referred at length to these affidavits, and continued:—] From these affidavits we conclude that the writ was served on Rath without any definite information to him in what capacity he was served, and that the indorsement was made after the copy writ left with Rath and returned by him had reached the plaintiff's solicitors. We also conclude that at the time of the service of the writ André & Co. had ceased to carry on business in Piccadilly; that some business, at least, was being done from 8, Ribblesdale-place, though it might be a private house; and that the plaintiff had reason, in the conduct of Rath, for believing that Rath was either a partner in André & Co. or their agent; that the circumstances bring the service within the terms of ord. 9, r. 6, as being "either upon one of the partners or at the principal place within the jurisdiction of the business of the partnership upon any person having at the time of the service the control or management of the partnership there"; and that the service was a good service upon André & Co. We think also that, although Rath had no means, at the time when he entered the appearance, of knowing in what capacity he was served, the service must be treated, until and unless it is established that he is a partner, as having been made upon him as having the control of the partnership business. We pass to the consequences of such service.

By ord. 12, r. 15, "where persons are sued as partners in the name of their firm they shall appear individually in their own names, but all subsequent proceedings shall nevertheless continue in the name of the firm." By ord. 12, r. 16, "where any person carrying on business in the name of a firm apparently consisting of more than one person shall be sued in the name of the firm he shall appear in his own name, but all subsequent proceedings shall nevertheless continue in the name of the firm." Any person, therefore, who appears unconditionally to a writ addressed to a firm admits that either he is "sued as a partner," or that "he is carrying on business in the name" of the firm sued, whereas, in the present case, he is not told by the plaintiff that he is sued as a partner. To appear as a person sued as a partner is to confess that he is a partner. Therefore, under ord. 12, r. 15, in circumstances like the present, and under rule 16 in any case, no man can appear at all, if he appear unconditionally, without admitting he is a partner. If he is willing to do that, he can then defend the action, and may dispute the debt in whole or in part, and judgment will go against the firm for the amount, if any, really due. Execution may then go against the person who has so appeared under ord. 42, r. 10. If, again, a person who has been served with the writ, and served as a partner, appears in his own name, he can dispute the fact of partnership as well as the amount of the debt; and the latter part of ord. 42, r. 10, seems to be expressly framed to meet such a case. He will have been adjudged a partner if the verdict goes against him upon this point, and he will have had the opportunity of contesting the debt, and justice will be done. And so, again, if a person so served fail to appear, judgment will properly go against him. He has been served as a partner, and has had notice both of the amount alleged to be due, and of the allegation that he is a partner. If he chooses to contest neither point, execution rightly goes against him. But if he is not served as a partner he is in this position—if he comes forward and appears he treats himself as being sued as a partner, which is equivalent to admitting that he is one; if he does not make this admission he has no right to appear at all: and even if he does make the admission it is doubtful whether he falls within the rules we have cited, inasmuch as he has not been sued in that capacity. Not being entitled to appear, he cannot prevent judgment going against the firm by default for the full amount claimed, and then when the plaintiff, under ord. 42, r. 10, alleges that he is a partner, although not served or sued as one, he is too late to dispute the amount of the judgment. He may have the question of liability tried, but not that of the amount, and the penalty of having failed to admit at the outset that he is a partner is that he may have to pay a debt never due at all, or which was really far less than the amount of the judgment. This might be all very well if all persons who deny that they are partners where they really are partners were dishonest, though even then the infliction of such a penalty would not be consistent with the wide liberty given to a defendant in all ordinary cases to deny the case of the plaintiff.

But there are no more difficult questions of fact and law than those which occasionally arise as to the fact of partnership, witness the well-known case of Cox v. Hickman, 8 W. R. 754, 8 H. L. Cas. 268. It cannot be right that a person against whom a plaintiff may ultimately claim on the score of his being a partner in the firm sued can be heard to dispute the amount of the claim only on the terms of admitting his partnership, or to dispute his partnership only on the terms of being shut out from questioning the amount. It is quite clear from what passed on the argument before us that the plaintiff has no notion of releasing Rath from personal liability, and that, although he objects to the interposition of Rath to prevent him from getting judgment by default against André & Co., he reserves the right of proceeding against him, under ord. 42, r. 10, by way of execution, and he claims to be in a position to call upon Rath, as soon as judgment is signed, to discharge, as a partner, a claim which he now says he ought not to be allowed to contest, because the plaintiff is not suing him as a partner.

We think the dilemma is one calling for the attention of the Rule Committee.

What seems needed in the way of alteration is that when leave to issue execution is sought under ord. 42, r. 10, the judge should be able to grant to the person sought to be affected upon such terms (if any) as he shall think fit, leave to dispute the claim as well as the fact of partnership. But in the meantime the rules stand as they are, and we must endeavour to prevent injustice being done. If, notwithstanding appearances, which are against him upon this point, Rath really knows nothing of the transactions in respect of which this action is brought, he ought to be allowed to dispute both the partnership and the existence or amount of the alleged debt. Whether or not the allegation that he is unconnected with the firm is true, is a question which cannot be settled upon the affidavits. On the other hand, if the plaintiff does not seek to hold Rath liable as a member of the firm, there is no reason why Rath should interfere with the right of the plaintiff to have judgment against the firm. If, therefore, the plaintiff is willing to undertake that he will not seek to issue execution against Rath as being a member of the firm, the appearance will be struck out and the plaintiff may sign judgment against the firm. In that case we think Rath ought to have his costs of this application. If the plaintiff is not prepared to give the undertaking, we see no course but to restore the conditional appearance with a modification of its terms, and to direct an issue as to the question of partnership. The form of the conditional appearance being: "Enter a conditional appearance for Ferdinand Rath, who, unless the plaintiff will undertake not to seek to hold him liable as a partner in the firm of André & Co., desires to appear though denying that he is a partner or that he carried on business under the name of André & Co." If in the result Rath should be found to be a partner the conditional appearance will be struck out and he will have leave to appear as a partner. If he should be found to be not a partner then the appearance will be struck out and the plaintiff will have judgment against André & Co. It may be that this is an extension of the procedure by way of conditional appearance. If it be so, however, it is one rendered necessary in the peculiar circumstances of this case by the impossibility under the rules of doing justice. The statement of defence is clearly wrong and must be struck out, Rath has no right to alter the title of the action. The proceedings under the rules must be continued in the name of André & Co. as defendants, and the statement that he is not a partner is nihil ad rem, he not having been served as a partner. It was objected on behalf of Rath that when judgment is obtained against the firm of André & Co. he might, under ord. 42, r. 10, have an execution levied on the property in his house as partnership property. This is an inconvenience that might happen to any person. The sheriff may make a mistake in respect of anyone's property, and Rath has no claim upon this score to any special consideration.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cook, Q.C., and A. D. Maclaren, for the plaintiffs.—There is no power under the rules to order such a conditional appearance.

Duke, for Rath.—This form of appearance was sanctioned by a master in Cram v. Paynter, a case which is not reported, but is referred to in the Annual Practice, 1888-9, p. 231.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the writ was issued against a firm, and was served, in point of fact, on the man Rath. If it was served upon him as a partner it was his duty to appear unconditionally to the writ, and he would then be able to set up as a defence that the firm owed nothing and that he was not a partner. If it was served upon him as a partner and he did not appear to it, judgment would go against the firm, and he would be shut out from defending the action, and could not say that he was not a partner. Therefore, if in this case Rath was served as a partner he ought to have appeared, but he did not do so, he only entered what he called a conditional appearance. In my opinion no such conditional appearance is possible under the rules. If, however, we strike out that appearance altogether there is a difficulty, because if he was served as a partner he has not appeared, and therefore he cannot say that he is not a partner. I think, therefore, it is better to assume that he was not served as a partner, but as the person having at the time the control or management of the partnership busines under ord. 9, r. 6—as the figure-head, that is to say, of the business. Then, if he was a partner, he was bound to appear to the writ if he wished to defend the action, but if he was not, there was no need for him to appear. There is no rule allowing him to appear conditionally. He must make up his mind whether he was a partner or not and act accordingly. If there is no appearance to the writ, then judgment goes by default against the firm. That will not hurt him if he is not a partner. In order that execution should be issued against him it is necessary for the plaintiff, who has got a judgment against the firm, to show that he is a partner. That is the result of ord. 42, r. 10.

Wills, J., appears to have seen a difficulty in the position. He thinks that a man may not always know whether he is a partner or not. It is difficult to my mind to conceive a man of business in such a position, and can, I think, only be of rare occurrence. Wills, J., appears to think that the rules work an injustice. Even if they do, we must not amend that injustice by evolving, as he has done, out of our own heads a rule which does not exist. If the rules work an injustice they ought to be altered, but that must be done by the Rule Committee, and not by the courts.

I think, therefore, that Wills, J., in his anxious desire to do justice, has taken to himself the functions of the Rule Committee, and that his judgment cannot be upheld. When the matter comes before the Rule Committee I will consider it, but I am not yet prepared to say that I will give my suppert to his proposition.

The effect of our decision is, therefore, to strike out Rath's appearance altogether, but we will allow him two days in which to enter an ordinary unconditional appearance to the writ if he think well to do so.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that there can be no doubt that the courts have an inherent power to mould the practice to meet the exigencies of particular cases, but in this case the learned judge has gone much further than that, further than, I think, the case requires, and has invented a new rule altogether. He appears to think that there may be people who do not know whether they are partners or not in a firm. I confess that I have very little sympathy with such people if such there be. People ought to know their own positions and their own rights and liabilities. The rules contemplate judgment being given against a firm, and execution on that judgment going against a particular person, but execution will not be allowed to issue against him unless he is a partner in the firm or the goods against which the execution issues are partnership goods. Unless this is so execution cannot issue except after an application for leave, which may, of course, be opposed. If, therefore, in this case Rath was not a partner there was no need for him to appear, and he had no interest in the judgment against the firm. If he was a partner, he should appear unconditionally to the writ. I think, therefore, that Wills, J., was wrong, and that the time for trying the issue whether Rath was a partner or not is not now, but after the judgment on the application to issue execution against him.

Appeal allowed.

In re Meyerstein & Co.'s Trade-Mark. (a.)

Trade-mark—Registration—"Invented word"—Word descriptive of quality—"Satinine"—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 10, sub-section 1 (d) (e).

The word "Satinine," when applied to starch and other articles which give a glossy surface, is descriptive of the effect produced by such articles, and is not capable of registration as a trade-mark under section 10, sub-section 1, of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888.

Semble, the word "Satinine," being formed from a well-known word by the addition of a termination well known in many other words, is not an "invented word" within section 10, sub-section 1 (d), of the above Act.

Motion.

On the 20th of November, 1886, Messrs. Meyerstein & Co. applied for the registration of the word "Satinine" in classes 47 and 48, which comprise, amongst other goods, soap, starch, blue, and other preparations for laundry purposes, and perfumery.

The applications were held over by the comptroller in view of further legislation with reference to word marks; and after the passing of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, the comptroller refused to register the mark.

On the 20th of April, 1889, Messrs. Meyerstein & Co. made a new application under the Act of 1888 for registration of the word "Satinine," which was refused by the comptroller on the ground that the word did not consist of any of the essential particulars required by the Act.

The applicants appealed to the Board of Trade, who referred the question to the court.

The comptroller stated that his reasons for refusing registration were that "Satinine" was not an invented word within the meaning of section 10, sub-section 1 (d), of the Act of 1888, but merely the well-known word satin, with the common suffix "ine" added so as to form an adjective equivalent to the adjective "satiny," and that it had reference to the character or quality of the goods or some of the goods in classes 47 and 48. He also stated that the words "Satin Glaze" formed part of a trade-mark already registered for laundry starch.

R. W. Wallace, for the applicants.—The word "Satinine" is an invented word, since it does not appear in any dictionary. It is not necessary that there should be such invention in a trade-mark as is required by the patent law in order to support a patent. The word is not descriptive of the goods to which it is to be applied.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the comptroller, were not called upon.

Kay, J.—This is a word which describes the quality of the goods to which it is to be applied. There is, moreover, very little invention in it; the invention consists merely in adding a termination, well known in many other words, to a well-known word. The word proposed to be registered is to be used for starch, amongst other goods; starch gives a glossy appearance to linen, and it would be a good quality of starch that it gave a glossy surface. The comptroller states that the words "Satin Glaze" have already been registered as part of a trade-mark for starch. The applicants, therefore, intended to get a word which would suggest that the starch which they sold would produce a very glossy surface. The word "Satinine" is descriptive of the effect produced by the article to which it is to be applied, and is a descriptive word.

The application must be refused, with costs.

Hart v. Colley. (a.)

Trade-mark — Registration — Infringement—Registration for one class of goods—Use for another class—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 62, 65, 70, 77—Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 91).

The right of action for improper user of a trade-mark registered under the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, is limited to the particular class of goods in respect of which the trade-mark was registered.

Trial of action.

This was an action to restrain the defendant from using the plaintiff's trade-mark, and the question raised was, whether a person who has registered a trade-mark in respect of one class of goods is entitled to object to its use by another person in respect of another class of goods in which the party complaining has not registered it?

The plaintiff, Morris Hart, carries on business as the Patent Toilet Requisite Co., and sells toilet paper in perforated rolls. Passing through the centre of the roll is a hollow cylinder of cardboard, in which can be placed a metal rod attached to a framework, by means of which the roll can be conveniently suspended and the respective perforated lengths be readily torn off for use.

The defendant Colley, who was formerly in the employ of the plaintiff, carries on a similar business and sells similar articles.

In May, 1883, the plaintiff registered under the Trade-Marks Act, 1875, a trade-mark in respect of the class of goods No. 6 in the 1st schedule to the rules under that Act, which class is, "Machinery of all kinds and parts of machinery, except agricultural machines included in class 7." Each trade-mark was a pictorial representation of the framework or holder with a roll of perforated paper in it. Paper forms part of class 39. The article was described in the plaintiff's application for registration as "a toilet requisite, being a machine to hold a roll of perforated paper."

In the statement of claim it was alleged that "the defendant has, prior to the issue of the writ in this action, and since the registration, sold large quantities of perforated paper contained in wrappers, and has issued large numbers of circulars and advertisements whereon there was printed the registered trade-mark of the plaintiff"; and an injunction was claimed to restrain the defendant from continuing to infringe the plaintiff's registered trade-mark; and relief was also claimed on the ground that the defendant had, by circulars, advertisements, and wrappers represented that the articles sold by him were those of the plaintiff. The defendant denied user of the plaintiff's trade-mark, and alleged that if he had at any time used a similar trade-mark, nevertheless the plaintiff's trade-marks were registered for a different class of goods from those mentioned in the statement of claim.

In the defendant's particulars he alleged that the plaintiff's trade-mark was registered in the class of iron goods, and not in respect of paper articles, the subject-matter of this action.

From the evidence it appeared that the plaintiff did not actually apply his trade-marks to, or mark them upon, the frame of the machine, but only on the wrappers round the rolls, which, though intended to be used with the machines, are sold separately. The defendant had also placed his marks on the wrappers round his rolls of paper.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and J. C. Graham, for the plaintiff.

Aston, Q.C., and R. W. Wallace, for the defendant.—The registration of a trade-mark in respect of the whole of a class of goods would not prevent another person from using it in respect of goods in that class for which the registered owner did not use it: Edwards Dennis, 30 Ch. D. 454, 34 W. R. Dig. 197.

North, J.—I do not think the plaintiff is entitled to sue in respect of this trade-mark. Assuming that he has a right to an injunction restraining the defendant from imitating his goods, which is a different relief from that in respect of the trade-mark, there appears to me to be an insuperable difficulty with regard to the trade-mark—viz., that the plaintiff has registered his mark in class 6 only, and he does not complain of the sale by the defendant of any goods which come within that class.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy says that the Act requires registration of a trade-mark, and that when once the registration has been made the registered owner is entitled to sue in respect of the use of that mark by any other person. Mr. Hardy relies on section 77 of the Act of 1883, which corresponds with section 1 of the Act of 1875, and provides that "a person shall not be entitled to institute any proceeding to prevent or to recover damages for the infringement of a trade-mark unless, in the case of a trade-mark capable of being registered under this Act, it has been registered in pursuance of this Act or of an enactment repealed by this Act, or, in the case of any other trade-mark in use before the 13th of August, 1875, registration thereof under this part of this Act or of an enactment repealed by this Act has been refused."

It is quite true that without registration the plaintiff could not sue at all. But there is nothing in the section to say that, when once he has registered the mark, the owner is entitled to sue in respect of every use of it. The section is simply negative, imposing registration under the Act as a condition precedent, a necessary preliminary, to the right to sue.

Then the question arises, What is the registration under the Act? Section 65, which corresponds with section 2 of the Act of 1875, says: "A trade-mark must be registered for particular goods or classes of goods." Therefore a general registration in respect of all goods could not be effected. Then section 62 says: "The comptroller may, on application by or on behalf of any person claiming to be the proprietor of a trade-mark, register the trade-mark," and it adds, "The application must be in the form set forth in the first schedule to this Act," and "the application must state the particular goods or classes of goods in connection with which the applicant desires the trade-mark to be registered." The form F given in the schedule, as well as the subsequent modification of it given in the second schedule to the Trade-Mark Rules, 1883, contains a request that the mark may be registered in specified classes of goods. It points, therefore, to particular goods or classes of goods. The form in use under the Act of 1875 was substantially to the same effect.

Then, again, section 70, which corresponds with section 2 of the Act of 1875, says: "A trade-mark, when registered, shall be assigned and transmitted only in connection with the goodwill of the business concerned in the particular goods or classes of goods for which it has been registered, and shall be determinable with that goodwill." It is true the plaintiff's mark was registered under the Act of 1875, but I referred to the sections of the Act of 1883 and to the existing rules merely for convenience. The provisions of the two Acts and of the two sets of rules are for the present purpose practically the same. I do not see what is the object of requiring registration for particular goods or classes of goods if, by registering a mark in respect of one class of goods, the owner can acquire a right to sue in respect of all classes, for that is what I understand the argument to be. I think the express provision requiring the application for registration to be made in respect of particular goods and classes of goods was to confine the registration and the right to sue in respect of the registration to the goods thus indicated. There is another thing which bears out this view, I mean the rule known as the "three marks rule" which was originally framed by the Commissioners of Patents under the Act of 1875, and has now been adopted by section 74 of the Act of 1883. That rule related only to old marks—i.e., marks in use before the 13th of August, 1875, and it provided that identical or similar old marks should not be capable of being registered in relation to the same kind of goods by more than three persons, and that if the same mark had been used by more than three persons for the same kind of goods it must be treated as common to the trade in those goods. It would have been utterly useless to adopt such a rule if, when there were three similar old marks registered in respect of particular goods or a particular class of goods, a person who had registered a similar old mark in respect of a different class of goods could prevent the use of his mark in respect of the class of goods for which the three marks had been registered. Then, again, the common practice is in accordance with the same view. In turning over the leaves of the Trade-Marks Journal I constantly find four or five or more trade-marks all exactly alike, registered in respect of different classes of goods. Why is that? Because, by common consent, everyone understands that the right to registration under the Act is in respect of the particular goods or classes of goods for which the registration is obtained.

I am surprised to find that this point has never yet been expressly decided, for it must have arisen a great many times. But I find that in Edwards v. Dennis observations were made by the judges which, as it seems to me, point exactly the same way. In that case it was held that a person could not register a mark with respect to all the goods comprised in a particular class unless he had used the mark in respect of all those goods, and that when a mark had been registered with respect to a particular class of goods, but had been used only in connection with certain goods in that class, the registration must be rectified by limiting it to those goods only in connection with which the mark had been used. Now it would be absurd to say that, if a man registers a mark for class 1 in respect of particular goods comprised in that class, he cannot sue in respect of other goods in that class, and yet that, without any other registration, he can sue in respect of all the goods comprised in all the other forty-nine classes. It is impossible to come to such a conclusion, and it having been decided that a man can register with respect to those only of the goods in any given class upon which he has used his mark, it follows à fortiori that a man whose mark is registered in respect of one particular class cannot, by virtue of that registration, sue in respect of goods which are not within that class at all.

In Edwards v. Dennis Cotton, L.J., said: "Now what was done in the present case? There was a registration by Mr. Edwards' predecessors in title for class 5, 'Unwrought and partly wrought metals used in manufacture.' That was registration in respect of all goods which come under class 5, a class which includes a vast number of things. . . . The registration in the present case has been for the entirety of that class. In my opinion that is wrong. Even if a trade-mark can be registered which is not in actual use, it ought to be restricted to those goods in connection with which it is going to be used. In my opinion it is not the intention of the Act that a man registering a trade-mark for the entire class, and yet only using it for one article in that class, can claim for himself the exclusive right to use it for every article in that class. Can a man claim registration for all the articles specified in the class when the business he is engaged in comprises only one specific portion of the articles named in the class? I am of opinion he cannot." I may paraphrase that passage thus: Can a man who is registered in one class claim in respect of articles not comprised in that class but comprised in some other class? In my opinion he cannot.

There are some important observations in the judgments of the other Lords Justices to the same effect as those which I have read.

Under these circumstances I come to the conclusion that the registration gives the plaintiff no right to sue the defendant for infringement of the trade-mark. The defendant is charged with selling rolls of paper with the plaintiff's trade-mark upon them. Rolls of paper come under class 39 and under no other class, and inasmuch as the plaintiff has not registered his trade-mark in respect of paper or any other goods comprised in class 39 which might include paper, he is not entitled to sue the defendant in respect of his use of the trade-mark for paper, there being no registration in accordance with the statute which entitles him to sue as regards that class.

*Trustee—Power to invest in the purchase of freehold and leasehold hereditaments—Breach of trust—Res judicata—Estoppel.*

By a settlement, property was vested in trustees to be invested as the settlor directed, and also with power to them to invest upon freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or chattel real securities (including equitable mortgages by deposit), and in the purchase of freehold and leasehold hereditaments.

After the death of the settlor the trustees, to save a sum advanced during the life and by the direction of the settlor on second mortgage, agreed to purchase the equity of redemption of the property. One of the cestui que trusts had brought an action alleging breaches of trust by reason of improper investments, and the details of the investments in question had been actually set out in an affidavit filed by the trustees. The plaintiffs in the present action, who, at the time of the first-mentioned action, were infants, had been served with the judgment and had leave to attend. The first action was compromised. The infants, on coming of age, brought the present action against the trustees for improper investment by reason of the purchase of the equity of redemption.

Held, that the power to purchase freehold or leasehold hereditaments did not authorize the purchase of an equity of redemption, which was a breach of trust.

Held, also, that the question as to the breach of trust was not res judicata, and the present plaintiffs were therefore not estopped from bringing this action.

Trial of action.

In this action S. Worman, R. A. W. Worman, and J. J. E. Worman sued J. C. Worman and Elizabeth Worman, the trustees under a deed of settlement of the 11th of April, 1874, for having invested a portion of the trust funds in the purchase of an equity of redemption. By the deed in question a sum of £10,300 and other funds were settled upon such trusts as the settlor J. Smith should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment upon trust during the life of J. Smith to invest the trust funds in such manner as J. Smith should in his uncontrolled discretion, and as if he were absolute owner, from time to time direct; and to pay the income of the trust funds to J. Smith during his life, and after the death of J. Smith upon trust to pay thereout certain sums of money, and to invest the same in manner hereinafter provided, and to divide the same into five equal parts—namely, one-fifth part as the share of R. A. J. Worman, another fifth as the share of J. C. Worman, another as the share of Elizabeth Worman, one-fifth as the share of Georgina E. Loughnan, the wife of T. C. Loughnan, and the remaining fifth as the share of M. A. Worman—and, as to the share of R. A. J. Worman, the trustees were directed to stand possessed thereof in trust to pay the income to him during his life, and after his death the same to be in trust for his children as he should by will appoint, and in default of appointment (which event happened) in trust for his children who, being sons, should attain the age of twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry under that age, in equal shares. The settlement contained a power to invest in Government securities, and also upon freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or chattel real securities in England, Wales, or Ireland (including equitable mortgages by a deposit), with power to vary investments, and also a power after the death of J. Smith to invest the trust funds in the purchase of any freehold hereditaments in England or Wales, or of any leasehold hereditaments in England or Wales, for any term of years whereof not less than seventy years should be unexpired, to be conveyed in the usual way to and upon the trusts of the settlement. In October, 1877, J. Smith died, at which date a sum of £6,400, part of the trust fund, had been advanced, with the consent of J. Smith, to one M. Scott on a second mortgage of four freehold houses in Harrington-mansions and two leasehold houses in Penywern-road. The first mortgage on the houses in Harrington-mansions amounted to £58,000, and on the leaseholds to £3,900.

Matthew Scott, shortly after the death of J. Smith, got into embarrassed circumstances, and, as the first mortgagees were on the point of selling the properties in case Scott became bankrupt, the defendants, in order to save the funds advanced by them, agreed to purchase the equity of redemption from Scott for £2,000, and at the same time it was arranged that the other properties comprised in the mortgages should be sold and the proceeds applied in reduction of the first mortgages.

(a.) Reported by J. W. Greig, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By deed dated the 12th of March, 1884, M. Scott conveyed the equity of redemption in all the premises to the defendants, subject, as to the freeholds, to £19,500, to which sum the first mortgage had been reduced, and, as to the leaseholds, to the sum of £3,300.

An action, "In re J. Smith, deceased, Loughnan v. Worman (1878, S., No. 523), was brought in December, 1875, by Georgina Loughnan and T. C. Loughnan against the defendants and R. A. J. Worman for alleged breaches of trust by reason of unauthorized investments, and claiming that the defendants might be charged, on the ground of wilful default, with the loss arising thereby. By a judgment of the 16th of June, 1880, an inquiry was directed as to the alleged unauthorized investments.

R. A. W. Worman and J. J. E. Worman, two infant children of R. A. J. Worman, were served with this judgment, and liberty was given them to attend the proceedings.

On the 13th of June, 1881, a petition in the same action was presented, the infants being made parties to it, praying (inter alia) for a partition of the trust property and for payment to the plaintiff, G. E. Loughnan, of her one-fifth thereof. The petition contained no reference to the alleged breaches of trust, but all details connected with the investments appeared in an answer to interrogatories filed by the defendants before the presentation of the petition.

The petition came on for hearing on the 27th of July, 1881, when an order was made declaring that it was for the benefit of the respondents (the plaintiffs in this action) that the action should be compromised, and all proceedings therein stayed, upon the terms therein mentioned, and all further proceedings were to be stayed except for the purpose of carrying the order into effect. The compromise was effected.

R. A. J. Worman died leaving two children, R. A. W. Worman and J. J. E. Worman, both of whom attained twenty-one years, and by his will appointed S. Worman his executrix.

This action was brought in July, 1888, by S. Worman, R. A. W. Worman, and J. J. E. Worman. The defendants denied that the investment was unauthorized and improper, and pleaded the compromise in the previous action as a bar to the present action.

Warmington, Q.C., and Theobald, for the plaintiffs.—The investments made previous to the death of the settlor cannot be questioned, but the purchase of the equity of redemption, which was made subsequently, was unauthorized. Trustees cannot buy an incumbered estate: Lewin on Trusts, 5th ed., p. 504; Ex parte Orawen, 17 L. J. Ch. 215. This question of improper investment cannot be opened now, as it is res judicata.

Hall, Q.C., and C. P. Pauli, for the defendants.—There was impliedly a power to invest in equitable securities in the settlement, more especially as there is a power to purchase land. There is no case showing that the purchase of an equity of redemption is a breach of trust. If this purchase had not been made greater loss would have been caused to the trust estate. The whole question is now res judicata, as the same persons were parties to the former action; the breach of trust appeared from the answers to interrogatories, and the order was made with knowledge of them.

They cited Askew v. Woodhead, 21 W. R. 573; Henderson v. Henderson, 3 Hare, 100; Serrao v. Noel, 15 Q. B. D. 549, 34 W. R. Dig. 70.

Warmington, Q.C., replied.

Kekewich, J.—There are two important points calling for decision in this case, and although they both arise under one settlement made by James Smith in 1874, they must be considered separately.

The first question is whether the trustees of that settlement committed a breach of trust in purchasing the equity of redemption in property which was already mortgaged to them. During the life of James Smith the settlor, who, by virtue of the language of the deed, had complete control over the trust funds, part of those funds had been invested on a second mortgage of the property with which we are concerned, partly freehold, partly leasehold. No question arises about that second mortgage, because it was made under James Smith's direction, and he was entitled to direct such an investment. Therefore the trustees were, at the time of his death, possessed of securities which would not ordinarily be held by trustees, but which were properly held by them under those circumstances. In 1884, for reasons which commended themselves to the trustees, they purchased the interest of the mortgagor, not paying off the first mortgage, but giving a sum of £2,000 for the ultimate equity of redemption—that is to say, the equity of redemption as against the second mortgagees—viz., the trustees themselves—and that is all they did.

The question is, whether it was right of them to spend the money in that way. Now that must depend on the terms of the deed—in other words, the question is whether that was a proper investment of the trust funds authorized by the deed. The trust investments authorized by the deed are described with reference to the period commencing with the death of James Smith, who, as I have already mentioned, had control up to that time, and in construing the language of the deed with reference to that period the court is, I think, bound to leave out of sight the fact, which until then was all-important, that James Smith was the settlor, and not merely dictated the terms of the deed, but reserved to himself the full control. What he might have done in his lifetime, what he might be presumed to have thought desirable after his death, became on the happening of that event of no importance whatever. From that time the powers of the trustees must be guided by the terms of the deed, and no other standard. They are authorized to invest on divers securities which comprise among other things, freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or chattel real securities in England, Wales, or Ireland, and then follow words which, not perhaps in the most accurate language, authorize the trustees, contrary to the usual rule, to invest on an equitable mortgage provided that equitable mortgage is effected in a particular way. The words are "including equitable mortgages by a deposit." Those words in effect say "which securities shall for the purposes of this deed be deemed to include what they would not otherwise include, equitable mortgages by deposit, but not equitable mortgages effected in any other way." Then after that, by a subsequent clause, the trustees are empowered, in words which are of common form, to invest any of the trust funds in the purchase of freeholds or leaseholds of a certain term, and which are to be conveyed to them on trust for sale, so that the property, though purchased and taken in their names, is preserved as really an investment of the trust funds. There is nothing there to suggest any enlargement of the ordinary powers granted to trustees when they are authorized to purchase freeholds or leaseholds. There is nothing there to suggest that they could purchase either an equity of redemption or take any other property than that which, on the ordinary construction of a clause of that kind they would be authorized to take. But it is argued that it must be construed largely because the words "equitable mortgages by a deposit" are included in the previous clause. To my mind there is no foundation for that argument. No doubt where there is the slightest vagueness one may look to see what language has been employed in a previous clause; but I cannot construe a power to invest in the purchase of land by such a phrase as "including equitable mortgages by a deposit" in an investment clause of a dif-fesent character. Therefore I am brought back to the general question—can trustees who are authorized to invest in the purchase of land invest in the purchase of an equity of redemption?

That is the question broadly stated, notwithstanding that here the trustees were themselves the holders of the second mortgage, and, therefore, the question may be a little different from the abstract proposition which I have mentioned. My experience is entirely against any such investment. It is quite new to me that trustees may purchase an equity of redemption under such a power as is here contained, which, as I have already said, is substantially in the common form, nor has any authority in the shape of a decision been produced; only one case has been referred to, Ex parte Craven, and there the point arose in a very peculiar way. Persons who were entitled to a sum of £1,200 in court paid in by a railway company were anxious to purchase an adjoining estate for £2,800, and the difference between the £1,200 which they had available and the £2,800 which was the purchase-money was proposed to be provided by means of a mortgage. Of course, the proposed mortgagee would only take a first mortgage of the legal estate, and the result would have been that in the event there would have been conveyed to the uses of the settlement the equity of redemption—that is to say, the right to redeem the property which would have been mortgaged for £1,600—and the Vice-Chancellor refused the application, because it was in effect proposed to invest the money in court in the purchase of an equity of redemption, an investment which the trustees were not justified in making. The point before him was not whether trustees were justified in making it, because the money was paid into court apparently either under the Lands Clauses Act or one of those earlier Acts now represented by the Lands Clauses Act, and, as I gather from the report, the real question was not whether trustees were justified in making it, but whether it was an investment which the court could properly sanction under the Lands Clauses Act. I should gather from the report, which necessarily is rather scanty, that what the Vice-Chancellor meant was that such an investment was not one which the trustees would be justified in making under the common form of a power of investment, and likewise it was not an investment the court would be justified in sanctioning under the Lands Clauses Act. The application was made under the 69th section of the Lands Clauses Act, and that section authorizes money in court to be invested in the purchase of other lands to be conveyed, limited, and settled on the uses of the settlement. So far as it can be accepted as a decision at all, it seems to be one that the investment of money in the purchase of an equity of redemption is not an investment in the purchase of lands. That entirely confirms my own view of the real construction of such a clause as this. I think that on the proper construction an equity of redemption could not be purchased. An endeavour was made in the course of the argument to distinguish between what the trustees might do and what the trustees ought to do, and to say that the trustees are not to be held responsible for that which they may properly do according to the strict language of the deed, though it is not an investment which the court, if appealed to, would have sanctioned on their behalf. But the question which I have to consider is, whether the trustees were justified by the language of the power to make this investment, and I hold that they were not so justified.

The next question is an entirely different one. The present plaintiffs are entitled to a share of the property settled by the deed of 1874. Other persons entitled to a share of the same property under the same settlement took proceedings in 1878 against the trustees and against R. A. J. Worman, the father of the second and third plaintiffs in this action, for the execution of the trusts of the settlement, and they alleged breaches of trust and improper investment of the trust fund. What those alleged improper investments were, appeared in the answer of the defendants to the interrogatories delivered for their examination, and the improper investments turn out to be precisely those which are complained of in this litigation. With that question raised generally by the statement of claim, but particularly disclosed by the answers to interrogatories, a judgment was pronounced on the 16th of June, 1880, and an inquiry was directed upon what securities the trust funds were invested, and whether they were properly invested having regard to the powers of the settlement. Under that, no doubt, the whole story might have been brought out. The chief clerk might have found that this £2,000 was invested in the manner in which it was, in fact, invested, and the impropriety of that investment might have been certified or ascertained by further proceedings in the action. But the action never went any further; the parties came to an agreement, and they agreed that the plaintiffs in that action should take a sum of £2,500, and should have no further interest in the settled funds at all. In other words, it was agreed that, they receiving the £2,500, the trust fund should be divided as if they had not been interested in it, and it was necessary to have the sanction of the court to that. The trustees were, of course, entitled to that sanction, and, there being an action pending, could not wisely have allowed the compromise to be carried out without such sanction, and, moreover, there were infants concerned, notably the two plaintiffs in this case, and, therefore, the sanction of the court was required to bind them. The matter was brought before the court on petition, stating all the facts necessary for that purpose, but omitting any reference to the case which had been raised, and which was strictly and properly before the court on the inquiries directed by the judgment, and the court sanctioned the compromise and bound the infants to accept it, so as to bind the plaintiffs on the terms mentioned. It is said that the infants as well as the trustees, having been parties to that compromise, are not now entitled to say that these investments should be inquired into and the trustees made liable for any impropriety in the expenditure of the £2,000, and it is argued that it is res judicata. In support of that argument reference is made to the case of Henderson v. Henderson, and particularly to a passage in the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor on p. 115. I acknowledge the exact propriety of the language used by the Vice-Chancellor in the passage on which Mr. Hall relies, which is this:—"The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time." But that sentence must be read with reference to that which immediately precedes it, where the Vice-Chancellor states the rule of the court to be that, "where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in and of adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not (except under special circumstances) permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward, only because they have from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case." It seems to me that this question of the impropriety of this investment could not have been brought forward on the hearing of the petition for a compromise. It is true that after judgment all are actors, and that any one of the parties to that litigation might have insisted on the point which was raised by the inquiry being made the subject of adjudication. But when the parties, with the sanction of the court, were prepared to compromise their claims on the terms I have mentioned, it would have been improper then to have had this point raised. The trustees, no doubt, might have said, "We will not assent to this compromise, because there is the question open of the greatest importance to us, and we will insist on the point being determined." The answer would have been, "You are not concerned to have that question settled now. All that is proposed to do is to buy out the present plaintiffs, and you will be in no worse or better position because the plaintiffs are bought out, or rather if you are in any altered position at all you will have fewer persons to whom to account, and to that extent it will be rather better for you than worse." The other parties might have said, "We are content to buy out the plaintiffs, we wish to reserve our rights against the trustees in regard to this alleged impropriety of investment." But the court would have replied, "You must take care of yourselves about that, the only question is whether this compromise is to be sanctioned or not, and the fact that there may be a question remaining between you and the other parties interested and the trustees cannot possibly affect that compromise." I suppose that if the attention of the court had been called to this question some means would have been found of utilizing the pleadings, the answer to interrogatories, and the judgment; but notwithstanding that, there must have been some independent proceeding, something to set it in motion, and in addition to the order of compromise, because by the plaintiffs being bought out, the action was at an end. That conclusion seems to me to be in entire accordance with what is said by Lord Herschell in the case Concha v. Concha, 35 W. R. 479, 11 App. Cas. 552, where he put it, if I may say so, in an extremely strong manner by saying in effect, "This point in the judgment of the Probate Court was not open to appeal, because it was not essential to the decision; then how can it be said that it was a matter which bound the parties?"

The point now under consideration was not brought to the mind of the court at that time. It might have been brought to the mind of the court, but if it had been brought to the mind of the court it would not have stood for a moment in the way of the order for a compromise which was made, and it could not have affected that order, and I do not think that the present plaintiffs are in the slightest degree debarred from raising the question now, because it was not brought to the attention of the court either by them or the trustees, who, at least, were as much concerned in having the question raised and disposed of. The other cases cited on this point do not seem to me to have much direct bearing on it. In Askew v. Woodhead a somewhat litigious plaintiff, having got liberty to attend the proceedings in one action in which he could have raised and disposed of the question which he raised in another, was anxious to continue this action also, and, of course, there the court stopped him from so doing. In Serrao v. Noel the only question was whether a man might, as Mr. Warmington has described it, split his relief, and, having a right to an injunction and damages in respect of the same cause of action, first bring an action for the injunction and then afterwards for damages, and the only point discussed in the judgment was whether the court before whom the injunction came was competent to award damages; and as the court came to the conclusion that that might have been done, it followed that it ought to have been done, and so the second action could not be allowed.

It seems to me, therefore, whether it is regarded as res judicata, whether it is called estoppel, whether it is called release to the trustees, the defendants fail to make out that what was done in the former action is any bar to the relief sought by the plaintiffs in this action. The point was never brought up for adjudication. There was no inadvertence or mistake, or even accident, in not calling the attention of the court to it when that order for compromise was made, because it was entirely outside the compromise. The compromise really was not as between the trustees and the present plaintiffs, but as between the plaintiffs to that action and the other parties interested in the trust funds. As between them it was said, "It is better to buy the plaintiffs out; let them take a lump sum, which may be fairly estimated, as what they will eventually be entitled to, let them go, and then the rest of the fund will belong to us." The trustees were, of course, parties to the order—the court could not have made the order without their concurrence; but they were not parties to it in the sense of making the bargain; there was no bargain between them and the parties interested. They were only there to inform the court and protect the fund, and I think it is impossible to say that now they can set up a release arising from a bargain which was really never made by them.

On both points I am in favour of the plaintiffs, but I must say one word on the subject of costs. Although I cannot allow the trustees' defence of what they have done so as to relieve them from responsibility because they acted judiciously and did their best, still I observe from the recitals in the deed of 1884, and I conclude from what I have been told, that the trustees were in a position of extreme difficulty by reason of the embarrassment, possibly impending bankruptcy, of the mortgagor, and it may be that, though they did not do what the deed authorised, they did what was under the circumstances the best for the estate, and it may be if they had come to the court, the court would have in some way or other sanctioned their doing exactly what they did or something of that character. Their bona fides is not impeached. I do not think they can be said to have acted otherwise than as honest trustees, and I also think that, though it is necessary to have this point decided, the real point has not been brought against them so clearly as to make it incumbent on the court to say that they ought to have acknowledged their mistake and submit to judgment. Therefore in deciding against them, though I cannot give them their costs out of the estate, I see no reason to make them pay any costs.

Onslow v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Stamp duty—Settlement—Contingent interests—Investments liable to be varied—"Definite and certain amount of stock"—Proper stamp on settlement—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), schedule, "Settlement."

A marriage settlement was executed whereby certain stocks and other property were settled. The interest which the settlor had in the various stocks and property was contingent, and the investments representing the property comprised in such settlement could be varied by the trustees at pleasure.

Held, that this instrument was a "settlement" of a "certain and definite amount of stock" within the meaning of the word "settlement" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870, and required to be stamped accordingly with an ad valorem stamp of five shillings for every £100, in addition to the ordinary stamp of ten shillings as a deed.

Case stated by Commissioners of Inland Revenue, as to the proper amount of stamp duty chargeable upon a settlement made on the marriage of Denzil Onslow and Marion Onslow.

The instrument was presented to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under the provisions of the 18th section of the Stamp Act, 1870, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the amount of stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

The instrument was a settlement of certain moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, set forth in three schedules thereto, or of the interest of the said Marion Onslow therein, and the question was whether the said settlement was a settlement of a "certain definite amount of stock" within the meaning of the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870.

At the time the marriage settlement in question was executed the interest which the settlor, Marion Onslow, then took was as follows: first, one moiety in reversion, expectant upon the death of her mother, of the proceeds of the sale of certain real estate and the personal estate of her late uncle; the second interest which she took was a reversionary interest, expectant on the death of her mother, and subject to defeasance if her mother had any other children; the third interest was an interest in reversion expectant upon the deaths of her mother and aunt, contingent upon the death of the aunt without issue, and subject to revocation if her mother had other issue. The investments representing these several interests were in the hands of trustees, and were all liable to be varied at the pleasure of the trustees.

The Commissioners were of opinion that this marriage settlement was chargeable under the head "Settlement" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870, with an ad valorem duty of 5s. per £100, and also, by reference to section 8 of the Act, with the duty of 10s. as a "deed of any kind whatsoever not described in this schedule"; and they assessed the duty thereon accordingly, and the instrument was stamped according to that assessment.

Those interested under the settlement appealed against the assessment.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the said instrument was chargeable with the duty as aforesaid; if not, with what duty it was chargeable.

"Settlement" is defined in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870, as "any instrument, whether voluntary or upon any good or valuable consideration, other than a bonâ fide pecuniary consideration, whereby any definite and certain principal sum of money . . . or any definite and certain amount of stock, or any security, is settled or agreed to be settled in any manner whatsoever"; and the duty on the same is declared to be 5s. for every £100 of the amount or value of the property settled or agreed to be settled.

Horne Payne, Q.C. (Danckwerts with him), for the appellants.—An instrument, to come within the meaning of the word "settlement" in this schedule, must be a settlement of a "definite and certain principal sum of money, or of a definite and certain amount of stock." Here the interests which the settlor has are wholly contingent interests, and in indefinite stock, and so do not come within the words "definite and certain amount of stock." As the interests were contingent, the settlor, at the time of making the settlement, had no stock existing which could have been definite and certain, and therefore, on that ground, the instrument was not a "settlement of a certain and definite amount of stock." Moreover, the investments were liable to be varied by the trustees at will, and therefore the settlor had no legal right to the stock, as it was in the power of the trustees to vary the same: Sanville v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 W. R. 529, 10 Ex. 159.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Dicey, for the respondents, were not heard.

POLLOCK, B.—There are two points in this case, and it requires very little more than to state them, to answer them. It has been contended that the interest under the settlement was contingent upon the death of the aunt; that is one of the points. It amounts to this, that in a case in which the settlor is not in present possession of that which is settled, it is a settlement which does not require to be stamped. Apart from the words of the Stamp Act, it is a curious thing to say that a settlement which is perfectly good in law should yet, for the purposes of revenue, not be treated as a settlement which had the effect of disposing of the property. That is the real test. Now when we come to the language of the Act the matter is perfectly clear, because in the schedule it says, "any instrument whereby any certain and definite principal sum of money, . . . or any definite and certain amount of stock, is settled, or agreed to be settled." For this purpose, what is the interest of the settlor?

It is rather curious that in section 125 of the Act a covenant for the payment of an annuity by the person entitled to the income of the reversioner is dealt with, and that section shows that those who drew the Act had a good knowledge of everyday practice—that is to say, that when people are making a settlement, they settle contingent property as well as property in their own possession.

In certain ranks of life the ordinary rule is that old stock is converted in order to provide for a child about to be married, and to say that a man, when he settles a specific sum, is not making a settlement within the words of this section, is a contention I cannot understand.

Then the other point, which is more shadowy still, is whether this was not specific stock. Although the parties have given in the schedule the actual specific stock now held by the trustees, it is argued that it is not to be treated as specific stock because at any time it may be changed by the trustees. It sometimes happens that a specific stock is made unconvertible, and in a case of that kind the argument would not apply. It would be curious that in that case there should be stamp duty payable, but no stamp duty payable where the trustees have the ordinary option of converting the stock. I cannot see that the words of the Act, "specific stock," affect that favourably to the appellants in any sense, and it is sufficient to say that in this case there is now an existing stock, and that stock, if changed afterwards, is within the power created by the original settlement, and it does not require much consideration to say that, if one stock is sold and another stock is bought, though it is a different stock, it is for all legal purposes the same stock as that which is dealt with in the settlement. It seems to me there is no ground for the contention.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have nothing further to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Pyman Brothers v. Dreyfus Brothers & Co. (a.)

Shipping—Charter-party—Demurrage—Arrival in outer harbour—Computing of lay days.

By charter-party it was agreed that the plaintiffs' vessel should "proceed to Odessa, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and load, twelve running days to be allowed for loading and discharging, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days." The vessel arrived at a point in the outer harbour of Odessa, which was as near as she could safely get to a loading berth, and the captain gave notice to the defendants' (the charterers) agents that she was ready to load. The cargo was stored at a quay in the inner harbour, and the agents were unwilling to load it where the vessel then was. It was impracticable to load the steamship except at some quay in either the inner or outer harbour, but there was no custom by which ships were considered ready to receive cargo only when moored alongside the quay. The ship was not loaded till after the lapse of twelve days from the time of her arrival in the outer harbour owing to the crowded condition of the quay which was selected for her loading.

Held, that the lay days were to be computed from the time when the vessel arrived in the outer harbour, and that the defendants were liable for demurrage.

This was a motion by the defendants, charterers of the vessel Lizzie English to set aside an award which was made in favour of the owners in respect of a claim made by them for demurrage and detention at Odessa, the port of loading.

The charter-party stipulated that the vessel should proceed to Odessa, or so near thereunto as she could safely get, and there load a cargo which she was to take elsewhere, and "twelve running days to be allowed for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days at fourpence per ton on the steamer's gross registered tonnage per running day."

The award found that on the 22nd of December, 1888, the Lizzie English reached the outer harbour at Odessa and as near "as she might safely get" to a loading berth; that on that day the captain gave the charterers' agents notice that she was ready to load; that there were then no practicable means of loading there except at a quay in the outer or inner harbour; that a cargo was then ready for loading, and that the defendants were then willing to load it, if and so soon as the steamer got a loading berth alongside a quay in the inner harbour where the cargo was stored, but not before; that the harbour master refused to allow the steamer to go to a loading berth either in the outer or inner harbour until her regular turn came; that there was not at that time a custom at the port of Odessa that "steamships under charter-party were not considered ready to receive cargo until after being moored alongside the quays"; and that the Lizzie English was ordered in her turn to a quay berth in the inner harbour on the 8th of January, 1889, and the defendants began to load her on the 10th of January and completed her loading on the 15th of January, and occupied in loading and discharging her altogether twelve days.

Upon these facts the arbitrator found that the lay days commenced on the 22nd of December, 1888, and expired on the 5th of January, 1889, and that the defendants were liable to pay the plaintiffs £456 16s. for demurrage and detention of the vessel.

Barnes, Q.C. (W. English Harrison with him), for the defendants.—The finding of the arbitrator, that "there was no practical means of loading at Odessa except at or alongside a quay berth," shows that the lay days under the charter-party did not begin to run until the vessel obtained a quay berth. It was held in Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 331, and Tapscott v. Balfour, 21 W. R. 245, L. R. 8 C. P. 46, that the lay days began to run from the time of getting into dock as opposed to that of obtaining a quay berth, but the ground of those decisions was that the dock itself was the usual place for loading. That was not the case at Odessa, for the usual place of loading there was some quays either in the outer or inner harbour. A ship, therefore, which was chartered to load at Odessa, could not rightly be said to have arrived until she had obtained a loading berth at a quay. Further, the time from the 22nd of December to the 8th of January was not an unreasonable time for the captain to wait in order to obtain a place for his ship at a loading berth: Nelson v. Dahl, 29 W. R. 543, 6 App. Cas. 38.

Cohen, Q.C. (J. G. Witt with him), for the plaintiffs.—The arbitrator has found as a fact that ships were loaded at Odessa both in the outer harbour and in the inner harbour, and also that "there is no custom at Odessa by which steamships under charter are not considered ready to receive cargo until after being moored alongside the quay." The outer harbour, therefore, was one of the usual places of loading at Odessa, and the ship, having arrived there, had arrived at Odessa within the meaning of the charter-party, and the lay days began to run from that time. The defendants were no doubt within their right in ordering the vessel to the inner harbour, but, after she had got into the outer harbour, it became immaterial when she might obtain a quay berth. As soon as the lay days commenced the defendants became responsible to the plaintiffs for any failure to load within the stipulated time in whatever way that failure was occasioned, unless it was done by the negligence of the captain or other agent of the plaintiffs. The cause of the failure in this case was the dock regulation as to ships taking their turn at the quay, so that the defendants are clearly liable. This is shown in Brett, L.J.'s judgment in Nelson v. Dahl, and in the cases of Brown v. Johnson and Tapscott v. Balfour. [He cited also Carver on the Law of Carriage by Sea, section 627, p. 629; Davies v. McVeagh, 28 W. R. 143, 4 Ex. D. 265; and Murphy v. Coffin, 32 W. R. 616, 12 Q. B. D. 87.]

Barnes, Q.C., in reply.—The case for the defendants is supported by the decision in Brereton v. Chapman, 7 Bing. 559, and Kell v. Anderson, 10 M. & W. 498.

Huddleston, B.—I am of opinion that the decision of the arbitrator was correct. The court has to consider the terms of the charter-party in connection with the facts found in the award. According to the charter-party the plaintiff's steamship, the Lizzie English, was "to proceed to Odessa or so near thereunto as she might safely get and load." The arbitrator finds that on the 22nd of December the plaintiffs brought the Lizzie English into the outer harbour at Odessa "as near as she might safely get" to a loading berth, and gave the defendants notice that she was then ready to load. He finds that at Odessa it was impracticable to load the steamship except at some quay in either the outer or the inner harbour; that she might have been loaded at a quay berth in the outer harbour in which she arrived on the 22nd of December, but that she was in fact loaded at a quay berth in the inner harbour, which she did not reach till a subsequent date in January, that the defendants would only load her in the inner harbour as the cargo was stored there, and that, owing to the rules of the port and its crowded condition, when she arrived she could not have obtained a quay berth in either harbour earlier. It was conceded by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs that the defendants were entitled to order the vessel from the outer into the inner harbour where the cargo was, and that the time occupied in so moving her ought not to be reckoned as part of the lay days under the charter party. Under these circumstances the question is, whether the lay days are to be computed from the 22nd of December, when the ship reached the outer harbour, or from the date at which she obtained a loading berth in the inner harbour?

The solution of this question is, I think, to be found in a passage in the judgment delivered by the present Master of the Rolls in Nelson v. Dahl, 28 W. R., at p. 60: "If the place named be of the larger description, as a port or dock, the notice may be given though the ship is not then in the particular part of the port or dock in which the particular cargo is to be loaded, but if the place named is of the more limited description, the notice cannot be given until the ship is at the named place, though the ship is in the port or dock in which the named place is situated."

Had the contract been that the ship was "to proceed to the inner harbour at Odessa and load" she could not be said to have arrived within the meaning of the charter-party till the 6th of January, when she reached the inner harbour, and the arbitrator would have been wrong. But the contract is that she is "to proceed to Odessa and load." This is satisfied by her arrival in the outer harbour at Odessa on the 22nd of December. The plaintiffs gave notice, as they were entitled to do, of their readiness to load on her arrival there on that day, and the lay days are to be calculated, as the arbitrator has calculated them, from that day. The same distinction was drawn by my learned brother Mathew, J., in his judgment in Murphy v. Coffin.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the conclusion arrived at by the arbitrator a perfectly correct one. It is unnecessary and it would be pedantic to repeat the clear and felicitous statements of the law which have been made by learned judges as from time to time they have been called upon to pronounce judgment in cases of this kind. The case of Nelson v. Dahl contains a valuable epitome of all the previous authorities. In this case it appears from the award, that Odessa the port to which this vessel had to go to load under her charter-party, was a port containing various places of loading, some at the quays in the outer, some at those in the inner harbour. Now, as was conceded by the learned counsel for the shipowners, the charterers were entitled, when the vessel arrived at Odessa, to require the captain to take her to some proper and usual berth to load. Had therefore the contract contained no stipulation as to the time within which the loading was to take place, it is obvious that the shipowners would have been exposed to the risk of the vessel being ordered to some crowded berth, where she might have been delayed for a considerable time. The loss and inconvenience which this delay might occasion to the shipowners would be a much more serious matter than any inconvenience likely to be caused to the charterers. One can conjecture, as is often the case as regards contracts of this and similar kinds, in the course of the negotiations the charterers say to the shipowners, "You must send your ship to Odessa." The shipowners reply, "There are several places at Odessa at which you will be entitled to call upon us to load. Some of these places may be crowded, and you may send our ship to one of these crowded places." The charterers meet this by saying, "We consent to enter into an obligation in the charter-party to load the vessel within a certain time." It might be premature to attempt to unearth the principle upon which the interpretation of such stipulations in contracts of affreightment depends with a view to laying down a rule of general application, but I think that in the particular class of cases of which the present is an example it may be stated to be the rule that where the port of loading or discharge named in the contract contains several places of loading or discharge, and the contract also names a time in which the vessel is to be loaded or discharged, the option of the merchant in the selection of the places of loading or discharge is to be exercised subject to the obligation into which he has entered, that the cargo shall be loaded or discharged within the time named. Here the vessel arrived on the 22nd of December at a point where she was at the disposition of the charterers. They had only to indicate the place to which she was to go for her cargo, and she would have been there immediately. The place of loading chosen by the charterers was a place where she could not load, as it was a part of the port then crowded by other ships, and she had to wait a considerable time. It appears to me that during all this time the charterers were contracting a liability under this contract that the ship should be loaded during the time specified in the charter-party. Accordingly the lay days are to be computed from the 22nd of December, and the plaintiffs are entitled to the sum awarded to them by the arbitrator in respect of demurrage and detention. The motion will, therefore, be dismissed.

In the Goods of AMELIA CLARK. (a.)

Administration—Wife's estate—Husband not heard of for more than seven years—Application to presume death.

Where a husband had not been heard of for more than seven years, the court refused to allow a party applying for administration to the estate of his wife to presume the husband's death.

Per curiam.—The applicant would be entitled to take the grant on swearing her belief that the deceased died a widow.

Motion on behalf of Mary Hannah Jackson for liberty to presume the death of Joseph Marshall Clark as and from July, 1880, and for a grant of letters of administration to her of the personal estate and effects of Amelia Clark, deceased.

Amelia Clark, late of Leeds, in the county of York, died on the 14th of March, 1889, intestate, without child or parent, and leaving Mary Hannah Jackson, her sister, and one of her next of kin, her surviving.

Amelia Clark was, on the 12th of November, 1868, married at Demerara to Joseph Marshall Clark, engineer of the railway there, and she lived with him at various places until he went to Chili in January, 1870, she remaining in England. He continued to correspond with his wife in England till July, 1872, when the letters ceased suddenly, and from that date nothing further had been heard of or from him.

Deane, in support of the motion.—The death of the husband ought to be presumed at a date seven years after he was last heard of.

BUTT, J., refused to make any order, as it was not usual for the court to give leave to presume the death of a husband in such cases. The applicant would be entitled to take the grant on swearing her belief that the deceased died a widow.

Motion refused.

Soper v. Arnold. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Forfeiture of deposit—Defect in title—Common mistake.

A contract for the sale of real property contained the usual conditions of sale and the ordinary provisions as to the forfeiture of the deposit. The vendor's title was fully disclosed and accepted, but the balance of the purchase-money was not paid and the deposit forfeited. The property was afterwards sold to someone else, when a flaw in the title was discovered.

Held, in an action to recover the deposit by the former purchaser, that, the title having been accepted, the contract went off owing to his default, and that he could not recover.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, L.J., Sir James Hannen, and Lopes, L.J.), reported 36 W. R. 207, 37 Ch. D. 96, affirming Kekewich, J., reported 35 W. R. 451, 35 Ch. D. 384.

By an agreement dated the 4th of November, 1882, and made between the respondents, Arnold and Patten, of the one part, and the appellant, Soper, of the other part, the respondents agreed to sell to the appellant certain freehold property at Teignmouth for £6,100, of which sum £610 was to be paid on signing the agreement, and the remainder on the completion of the sale.

The agreement contained the usual condition providing that if the purchaser should fail to comply with the conditions of sale his deposit should be forfeited to the vendors, who should be at liberty to resell the property.

The £610 was deposited with the respondents, the abstract of title delivered and approved, but the appellant was unable to find the balance of the purchase-money when the time arrived for completion, and the respondents thereupon rescinded the agreement and retained the deposit as forfeited.

In June, 1885, the respondents agreed to sell the property to F. Slocombe, who took an objection to the title on the ground that a power of sale, under which the land had been purported to be sold to the defendants, did not really exist. And by an order of Chitty, J., upon a summons under the Vendors and Purchasers Act, 1874, it was declared that a good title to the hereditaments had not been shown. Thereupon the appellant demanded repayment from the respondents of his deposit, with interest, and commenced this action, which was dismissed, with costs, by Kekewich, J., and by the Court of Appeal.

(a.) Reported by Charles H. Grafton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 29.—Lord Herschell.—The only question raised by this appeal is whether the appellant is entitled to recover from the respondents a sum of £610, which was paid to them some years ago as a deposit upon a contract of sale made between the appellant and the trustees of the will of Mr. Arnold, whereby the trustees agreed to sell certain property to the appellant for the sum of £6,100. By the conditions of sale it was provided that "all objections and requisitions (if any) in respect of the title or the abstract, or anything appearing therein respectively, shall be stated in writing and sent to the vendors' solicitor within seven days from the delivery of the abstract, and all objections and requisitions not sent within that time shall be considered to be waived, and in this respect time shall be deemed the essence of the contract."

An abstract was delivered by the trustees to the appellant. That abstract disclosed that Mr. Arnold had purchased from the trustees of the will of Mr. Henry Hoare, and that those trustees had purported to sell to Mr. Arnold under the authority of a power contained in the will. The abstract disclosed the terms of the will; it showed exactly the terms of the power which the trustees had purported to exercise in selling. The solicitors of Mr. Soper, the purchaser, made certain requisitions and objections. Some of the objections, indeed, were connected with the fact of the sale having taken place by the trustees of Mr. Hoare under the powers of his will; but they took no exceptions to the title except such as were removed to their satisfaction, and ultimately they accepted and approved the title. That fact is distinctly stated in the statement of defence to the action, and is not traversed in the reply, and therefore we may take it—indeed, we are bound to take it—that the title was so accepted and approved.

Thereupon a conveyance would have followed in the natural course; but the appellant, as is admitted, was unable to find the balance of the purchase-money, and for that sole reason the payment of the balance was not made, and the transaction was not carried through by a conveyance and the payment of the purchase-money accordingly. The time having elapsed when the payment was to be made, the vendors served a notice upon the appellant that, unless he paid the money in accordance with the contract within fourteen days, they should rescind the contract and not be under any further obligation to carry it out and complete the purchase. No payment was made, nothing was done, and matters remained in that position, the deposit continuing to be held by the respondents.

So matters stood for some years, until the present action was brought, in which the appellant seeks to recover back the money which he so paid, upon the ground that the trustees of the will of Mr. Henry Hoare had not power to sell the estate except upon a condition which had not happened. It must be taken, I think, for the purposes of this appeal, that the trustees had not the full power of sale which they purported to exercise; that their power was only exercisable absolutely in case there were no children of the marriage who could become entitled to the property under the trusts of the will; and it appears that there is a daughter of the marriage who, on her majority, will become entitled under those trusts. There was, therefore, the plaintiff insists, a defect in the title such as I have called attention to; and his point is this:—He says: "Inasmuch as I now discover that at the time when I paid the deposit on the sale, and at the time when I failed to pay the residue of the purchase-money and you declared the contract to be at an end, you, the trustees, the vendors, could not have made out a good title to the property, therefore I am entitled to have my deposit back."

Now, as I have pointed out, the defect, such as it was, was communicated, on the very face of the abstract of title, to the appellant, and was as well known to him as to the trustees at the time when he accepted and approved the title. There can be no doubt that if he had possessed the money and had been in a position to pay it, notwithstanding that defect, the residue of the purchase-money would have been paid and a conveyance executed. I apprehend that it is clear that if that had taken place no objection could afterwards have been taken to the title such as is now suggested, and no relief could have been obtained on account of the defect to which I have alluded. How does the matter stand, then, with regard to the deposit? The deposit is given as a security for the performance of the contract. The appellant admittedly cannot recover that deposit if it was through his default that the transaction was not completed. Now, under the circumstances which I have detailed, I cannot doubt that it must be regarded as a contract uncompleted through the default of the appellant. As I have said, he took no exception to the title—he was willing to take that title; he had intimated his willingness to take that title by accepting and approving of it, and the trustees, the vendors, were ready and willing to convey to him that title, which he had so intimated his willingness to accept. But he, although he did not object to the title at all, was not prepared to carry out his contract—he had not the means, and that became known to the vendors. Thereupon they, after due notice, determined the contract as against him.

Now, when an action is brought by the appellant to recover the deposit, and the objection is taken that the vendors were not able to make out what is in law a complete and perfect title, the answer seems to me to be this, that the vendors were perfectly ready and willing to convey to the appellant that title which he had accepted and approved and declared himself willing to take, and the contract only went off because he afterwards was not in a position or prepared to carry it out on his part. That seems to me to show that it was owing to his default that the contract came to an end; and I venture very much to doubt whether, under circumstances such as I have described, if the vendors had brought an action for specific performance to compel him to complete the purchase and to pay the residue of the purchase-money, he could have resisted such an action on the ground, even if he had then ascertained that it was a fact or realized that it was a fact, that there was some defect in the title. No authority has been cited to show that, under such conditions, where a purchaser has accepted and approved a title, all the facts being known to him at that time, he can resist a decree for specific performance and claim to have the title investigated, and not have it declared that he has accepted the title, and that he is, therefore, bound specifically to perform his contract. However, it is not necessary to decide that point. If that be the case, it seems to me that it would be out of all reason to suppose that he could recover the deposit on the ground that the contract had come to an end, not through his default, but through that of the vendors, when the circumstances were such that they could have compelled him specifically to perform the contract. But, as I have said, I do not think it necessary to determine this point, because, for the reasons which I have stated, it seems to me that he was in default, that the contract went off owing to his default, and that under those circumstances he cannot recover the deposit. It seems to me that any other decision would lead to most inconvenient consequences, because, under circumstances such as these, where trustees were selling, the deposit might have been distributed by them amongst their beneficiaries, and then, at any time within six years afterwards, if the purchaser discovered that there was some defect of title which would have prevented their making out a perfect conveyancing title, he could bring an action against the trustees to recover back the deposit which he had so paid, though he had accepted and never taken any objection to the title. That would be a result which would be productive of the gravest inconvenience. I know of no authority in point of law to warrant it, and I therefore move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

Lord FITZGERALD.—I have, during the course of this rather singular and unusual case, had upon my mind a considerable degree of hesitation in affirming the judgment of the court below; but a great deal of it has been removed, I must confess, by the argument which Mr. Barber has addressed to us. Therefore, while I shall add a few words, I am able to say that I do not dissent from the judgment which has been announced by Lord Herschell—nay, more, that I concur in it.

The case is very singular, and the hesitation which I have expressed was based upon certain legal propositions which I had in my mind and thought ought to govern the case. Now I look upon it as settled that where money is paid to another under the influence of a mistake—that is to say, upon the supposition that a fact is true, which fact is untrue—an action will lie to recover that money back again; and, furthermore, if the purchaser here parted with his money under a mistake it seems to be rather against justice and good conscience that the receivers of that money, who fell into the same mistake themselves, should retain it.

Now, I must observe that the parties here have been perfectly candid—indeed, the pleadings and the course of the case have been quite refreshing. There is no controversy between them as to fact. In truth, the statement of claim seems to have been framed in that perfectly candid manner which characterizes it with a view to invite a decision upon demurrer; and in the defence the principal statements put forward are not controverted.

Now, how did the case arise? The defendants offered for sale certain property. It was not a sale by auction, it was a private sale, and in the contract of sale I find what the defendants professed to be selling:—"The vendors shall sell and the purchaser shall purchase the freehold property called 'The Rowdens,' at Teignmouth, in the county of Devon, and the inheritance thereof in fee simple in possession free from incumbrances." The language is quite specific. The purchase-money is £6,100, of which sum the sum of £610—that is, part of the purchase-money—is to be paid "immediately after the signing of this agreement," and the remainder on a given day. So that the sum of £610 was part of the purchase-money, though it fulfilled the double purpose of also being a security to the vendors that the purchase would be gone on with and completed, and the concluding provision of the conditions of sale shows that that was partially the object of the deposit.

Now there has been a mistake here for which neither party is to blame. The vendor put forward his case very candidly upon the abstract of title. I do not mean to say that he disclosed the defect, or stated the defect, or communicated the defect of the title, but he disclosed the will of Mr. Hoare, which was the foundation of his title, and he disclosed that accurately. But he had committed an error (I assume for the present purpose that it was an error) in the deduction which he had made from that will in supposing that the trustees of Mr. Hoare had a right to sell until the limitations to his children had failed to take effect; that defect, if it is an error, goes to the very root of the title; for, though it is true that the abstract offered to the purchaser the life estate of Mrs. Hoare, which was still in existence, yet beyond that, supposing that error to exist, the purchaser, if he had completed the purchase, would have got nothing—he would only have got the life estate of Mrs.

Hoare. He would have got the legal estate in fee no doubt, but he would have got it bound with a trust the period for the carrying out of which had not arrived, because it could not arrive until the death of Mrs. Hoare. So that, assuming the construction put upon that will by Chitty, J., to be well founded, all the purchaser would have got would have been simply the life estate of Mrs. Hoare. I need not say that that is not "an estate of inheritance in fee simple free from incumbrances."

The vendors I acquit of all intentional misrepresentation or the slightest insinuation of fraud in their conduct. If there was an error on their part the purchaser or his solicitor fell into the same error; and the language of the will is so obscure and so difficult to interpret that I can quite understand how all the legal gentlemen concerned in this purchase fell into a common error; but the thing, if it is an error, is transparent always, supposing the decision of Chitty, J., to be well founded; upon that I offer no opinion.

The transaction then proceeded, and the abstract was finished, and certain requisitions were made; but I do not find that any requisition was made in respect of the will of Mr. Hoare or anything connected with it, save this:—"The succession duty payable in respect of the estate of the late Henry Arthur Hoare should be commuted and paid or provision must be made for payment thereof." I think that is the only allusion to the will. In truth, both parties fell into a common error, and they did not see it until the case came before Chitty, J. It is quite true that the purchaser was unable to complete his purchase, but his solicitor raised no objection to the title on this ground. The other objections were mere objections of conveyancing, things required to be done; rights of way and matters of that kind were provided for; but amongst the requisitions there is no objection whatever going to the title; that is passed over in silence, and it is the foundation of a common mistake in respect of which the plaintiff alleges that he is entitled to recover the £610.

I cannot say either that there is any laches on the part of the plaintiff. Unfortunately he became a lunatic in 1883, probably before the time arrived for completing the contract, and though he had a partial recovery of his reason and was discharged in April, 1883, yet, in 1884, he became a lunatic again, and remained under confinement until the close of that year. Those misfortunes are such as rather to excite sympathy and to incline one to look with narrowness in order to see whether he ought not to be entitled to recover this £610. But, of course, those reasons cannot influence the House in its judgment in point of law if, in point of law, he is not entitled to maintain this action.

Now I wish again to refer to the course taken by the respondents in this litigation in the argument below and in the argument here, for up to the very latest stage to-day, until we had heard Mr. Barber, I was under the idea that this common error was admitted, that the decision of Chitty, J., was not questioned, and that there was a defect of title, and a defect which could not be removed, but went to the very root of this title in fee, and prevented the trustees of Mr. Hoare from ever giving what could be called "an inheritance in fee simple." It is now said (I daresay with truth) that that decision may be questioned. I express no opinion whatever upon that as to whether the decision is or is not well founded. But it has struck me that the proper course to adopt would have been to have said in reply to this demand of the plaintiff, the purchaser, when he instituted this suit to recover his money, after Chitty, J.'s decision:—"We deny that the title was a bad title. It is true we did not carry it beyond Chitty, J., because the expense would have been great, and we can find a purchaser notwithstanding that decision; but we deny that it was a bad title, and, furthermore, we deny that you have a right to question it, and we refuse to enter into the question with you." I confess that the authorities cited rather bring my mind to that view. If that course had been taken in place of the one which was adopted in the court below, in the Court of Appeal, and here, the question presented to us would have been: After the purchaser has accepted the title, having had it fully laid before him, although the objection to it was not communicated because it was not known or did not strike the parties, still, having had an opportunity of judging for himself, and not having rejected the title, on the contrary, having accepted it, can he make this claim? He says, and says truly:—"I would have carried out the transaction to a conveyance if I had had the means of paying the balance of the purchase-money, but I was obliged to drop it because I had not the money." I confess I am very much shaken by that view. If the true course had been adopted the decision of the Court of Appeal should have been, not upon the ground upon which it went in this case, but upon the ground—"This question is closed; we cannot permit you to reopen it; you having once accepted the title, even if there has been error in fact, we cannot help you—you must abide by the consequences."

Whilst I express these opinions upon the case, I confess I am very unwilling to do so, because I cannot fail to see that this case involves, in addition to the ordinary questions of law which it presents, a good deal of the practice of conveyancers, and the practice of conveyancers I have always understood to be a portion of equity practice, with which I am not familiar, and I have some hesitation in expressing an opinion upon it. But, upon the whole, though I had some hesitation in the course of the case, I think that the sounder view to take is that which has now been presented at the close of the case, that this objection is not open to the plaintiff, and that he cannot succeed in recovering the part of the purchase-money which he seeks to recover.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I certainly mean no reflection on the learned counsel for the appellant, who has argued the case with perfect fairness and much ability, if I say that the appellant's claim seems to me to be groundless and almost absurd.

There was a contract for the sale of some real property. There were the usual conditions of sale. There was a deposit paid, and there were the ordinary provisions as to the forfeiture of the deposit. An abstract was delivered, the vendor's title was fully disclosed, that title was duly accepted and approved, the conveyance was prepared, and everything was ready for completion; but when the time came for paying the price, the balance of the purchase-money was not forthcoming. The purchaser had to abandon the contract, the deposit was forfeited, and the matter was closed, and I think finally closed, between the vendor and purchaser. Everybody knows what a deposit is. The purchaser did not want legal advice to tell him that. The deposit serves two purposes—if the purchase is carried out it goes against the purchase-money—but its primary purpose is this, it is a guarantee that the purchaser means business, and if there is a case in which a deposit is rightly and properly forfeited it is, I think, when a man enters into a contract to buy real property without taking the trouble to consider whether he can pay for it or not.

Some years after the deposit was forfeited it appears there was a contract to sell the property to someone else, and that person found out a flaw in the title which, in the opinion of a learned judge, prevented the vendor from enforcing the contract. The appellant now comes forward and says: "Give me back my money, because if I had found out that flaw I should not have allowed my money to be forfeited." I am not sure that every judge would have taken the same view of the construction of Mr. Hoare's will that Chitty, J., took; but I express no opinion upon that, and I assume that this flaw was a fatal defect in the title.

The real answer to the claim of the appellant, I think, is that the deposit was forfeited for a good and sufficient reason. It was forfeited because the purchaser could not pay the stipulated price, and for no other reason. If, instead of forfeiting the deposit, the vendor had brought an action for specific performance after the purchaser had accepted and approved the title, as it is admitted in this case he did, he would, I think, have been entitled to a judgment for specific performance, with a declaration that the title had been accepted, and I apprehend the court would have declined to go into any question as to the construction of Mr. Hoare's will. Under these circumstances, in my opinion, it would be most inequitable to allow the appellant, on a purely hypothetical state of circumstances, to reopen a matter which has been finally closed.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

General average—Jettison—Master's default—Right to contribution.

Where jettison was rendered necessary by the master's default in navigating the ship,

Held, that the owners of the cargo jettisoned were entitled to general average.

The owner of goods sacrificed for the common benefit has (1) a direct claim against each of the owners of the ship and cargo for a pro ratâ contribution towards his indemnity, and (2) a lien, to be enforced through the master, upon each parcel of goods salved belonging to a separate consignee for a due proportion of his individual claim.

Hallett v. Bousfield, 18 Ves. 187, explained.

This was an appeal from an order of the Recorder of Rangoon, dated the 15th of August, 1887, whereby he decided in favour of the respondents in an action by them for a sum of money paid under protest to the appellants, agents for a ship on which the respondents were consignees of cargo, and claimed by the appellants for general average to meet losses of jettison.

The recorder found that the jettison was caused by the negligence of the master, and held that no claim to general average contribution could, therefore, be enforced.

The facts appear in their lordships' judgment.

Finlay, Q.C., and Barnes, Q.C., for the appellants.—The respondents are liable to contribute to general average as owners of goods salved by the jettison. The master's negligence having caused the jettison makes no difference to the rights of the innocent owners of the goods so lost. Bigham, Q.C., and Fitzgerald, for the respondents. The grounding of the vessel and consequent jettison were the faults of the master, who was the ship-owner's agent, not the agent of all concerned, in what he did. The practice of general average is not applicable in the circumstances of this case: 2 Parsons on Marine Insurance, pp. 217, 225; Abbott on Shipping, ed. 1881, p. 449. Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord WATSON, Lord FITZGERALD, Lord HOBHOUSE, and Lord MACNAGHTEN) was delivered by Lord WATSON.—The steamship Abington, on her way from London to Rangoon, with a general cargo, ran aground on the Baragua Flats in the Gulf of Martaban. Part of the cargo was thrown overboard in order to lighten the vessel, which was got off by that means, and was enabled to reach her destination in safety on the 19th of October, 1886. On the day of her arrival in the port of Rangoon, the appellants, Strang, Steel, & Co., local agents for the ship, intimated to the respondents, A. Scott & Co., and other consignees of the cargo then on board that a deposit of one per cent. upon the value of their goods would be required before delivery "against probable average claim"; and on the following day they made a further intimation that the amount of deposit required would be five per cent. A correspondence ensued, in the course of which the respondents made various tenders, all of which were declined; and on the 25th of October, six days after the arrival of The Abington, they paid the required deposit, amounting to Rs.1,592 11, under protest, and obtained delivery of their goods.

The respondents, on the 27th of October, 1886, instituted the present suit in the Court of the Recorder of Rangoon for recovery of their deposit, and for damages on account of the detention of their goods, upon the allegation that they had before payment made a tender entitling them to delivery. Upon the same day on which their plaint was filed the respondents applied to the court, under section 492 of the Civil Code, for an injunction to restrain the appellants, Strang, Steel, & Co., from remitting to England, or removing from the jurisdiction of the court, the deposit paid to them on the 25th of October. These appellants judicially undertook to retain the amount claimed in their own possession, subject to the orders of the court, without the issue of a formal injunction, and no further proceedings have been taken in that application.

On the 5th of February, 1887, the respondents were allowed to add to their original ground of action an allegation to the effect that they were not liable to contribute for general average on account of either ship or cargo, because the grounding of The Abington and the consequent jettison of part of the cargo were due to the default, negligence, and misconduct of her master. Upon the pleadings thus amended, the case was twice tried before the recorder, who ultimately, on the 15th of August, 1887, gave the respondents decree for Rs.1,592 11, and for Rs.200, in name of damages, with costs of suit. The learned judge found, as matter of fact, that the stranding of the ship upon the Baragua Flats was occasioned by the negligent navigation of the master; and he held, as matter of law, that no claim for general average arises to the owners of cargo jettisoned when the peril which necessitated jettison is induced by the fault of the ship. Whilst resting his decision upon that ground, the learned judge indicated that, in his opinion, the respondents had made a tender entitling them to demand immediate delivery of their goods before they paid the deposit to the appellants.

In the course of the argument upon this appeal three separate points were raised and fully discussed. The appellants argued (1) that innocent owners of cargo sacrificed for the common good are not disabled from recovering a general contribution by the circumstance that the necessity for the sacrifice was brought about by the ship-master's fault; (2) that in respect the bills of lading for the cargo of The Abington specially excepted "any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilots, master, or crew in the management or navigation of the ship," the owners of cargo saved are not, so far as concerns any question of contribution, in a position to plead the fault of the master; and (3) that the respondents did not, before the 25th of October, 1886, make a sufficient legal tender. The parties were not agreed as to the facts upon which the second of these contentions is based; but there was no controversy as to the facts upon which the first and third of them depend. It was conceded by the appellants that The Abington was stranded through the negligence of her master; and, on the other hand, the respondents admitted that the effect of her stranding was to place both ship and cargo in a position of such imminent danger as to make it prudent and necessary to sacrifice part of the cargo in order to preserve the remainder of it and the ship. The question whether the respondents made a legal tender depends upon the construction of the correspondence which passed between the parties in October, 1886.

The first question raised is one of general importance, and, so far as their lordships are aware, has never been made matter of direct decision in this country. It may be convenient in dealing with it to consider first of all the rights and remedies which the owners of cargo thrown overboard have in a proper case of jettison. Some of the qualities of their right, and of the remedies by which it may be enforced, have been authoritatively defined. Each owner of jettisoned goods becomes a creditor of ship and cargo saved, and has a direct claim against each of the owners of ship and cargo for a pro ratâ contribution towards his indemnity, which he can enforce by a direct action. In Dobson v. Wilson Lord Ellenborough said, "If a shipper of goods which are sacrificed for the salvation of the rest of the cargo is entitled to receive a contribution from another shipper whose goods are saved, I know not how I can say that this may not be recovered by an action at law. This is a legal right, and must be accompanied with a legal remedy."

Again, it is settled law that, in the case of a general ship, the owner of goods sacrificed for the common benefit has a lien upon each parcel of goods salved belonging to a separate consignee for a due proportion of his individual claim. The cargo not being in his possession or subject to his control, his right of lien can only be enforced through the ship-master, whom the law of England, following the principles of the Lex Rhodia, regards as his agent for that purpose. The duty being imposed by law upon the master, he is answerable for its neglect. In the course of the argument his liability in that respect was questioned upon the authority of certain dicta of Lord Eldon's in Hallett v. Bousfield, 18 Ves., at p. 190. The circumstances of that case were very special. One of a number of persons alleging a right to contribution applied for an injunction to restrain the master from delivering the cargo without taking security, the bulk of them having consented to his so doing. Lord Eldon expressed a doubt whether it was the right of every owner of part of the jettisoned cargo to compel the captain to call on every owner of cargo saved to give security; but he dismissed the application on the ground that there was no instance of such an equitable remedy having been granted. Courts of equity are chary of granting injunctions which may lead to inconvenient results; and it does not follow from Hallett v. Bousfield that a master might not be restrained from making delivery of the cargo, at the instance of all or most of those entitled to contribution, without taking security for their claims. But their lordships see no reason to doubt that, assuming the applicant's claim for contribution in that case to have been well founded, he would have had his remedy at law. In Crooks & Co. v. Allan Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Lush held that a master or shipowner is bound to exercise the power he is invested with when a general loss has arisen, and to use the means in his power for adjusting the average claims and liabilities and securing their payment, and he accordingly ordained the defendants, who had neglected to perform that duty, to pay to the plaintiffs the whole amount of contribution to which they were entitled. The learned Lord Justice observed that "the right to detain for contribution is derived from the civil law, which also imposes on the master of the ship the duty of having the contribution settled and of collecting the amount, and the usage has always been substantially in accordance with that law, and has become part of the common law of England."

The rule of contribution in cases of jettison has its origin in the maritime law of Rhodes, of which the text as preserved by Paulus (Dig. Lib. 14, Tit. 2) is, "Si levandæ navis gratiâ jactus mercium factus est, omnium contributione sarciatur, quod pro omnibus datum est." The principle of the rule has been the frequent subject of judicial comment. Lord Bramwell, in Wright v. Marwood, said that, to judge from the way in which contribution is claimed in England, "it would seem to arise from an implied contract inter se to contribute by those interested." The present Master of the Rolls, in Burton v. English, disputed that view, and stated his opinion to be that the right to contribution "does not arise from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, and has been incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not as a matter of contract, but in consequence of a common danger, when natural justice requires that all should contribute to indemnify for the loss of property which is sacrificed by one, in order that the whole adventure may be saved." Whether the rule ought to be regarded as matter of implied contract, or as a canon of positive law resting upon the dictates of natural justice, is a question which their lordships do not consider it necessary to determine. The principle upon which contribution becomes due does not appear to them to differ from that upon which claims of recompense for salvage services are founded. But, in any aspect of it, the rule of contribution has its foundation in the plainest equity. In jettison, the rights of those entitled to contribution, and the corresponding obligations of the contributors, have their origin in the fact of a common danger which threatens to destroy the property of them all; and these rights and obligations are mutually perfected whenever the goods of some of the shippers have been advisedly sacrificed, and the property of the others has been thereby preserved.

There are two well-established exceptions to the rule of contribution for general average, which it is necessary to notice.

When a person who would otherwise have been entitled to claim contribution has, by his own fault, occasioned the peril which mediately gave rise to the claim, it would be manifestly unjust to permit him to recover from those whose goods are saved, although they may be said, in a certain sense, to have benefited by the sacrifice of his property. In any question with them he is a wrongdoer, and, as such, under an obligation to use every means within his power to ward off or repair the natural consequences of his wrongful act. He cannot be permitted to claim either recompense for services rendered, or indemnity for losses sustained by him, in the endeavour to rescue property which was imperilled by his own tortious act, and which it was his duty to save. Schloss v. Heriot is the leading English authority upon the point. In that case, which was an action by the shipowner against the owners of cargo for contribution in an average loss, a plea stated in defence, to the effect that the ship was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and that the average loss was occasioned by such unseaworthiness, was held to be a good answer to the claim by Erle, C.J., and Willes and Keating, JJ.

The second exception is in the case of deck cargo. The reason why relief by general contribution is denied to the owners of goods stowed on deck, when these are thrown overboard in order to save the cargo under hatches, is obvious. According to the rules of maritime law, the placing of goods upon the deck of a sea-going ship is improper stowage, because they are hindrances to the safe navigation of the vessel; and their jettison is therefore regarded, in a question with the other shippers of cargo, as a justifiable riddance of incumbrances which ought never to have been there, and not as a sacrifice for the common safety. But the owner of deck goods jettisoned, though not entitled to general contribution, may nevertheless have a good claim for indemnity against the master and owners who received his goods for carriage upon deck; and the exception does not apply, either (1) in those cases where, according to the established custom of navigation, such cargoes are permitted, or (2) in any case where the other owners of cargo have consented that the goods jettisoned should be carried on the deck of the ship.

It appears from the proceedings in this suit that the average claims at the instance of cargo owners exceed 30,000dols., and that there is a small claim on account of ship. The fault of the master being matter of admission, it seems clear, upon authority, that no contribution can be recovered by the owners of The Abington, unless the conditions ordinarily existing between parties standing in that relation have been varied by special contract between them and their shippers. But the negligent navigation of their master cannot, in the opinion of their lordships, afford any pretext for depriving those shippers whose goods were jettisoned of their claim to a general contribution. They were not privy to the master's fault, and were under no duty, legal or moral, to make a gratuitous sacrifice of their goods, for the sake of others, in order to avert the consequences of his fault. The Rhodian law, which in that respect is the law of England, bases the right of contribution, not upon the causes of the danger to the ship and cargo, but upon its actual presence; and such exceptions as that recognized in Schloss v. Heriot are in truth limitations on the rule, which have been introduced, from equitable considerations, in the case of actual wrongdoers, or of those who are legally responsible for them. The owners of goods thrown overboard having been innocent of exposing The Abington and her cargo to the sea peril which necessitated jettison, their equitable claim to be indemnified for the loss of their goods is just as strong as if the peril had been wholly due to the action of the winds and waves.

In support of the legal proposition which they induced the learned recorder to accept, the respondents relied upon a passage which is to be found in the original text of Lord Tenterden's work on Shipping, ed. 1881, p. 499. It is in these terms:—"The goods must be thrown overboard for the sake of all, not because the ship is too heavily laden to prosecute an ordinary course through a tranquil sea, which would be the fault of those who had shipped or received the goods, but because at a moment of distress and danger their weight, or their presence, prevents the extraordinary exertions required for the general safety." It appears to their lordships that, if Lord Tenterden had really meant to lay down the rule that there can be no contribution for jettison in the case of a ship overladen through the fault of those who received and put her cargo on board, he would have done so in plain terms. What he does say is, that there can be no proper jettison from an overladen ship, so long as ship and cargo are exposed to no peril whatever from the action of the sea, but are merely exposed to the inconvenience of being unable to reach their destination in the ordinary course of time.

The authority upon which the respondents placed their chief reliance was that of Mr. Parsons, who, in his treatise on the Law of Insurance, vol. II., p. 285, and also in his Law of Shipping, vol. I., p. 211, states that "when a jettison is justified by the circumstances in which it takes place, and these circumstances are occasioned by the fault of the master, or his want of care or skill, the jettison would give no claim for contribution; but the owners of the ship would be liable to the owners of the goods jettisoned for the damages caused by the wrongdoing of the master." In both works the proposition is laid down in precisely the same terms, and the same cases are referred to. These treatises are justly regarded as of great authority in questions of maritime law; but their lordships are constrained to say that, in their opinion, the text above cited is inaccurate, in so far as it bears the meaning that no claim of contribution will arise to the owners of jettisoned cargo in the case supposed, and is unsupported by the decisions upon which it is founded, which, all of them, relate to one or other of the exceptions already noticed.

Upon the question of legal tender, their lordships are unable to concur in the opinion expressed by the learned recorder. The correspondence which passed, before the deposit was paid, appears to them to show that both of the parties were exceedingly unaccommodating, and somewhat unreasonable, and that neither of them was altogether in the right.

Their lordships, even if it had been desirable to decide the second point urged for the appellants, are not in a position to do so, because there is no proof and no admission to the effect that, as alleged by them in argument, all the bills of lading for goods shipped in The Abington contained the same exception with those produced, of the master's act, neglect, or default in navigating the ship. But this is not a suit for recovery of contribution; and the appellants, if it be necessary, will not be precluded from substantiating their averments in the adjustment of average claims.

The result is that their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty to reverse the judgment appealed from, and to dismiss the respondents' action, with costs in the court below. The respondents must also pay the costs of this appeal.

From Chan. Div. [and Kay, J.] Feb. 7, 11; March 12, 20.

GARRARD v. EDGE. (a.)

Patent — Action for infringement—Practice—Costs—Particulars of objections — Certifying for costs of particulars—Costs occasioned to plaintiff by objections alleged to be "improper, vexatious, or unnecessary" proceedings—Patents, &c., Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 29 (6)—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 20, 21.

In an action for infringement of a patent, the defendant denied the infringement and also delivered particulars of objections to the validity of the patent. The action was dismissed with costs, on the ground that there had been no infringement, the question of validity not being gone into. The defendant did not apply to the judge to certify, under section 29 (6) of the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, that his particulars of objections were reasonable and proper, and his costs of those particulars were, on that ground, disallowed en bloc by the taxing master, without being gone into in detail as on taxation. The plaintiff then brought in a bill of costs alleged to have been occasioned by the defendant's particulars of objections, and claimed to have such costs set off, under ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 20, 21, against the costs payable by him to the defendant, but the taxing master considered he had no power to go into the question of the propriety of the objections, or, consequently, to allow the plaintiff the costs he claimed.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming the decision of Kay, J.), that disallowance of costs, or some specified costs, of a party, on the particular grounds specified by sub-rule 20 (such as that the proceedings in respect of which those costs had been incurred were improper, vexatious, or unnecessary) is (in the absence of an express direction under the same rule by the judge to the taxing officer) a condition precedent to the right of the other parties to have any costs occasioned to them by such proceedings paid by the offending party or set off against costs payable to him; and that, in the present case, the costs of the defendant's particulars having been disallowed merely because they were not certified for by the judge, the condition precedent was not fulfilled, and the taxing master, having no jurisdiction to go into those costs as on taxation, or (therefore) to consider the question whether the proceedings in respect of which they were incurred were improper, unnecessary, or vexatious within sub-rule 20, had no power to allow the plaintiff's claim to set off or to payment of any costs occasioned him by such proceedings.

Per the Court of Appeal.—Parties who desire, under such circumstances, to raise the question whether, in consequence of any proceedings improperly taken by other parties, such first-mentioned parties have been put to costs, ought to ask the judge to direct the taxing master to look into that question, and, if he finds in the affirmative, tax those costs and order them to be paid by the parties by whose improper proceedings they have been occasioned.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons by the plaintiff to review the taxation of a bill of costs brought in by him, and as to which he claimed a right of set-off against costs due to the defendants.

The action was for the infringement of the plaintiff's letters patent, and the defendants, by their defence and particulars of objections, had raised the usual issues of non-infringement and invalidity. The action was tried before Kay, J., and dismissed with costs on the ground of non-infringement, and this decision was affirmed on appeal. No certificate that the particulars of objections delivered by the defendants were reasonable and proper, was asked for or granted at the trial. The plaintiff had called witnesses to meet the defendants' objections to the validity of his patent.

The defendants had included in the bill of costs carried by them into taxation the costs of their particulars of objections, but they were disallowed en bloc by the taxing master, on the ground that no certificate had been obtained. The plaintiff then brought in a bill of costs on the ground that unnecessary costs had been occasioned by these objections, and applied that such costs might be set off against the costs payable by him to the defendants; but the taxing master refused to tax the bill, and disallowed it altogether.

The plaintiff accordingly issued this summons.

Marten, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the plaintiff —Although a certificate is a condition precedent to the obtaining of costs by the defendants, yet the want of it does not preclude the taxing master from looking into the particulars to see if they are improper, vexatious, and unnecessary. The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, s. 29 (6), only enacts that the defendant shall lose his costs if this condition is not fulfilled: Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Levinstein, 29 Ch. D. 366, at pp. 418-9, 33 W. R. Dig. 151; In re Wormsley, 27 W. R. 36; R. S. C., ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 20, 21. As regards some of the objections, evidence was given by the defendants, and the plaintiff gave rebutting evidence, and your lordship did not believe the defendants' evidence. As to other objections, no evidence was given by the defendants. Unnecessary expense had been incurred by the plaintiff with the view of meeting those objections. The taxing master is at liberty to look into the matter on the materials before him, and to say whether, under the circumstances, the defendants' objections were improper, vexatious, and unnecessary. The want of the certificate is looked upon by the taxing master as a stop to further investigation.

Longbottom v. Shaw, 37 W. R. 792, 43 Ch. D. 46, was also cited.

Aston, Q.C., and Chadwyck-Healey, for the defendants.—The costs of the particulars of objections were disallowed by the statute, since no certificate had been obtained, and not by the exercise of the taxing master's discretion. The Patents Act, 1883, overrides the general directions of the Supreme Court Rules in this respect: Boyd v. Horrocks, 6 Rep. Pat. Cas. 152. The rules give no further jurisdiction to the High Court over costs than the Court of Chancery had: In re Mills' Estate, 35 W. R. 65, 34 Ch. D. 24; and this case is provided for by the Patents Act, 1883, which punishes a defendant by disallowance of costs only. Also the taxing master has already exercised his discretion in this case.

Marten, Q.C., replied.

KAY, J.—This is a patent action which has been dismissed with costs. The defendants denied both the validity of the patent and infringement. I have never heard that a defendant is not entitled to have two strings to his bow and to raise both these issues; and because he does not succeed upon the first it does not follow it was one that was unreasonable or improper to raise. But at the trial the court did not give a certificate for the particulars of objections under section 29 (6) of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, nor express any opinion as to whether these particulars were reasonable and proper, so that the defendants could not get the costs of them, and when such costs were carried in by him, the taxing master disallowed them en bloc. The plaintiff now says that these proceedings of the defendants have caused him considerable costs with the view of meeting them, and that those costs should be allowed to him and set off against the costs payable to the defendants, and he relies upon R. S. C., ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 20, 21. The plaintiff's contention is that the taxing master should have looked into the particulars, and said which of them had proved to be "improper, vexatious, or unnecessary," within the meaning of ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 20, and therefore whether the costs occasioned by them to the plaintiff should be allowed to him, and set off under sub-rule 21. But under those rules it is necessary that there should be, as a condition precedent, a disallowance by the court or a taxing master of the defendants' costs, because they are improper, vexatious, or unnecessary. The taxing master says that he has disallowed the defendants' costs of their particulars of objections because they had not obtained the proper certificate. That is the only reason for the disallowance of those costs. The condition precedent for the set-off of costs by the plaintiff therefore fails, and the summons must be dismissed with costs.

From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

Marten, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the appellant.—The taxing master declined to inquire whether the defendants' particulars of objections were improper. The objections (which are numerous) are so unreasonable and improper that the defendants themselves did not venture to ask for a certificate for the costs of them, and they are disallowed en bloc; but surely the taxing master is not thereby relieved of inquiring into them for the purpose of allowing us the costs occasioned by them. If so, a plaintiff or defendant, by simply omitting from his bill of costs any objectionable matter like these items for particulars of objections, may deprive his opponents of the costs occasioned by having to meet those particulars which are ex hypothesi unreasonable and improper. That they are so in fact is further shown by their being disallowed by the taxing master. These particulars were "improper, vexatious, unnecessary," within ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rule 20, of the Rules of Court, 1883. The defendants cannot, by leaving out their objectionable costs, deprive the court of its jurisdiction to order them to pay the costs occasioned by their improper particulars. The matter ought to be referred back to the taxing master, who is the most proper and competent person to determine the question under sub-rule 20. Under that rule it is not necessary that there should have been an actual disallowance expressly on the ground of impropriety. This is a question of principle. Are costs incurred in consequence of frivolous objections by the other side not to be paid by them?

They referred to Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Levinstein; In re Wormsley, Baines v. Wormsley; Boyd v. Horrocks; Longbottom v. Shaw; Memorandum as to Costs, by Sir J. Leach, V.C., in 1 Sim. & St., at p. 357; and R. S. C., ord. 65, r. 27, sub-rules 20, 21, 25.

Aston, Q.C., and Chadwyck-Healey, for the respondents.—The decision below was right, both technically and on the facts. "Disallowance," on the ground mentioned in sub-rule 20, is a condition precedent. In sub-rule 20 "such question" means the question whether any proceeding is unnecessary, &c. The condition precedent is that there shall be a question raised as to whether any of the defendants' costs shall be disallowed on the grounds specified or not. There must be a question raised, and properly raised, before they can be so disallowed. If the plaintiff's construction were right, a party who has been successful in every respect might be ordered to pay costs; that could not be so: Foster v. The Great Western Railway Co., 30 W. R. 398, 8 Q. B. D. 515; In re Mills' Estate.

Marten, Q.C., in reply.—The latter part of sub-rule 20 imposes on the taxing master the positive duty of looking into the question whether the proceedings are improper or not, if it has not been raised before the judge.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 20.—COTTON, L.J.—This comes before us by way of appeal from a decision of Kay, J., refusing an application to review the taxing master's certificate. The action is a patent action, and the defendants were successful on the question of infringement. A good many objections were taken by the defendants to the validity of the patent, but the court gave no decision on that point; and for some reason or other the defendants made no application to the judge at the trial, under section 29, sub-section (6), of the Patents Act of 1883, to certify that their objections were well taken. The judge could certainly not have found them proved, and he was not asked to find that they were reasonable and proper. Then, when the taxation of costs took place, the defendants asked for a certificate that their objections had been well taken, though the judge had not been asked at the trial to find that they were reasonable and proper. First of all the master allowed the costs of the objections, but afterwards, without entering into the question of their propriety, or that of the proceedings taken, he struck them out. He did that in consequence of his attention having been called, I suppose by the plaintiff, to section 29 (6) of the Patents Act, which says that "on taxation of costs regard shall be had to the particulars delivered by the plaintiff and by the defendant; and they, respectively, shall not be allowed any costs in respect of any particular delivered by them unless the same is certified by the court or a judge to have been proven, or to have been reasonable and proper, without regard to the general costs of the case." But then the plaintiff brought in a bill of costs relating to the proceedings which he said he had taken with reference to the objections brought in by the defendants, and he contended that, under rule 27, sub-rule 20, of order 65, he was entitled to charge the defendants with those costs with reference to the proceedings which he, the plaintiff, had taken to meet those objections taken by the defendants. Well, the taxing master declined to enter into the question at all, and the judge, on the appeal to him, thought he was right, because he considered that, as he had not been called upon, and could not be required to tax the costs brought in by the defendants relating to the objections which they had taken, and on which the judge did not decide at all, he had no power to act under this rule 20.

It is said with reference to the costs of any proceedings taken by the defendants, if on taxation it is found, either at the instance of the judge or at the instance of the taxing master, that those proceedings were improper, unnecessary, or vexatious, then any costs which they have consequently caused the other party to incur will be ordered to be paid by them. But here, of course, as I stated, the taxing master never had power to enter into the question, on the taxation of the defendants' costs, whether these proceedings were in any way improperly or vexatiously taken by them. Therefore, he said, I cannot enter into this question which the plaintiff wishes to bring before me. With that the judge agreed, and in my opinion he was right, because, although it is very true that power is given to the taxing master, of his own mere motion, to enter into the question if he finds that proceedings by one party are vexatiously or improperly taken, and to see what expense was caused to the other party by those improper or vexatious proceedings, yet there is, in my opinion, a condition precedent to his having the power to enter into the question of what, if anything, ought to be paid to the other person in consequence of improper proceedings? It was said that these particulars must be taken to be improper and vexatious with reference to this rule because the judge has not certified that they are either proven, or that they are reasonable and proper, and, therefore, that the mere absence of the certificate of the judge, which would enable the defendants to carry in their costs, and to be allowed such of them as the taxing master did not strike out, of itself shows that these particulars were vexatious or improper. But I cannot agree with that. The Act of Parliament says that regard shall be had to the particulars of objections taken in the case of the defendant, and that then, if he does not get the certificate, he shall not be allowed on taxation any costs of those particulars. But that is for an entirely different object from that aimed at by this 20th sub-rule. It does not at all follow that, because the defendants have not liked or wished or thought it desirable to ask for a certificate, or because the judge has not granted a certificate, this must be considered to bring the case within this 20th sub-rule so as to enable the other party, the plaintiff, to charge them with the costs of any proceedings which he has taken in consequence of the objections raised by the defendants, but as to which they have not got a certificate. It is very true that this may seem to be hard on the plaintiff; but, in my opinion, he took the wrong course. If he wished to raise this point he ought to have asked the judge to direct the taxing master to see whether, in consequence of any proceedings which had been taken by the defendants improperly, he had been put to costs, and to tax those costs and grant them to him as against the defendants. He did not think of doing that, just as the defendants did not think of asking for a certificate that, although these objections were not proved, yet they were properly taken. For some reason the plaintiff—whether because he did not think of it, or because he did not think it prudent to do so—did not ask the judge to give any such direction. That, in my opinion, having regard to sub-rule 20, is what ought to be done.

The judge can direct the taxing master to look into the costs, and to see whether any proceedings were vexatious or improperly taken, and, if he does not do it, the taxing master, in taxing the costs of any party, can consider whether the proceedings to which those costs relate were vexatious or improperly taken. Yes, but if it does not come to the taxing master to tax the costs of any party, he cannot enter into the question under this rule as to whether those costs have been improperly or vexatiously incurred, and have put the other party to unnecessary costs, which the party occasioning those costs ought to pay. Of course, if a plaintiff thinks that, in consequence of improper or vexatious objections taken by his opponent, he has been put to unnecessary and improper costs, he can ask the judge, if there is a decision in favour of the defendant, and the defendant does not ask for a certificate that those objections were properly taken, to direct the taxing master to see whether any proceedings have been vexatiously or improperly taken by the defendant, and to direct that he, the plaintiff, shall get from the defendant the costs of any proceedings which he, the plaintiff, has taken in consequence of objections improperly taken by the defendant. In my opinion that was the view which the taxing master took in this case, and which Kay, J., took, and I think it was the right view. I do not read the whole of the rule, but the case turns upon this:—"In such case the party whose costs are so disallowed shall pay the costs occasioned thereby to the other parties, and in any case where such question shall not have been raised before and dealt with by the court or judge, it shall be the duty of the taxing officer to look into the same . . . for the purpose aforesaid." He is to see, in relation to the costs which he can tax, and which it is his duty to tax, whether or not the proceedings in which these costs were incurred, if improperly taken, have occasioned costs to other parties. Here, as I stated, in consequence of the course which was taken by the defendants, he could not enter into this question. The costs of the proceedings, in respect of which the defendants did not get a certificate, never came for taxation in such a sense that the taxing master could judge whether or no such proceedings were vexatiously or improperly taken. In my opinion, the appeal fails. In future, parties, if they desire to raise such a question as this, should see that they get a direction from the judge so as to enable and direct the taxing master—which he can do on the judge's directions, of course—to look into what the plaintiff here is desirous should be looked into.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think there is a difficulty in applying the 20th sub-rule of rule 27 of order 65 to patent cases. That rule is expressed in general terms as applicable to all actions, and there is nothing at all in the rule about notices of objections in patent actions. They are not specially dealt with at all, and the difficulty arises from having to apply that rule to a case in which particulars of objections are specially dealt with. They are specially dealt with by the 29th section of the Patent Act, and when you come to look at and work the two together, there is a little difficulty about it, but I am not at all prepared to say that the true construction is not that which has been said to be correct by the taxing master, by Kay, J., and by my learned brother. There is a difficulty about it, but not a difficulty so great as to lead me to express a contrary opinion. I think, when you come to spell it out, that that view is correct, and that if ever a plaintiff wants to get costs occasioned by improper objections he must ask for them. That has this immense convenience, that the judge, who knows all about it, can give directions, whereas the taxing master, who knows nothing about it, would be excessively embarrassed in applying this rule to patent cases, when the point raised is, as here, that the particulars of objections have not only not been certified for, but have put the other party to extra cost. It is a very difficult matter for the taxing master to settle, and a comparatively easy matter for the judge to settle when he has tried the case. I think, therefore, the appeal fails.

LOPES, L.J.—Having regard to what has happened in this case, and also to section 29 (6) of the Patents, &c. Act, 1883, I think there has been no such disallowance of the defendants' costs of these particulars within the meaning of sub-rule 20, rule 27, of order 65, as to give the taxing master jurisdiction to deal with the costs in this case. Of course this depends on the construction of the rule, and I think both the judge and the taxing master have put the proper and correct construction on it. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Winding up—Two petitions—Priority—Presentation—Advertisement—Costs—General Order, November, 1862, r. 2.

Where two petitions to wind up a company have been presented, of which the second in date of presentation is first advertised, and the same day has been fixed for answering both petitions, the order will be made upon the petition first presented, unless it be proved that it is not presented bonâ fide. A petitioner is entitled to a reasonable delay in the day for which his petition is to be answered, subject to the risk of losing his priority.

Petition.

The Building Societies Trust (Limited) was registered on the 26th of July, 1888, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, as a limited company. Daniel Charles Laughton was a creditor of the company for £92 5s. 2d. On the 25th of February, 1890, he presented a petition to have the company wound up.

George Pooley was a judgment creditor of the company for £65 2s. upon a judgment obtained on the 19th of February, 1890. He caused a writ of fi. fa. to be issued thereon, upon which a return of no assets was made, and he presented a petition to have the company wound up on the 4th of March, having previously been informed, on the 26th of February, that Laughton's petition had been presented. Pooley's petition was advertised in the London Gazette of the 4th of March, and in the Times and Standard of the 6th of March.

Laughton's petition was advertised in the London Gazette of the 7th of March, and in the Standard of the 7th of March.

Both the petitions were to be answered for the same day, the 15th of March.

Romer, Q.C., Oswald, and Pochin, for Laughton's petition.—If there are two petitions, the question of priority must be strictly investigated. Pooley's petition is wrongly presented, as he presented it with full knowledge of our petition: In re Norton Iron Co., 26 W. R. 92.

Byrne, Q.C., and T. B. Napier, for Pooley's petition.—Pooley deferred presenting his petition for some time after finding that Laughton's petition was presented. Laughton did not advertise within a reasonable time; he might have done so in the Gazette of the 25th or 28th of February. The priority of advertisement is the test: Chadwyck-Healey, 2nd ed., at p. 458; Buckley, 5th ed., at p. 215; In re United Ports Co., 39 L. J. Ch. 146, 18 W. R. Dig. 73; and In re Trades Bank Co., W. N., 1877, p. 268. In any event Pooley will have his costs up to the time of presenting his petition: In re General Financial Bank, 30 W. R. 417; 20 Ch. D. 276; but as he had good reason to believe that Laughton's petition was not rightly presented, he is entitled to have his full costs.

T. Douglas, for a judgment creditor, asked for a winding-up order.

(a.) Reported by W. H. QUARRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CHITTY, J.—In the present case there are two petitions before me, Laughton's, presented on the 25th of February, and Pooley's, presented on the 4th of March; both of them are answered for the 15th of March.

I find, on inquiry, that the present practice is to allow the petitioner to have some option as to the day for which his petition is to be answered, but a short postponement only, say a week, will be allowed, unless good cause be shown for a longer adjournment. A petitioner who chooses to have his petition answered for a day later than is necessary, of course runs the risk of a second petitioner obtaining an order before the first can be heard. In this case Laughton might have had his petition answered for the 8th of March, which would have given him time to have put in the necessary advertisements, but he chose the 15th, instead of the 8th. If Pooley could have had his petition answered for the 8th of March, he might have obtained an order, in spite of Laughton's petition, which was fixed for the 15th of March. Laughton did not advertise his petition till the 7th of March, which, by the rules, gave him sufficient time to have his petition heard on the 15th. This delay is not evidence against Laughton of want of bona fides. I cannot attach blame to him for having selected the 15th of March instead of the 8th; and there may have been circumstances which fairly justified his postponing his advertisements, so I do not think blame can be attributed to him for not advertising his petition earlier, as he might have done. The result is, that I think Laughton's petition was rightly presented. Now as to Pooley's petition, according to the practice a second petitioner always has notice that there is an earlier petition already presented, and nothing is to be gained by presenting a second petition if the first is bonâ fide presented. The rule stated by Jessel, M.R., in In re Norton Iron Co., which I adopt, is that the second petition would have been rightly presented if Pooley could have proved that Laughton's petition was not a proper one—e.g., was a collusive one. Here the suggestion that Laughton's petition, the first one, was not properly presented has been disposed of, so by the rule I have mentioned, the right course to adopt will be to make the winding-up order on the first petition and to dismiss the second, because it is not properly presented.

It has been said that James, V.C., in In re United Ports Co. held that the petition first advertised ought to have priority, but on looking into that case, although there are strong expressions showing that in that case, where the order was made on the third petition, priority of advertisement gave priority, I cannot find that any such rule was laid down absolutely, and if it were so, it was certainly not followed by Jessel, M.R., in In re Norton Iron Co., decided in 1877. If I had to distinguish the two cases I should choose as the right one the rule laid down in In re Norton Iron Co. In In re London and Australian Agency Company, 22 W. R. 45, where there were three petitions properly presented, the carriage of the order was given to the petition first presented, and priority of presentation was looked upon as the right element. In another case in 1877, In re Trades Bank Co., it should be pointed out that there was really only one petition before Jessel, M.R., and he did not intend to overrule the principle he had laid down in In re Norton Iron Co. Another case which has been cited is In re General Financial Bank. In that case a bonâ fide creditor presented a petition which, as it was held, he was justified in carrying on; the conduct of the winding up was given to him, in preference to the first petitioner, whose petition was shown to be collusive. This is in accordance with the rule which I have already stated. If there had been two petitions before me both properly presented, I might have given the carriage of the winding up to the petitioner who first advertised, but that is not the case here. I make the winding up on the first petition, Laughton's, and dismiss Pooley's. Mr. Douglas' client and Pooley will have their costs, one set between them, as supporting the order for a winding up, and there will be no costs against Pooley on his petition, as the company does not appear. Mr. Pooley will have his costs up to the time of the presentation of his petition.

Petition.

This was a petition for payment out of purchase-money paid into court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts on a compulsory purchase.

Walter Olive, late of Cheltenham, deceased, by his will, dated the 11th of October, 1844, devised certain copyhold premises in Cheltenham to trustees upon trust, as to one-third part of the rents and profits thereof, to permit his sister, Charlotte Olive, to enjoy the same for life, and after her death in trust for such of her children as should attain the age of twenty-one equally as tenants in common.

The testator died on the 7th of November, 1844. Charlotte Olive intermarried in 1845 with Frederick Rodway, and four children of the marriage lived to attain the age of twenty-one, three of whom were the petitioners, the fourth being resident abroad.

In 1885 the Corporation of Cheltenham, under compulsory powers, acquired the copyhold premises and paid the purchase-money into court. Charlotte Rodway died on the 7th of January, 1890.

Two of the petitioners had mortgaged their shares subsequently to the payment into court of the purchase-money, and the mortgagees had been served with the petition.

Micklem, for the petitioners and the mortgagees of one share, asked for payment out, and an order against the Corporation of Cheltenham for payment of the costs of the mortgagee who appeared separately: Eden v. Thompson, 12 W. R. 789, 2 H. & M. 6; In re Brooshooft's Settlement, 37 W. R. 744, 42 Ch. D. 250; In re Bareham, 29 W. R. 525, 17 Ch. D. 329; In re English's Settlement, 37 W. R. 191, 39 Ch. D. 556; In re Nicholl's Trusts, 14 W. R. 475, W. N., 1866, p. 93.

Farwell, for the mortgagee of the other share.

E. E. H. Brydges, for the corporation.—The corporation are not liable to pay the costs of incumbrancers of shares created after the fund has been paid into court: In re Gough's Trusts, 32 W. R. 147, 24 Ch. D. 569; In re Jenkin Jones' Estate, 18 W. R. 312. In any event the corporation should not be required to pay more than 42s.: In re Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, 14 Ch. D. 624, 28 W. R. Dig. 126.

North, J.—I think the mortgagee appearing in this case is entitled to costs, notwithstanding that the mortgage is subsequent in date to the taking of the premises. I think the case of Eden v. Thompson goes quite to the point. Wood, V.C., in that case says, "The principle of the later cases is that if a suit has been instituted specifically dealing with the particular fund, then the petition, which is necessarily a petition in the suit, should be served like any other petition in the suit, and not merely as a petition under the Act; and the practice which has grown up has been to serve these petitions on all parties to the suit. Then it is objected that a petition ought to have been presented before suit for payment of this fund out of court, in which case it would have been simply a petition by the trustees for payment to them, and the only costs payable would have been theirs. But persons whose estates are taken by railway companies or other bodies under compulsory powers . . . are entitled to deal with their estates to suit their own convenience, not that of the company, and if it happens in the course of such dealing that a suit is instituted, not being litigation properly so called, but merely administration, . . . the company would have to pay the costs of all necessary parties occasioned, not by any particular adverse claims, but by the ordinary course of dealing with property. This principle clearly covers the case of a mortgage, and would provide for the payment of all ordinary costs of mortgagor and mortgagee so long as there was no suit to set aside the mortgage or other contest of that nature between the parties." This is dealing with a case similar to the present. I need not refer to the case of In re Bareham, and in the case before Kay, J. (In re Brooshooft's Settlement) he points out that where there is nothing vexatious, the company should pay the costs arising through ordinary dealing with the property, as the action of the company has increased the costs of dealing with the property. Two cases are cited which appear contrary to the authorities, one decided by James, V.C.—In re Jenkin Jones' Estate—but the report is so short that I cannot tell on what grounds it was decided. I do not understand it, and there may have been special reasons in that case. The other case is the decision of Bacon, V.C.—In re Gough's Trusts. In that case the property was settled on a tenant for life with remainders over, and some of the remaindermen afterwards mortgaged their reversionary interest, and it was held that the company were not liable to pay the costs incurred by the mortgagees in proving their incumbrances, as the title was intricate. That was not a question of mortgagee's costs. The point raised in that case was who was to bear the costs of proving the incumbrances. I do not think the authorities support the conclusion. Bacon, V.C., says the costs which they (the company) are liable to pay are not to be increased by any adverse litigation or by any subsequent matters of account as between the persons entitled. The Act of Parliament says nothing about the latter, and I hold that the corporation must pay the costs. But I think that they are only bound to pay 42s. for mortgagees' costs, according to the rule laid down in In re Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Improvement Act, 1875, together with the costs, if any, of an affidavit of service on the mortgagees, but nothing further.

MANCHESTER ROYAL INFIRMARY v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Trustee — Corporation holding funds for charitable purposes — Power of investment—Trust Investment Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32), ss. 3, 5—7, 9.

A corporation incorporated by a special Act holding funds for charitable purposes is a trustee within the meaning of section 3 of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, and is entitled to invest any trust moneys in its hands on any of the securities mentioned or referred to in that section, unless expressly forbidden to do so by the instrument (if any) creating the trust.

A trustee cannot, however, sell existing securities for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds in the securities authorized by section 3, unless the instrument creating the trust contains a power to vary securities.

This was an originating summons by the plaintiffs to have it determined whether the plaintiffs or their trustees, treasurers, and managers were entitled to invest the funds and moneys belonging to the plaintiffs on such securities as are specified or referred to in section 3 of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, and whether that Act applied to the Manchester Royal Infirmary, and the funds and moneys thereof.

The Manchester Royal Infirmary was regulated by four special Acts of Parliament. The first, 48 Geo. 3, c. 127, was passed in the year 1808, and was entitled "An Act for enabling Sir Oswald Morley, Baronet, to grant certain lands and hereditaments in the parish of Manchester, in the County Palatine of Lancaster, for the purposes of the Manchester Public Infirmary, Dispensary, Lunatic Hospital, and Asylum, and for vesting the property and effects belonging to the said charity in trustees for the benefit thereof." By section 1 power was given to Sir Oswald Morley, his heirs and assigns, to grant certain specified lands to trustees nominated and appointed as therein mentioned, for the purpose of accepting and taking such grants by the major part of the benefactors and subscribers to the said charities for the time being, upon the trusts and for the purposes thereinafter mentioned, which grants were to be taken to be valid and effectual, notwithstanding the Act 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, or any of the Statutes of Mortmain, and the trustees for the time being so to be appointed were immediately empowered and enabled to accept and take the same grants.

Section 2.—"The property of all and singular the money, implements, materials, furniture, goods, chattels and effects, matters and things whatsoever already belonging, due, or owing to the said infirmary, asylum, dispensary, and charities, or the subscribers or benefactors thereto, in respect or on account thereof, or which shall hereafter be purchased, subscribed, contributed, or provided for the purposes of the said charities, shall from and after such nomination and appointment of trustees as aforesaid, be vested in such trustees so to be nominated and appointed as aforesaid, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon the trusts and for the purposes hereinafter mentioned," and the trustees were thereby empowered to bring actions for the recovery of property of or belonging to the charity, and it was also provided that in all such actions it should be sufficient to state generally that the property for which the action should be brought was the property of "the trustees for the time being of the Manchester Infirmary, specifying the names of the trustees."

Section 4.—"The said trustees so to be nominated and appointed as aforesaid, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs, executors, and administrators of such survivors respectively, shall stand and be seised and possessed of and interested in the hereditaments and premises which have been so demised or granted as aforesaid, or which shall or may be granted or otherwise conveyed or assured by the said present Sir Oswald Morley, his heirs or assigns, in pursuance of the power and authority hereinbefore contained in that behalf, and also of and in all and singular the moneys, securities for money, implements, materials, furniture, goods, chattels and effects, matters and things whatsoever, which may become vested in them in consequence of this Act, and every part thereof respectively, in trust for and for the benefit of the said charities and charitable purposes accordingly, and subject to the rules, orders, and regulations now made and used, or such orders, rules, and regulations as shall hereafter be made, either with respect to the said lands, buildings, hereditaments, and premises, and the said goods and chattels of the said infirmary, dispensary, lunatic hospital, and asylum, or with respect to the recommendation and admission of patients, or otherwise relating to the management, regulation, and government of the said charities, by the major part of the benefactors and subscribers to the same charities for the time being.

By section 8 it was provided that the Act should be printed by the King's printer, and that a copy thereof so printed should be admitted as evidence thereof by all judges, justices, and others.

The second Act (5 Vict. c. 1) was passed in the year 1842.

Section 2.—"The president, treasurers, deputy-treasurers, benefactors, and subscribers for the time being of and to the Manchester Royal Infirmary, Dispensary, and Lunatic Hospital or Asylum, shall be incorporated by the name of 'The President, Treasurers, Deputy-Treasurers, Benefactors, and Subscribers of and to the Manchester Royal Infirmary, Dispensary, and Lunatic Hospital or Asylum,' and by that name shall be a body corporate, with perpetual succession, and a common seal, and with power to hold and retain, for the purposes of this Act, the lands comprised in the several hereinbefore mentioned indentures, and all buildings now erected, or to be hereafter erected, upon the said lands, with the appurtenants; provided always that if any member of the said corporation shall be guilty of a breach of trust or any misfeasance in respect of any property or lands belonging to the Manchester Infirmary, Dispensary, and Lunatic Hospital or Asylum, or either of them, whether, under the sanction of the corporate seal or not, he shall be subject to the same liabilities as if this Act had not been passed."

By section 3 it was provided that, immediately after the passing of the Act, and by virtue of the same, the land and buildings of the charity should vest in the corporation according to the true intent and purport of the conveyances executed of the same to the trustees of the charities, and that in like manner all the moneys, stocks, funds, and securities for money, goods, chattels, rights, credits, and effects belonging, done, and owing to the charities, should be vested in the corporation, and for that purpose the persons in whose names any sums of money, stocks, funds, mortgages, securities for money, or other effects should, at the time of the passing of the Act, stand or be secured, the beneficial interest wherein should belong to the charities thereby incorporated, should forthwith transfer or assign the same respectively, so and in such manner as that the same should be vested in the corporation."

Section 4. — "As well the moneys arising from the sale or transfer of any of the public or Government funds, stocks, securities, or any other securities, as also any other moneys for the time being belonging to the said charities, may from time to time be invested, either in the name of the said corporation hereby created, or in the names of any other persons on behalf of, and to be named and appointed by the said corporation, upon trust for the said charities on mortgage of any hereditaments of a clear and indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple, to be situate in England or Wales, free from incumbrances, except quit rents or other annual small payments, and leases at rack rent to tenants or occupiers . . . or the same moneys, stocks, funds, and securities may in like manner be invested in any of the public or Government stocks, funds, or securities, and all such mortgages, stocks, funds, and securities may be from time to time called in, and the money arising therefrom be again invested in manner aforesaid, so often as may be deemed expedient."

Section 11.—"This Act shall be a public Act, and shall be judicially taken notice of as such."

The third Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 43) was passed in the year 1844, to enable the corporation to enlarge the infirmary, and to purchase and hold land for the erection of a new lunatic hospital or asylum. Section 12 provided that "this Act shall be a public Act, and shall be judicially taken notice of as such."

The fourth Act (15 Vict. c. 3) was passed in the year 1852 for the purpose of uniting a charity called the Manchester House of Recovery with the Manchester Royal Infirmary. Section 12 provided that the Act should not be a public Act, but should be printed by the Queen's printer, and a copy thereof so printed should be admitted evidence thereof by all judges, justices, and others.

The greater portion of the funds belonging to the corporation was invested in Government securities in the name of the corporation, but there were some small sums invested in the name of the official trustee of charities.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Farwell, for the plaintiffs.—The Acts of 1842 and 1844 are not really public Acts. The provisions of section 11 of the Act of 1842 and section 12 of the Act of 1844 were inserted merely that those Acts might be judicially taken notice of. They are not printed with the public Acts. The question whether an Act is a public or private Act does not depend on technical considerations, but upon the nature and substance of the case: Dawson v. Paver, 5 Hare, 415. There is nothing in the "instrument creating the trust" which prohibits the investment of the funds of the charity on the securities mentioned in section 3. When the corporation was created the trusts were not in any way altered, but the corporation was substituted for the individual trustees as trustees of the charity.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—It was not intended by the Act of 1889 that property owned by a corporation should be treated as held by them as trustees in the ordinary sense. It is difficult to see how in such a case the court could execute the trust. The officers of a corporation might be made liable for misappropriation of the funds, and yet it could not very well be said that they were trustees of the funds in the ordinary sense of the word. Again, the funds of a joint-stock company are under the control of its directors, but the directors are not trustees of the funds. The Act of 1889 relates to "trust funds." The Act was passed to amend the law relating "to the investment of trust funds." It is doubtful whether corporation property would be properly described as "trust funds"; nor is it correct to say that when a fund belongs to a corporation because it is a corporation, there is any "instrument" creating a trust. [North, J.—The use of that expression rather seems to indicate that there may be trusts without an instrument creating them; if so, what can be meant but trusts reposed in bodies such as this corporation or trusts created by parol?] The provision in section 5 that every power conferred by the Act shall be exercised "subject to any consent required by the instrument (if any) creating the trust with respect to the investment of the trust funds," points to the consent of some individual. By the Act of 1842 the plaintiffs are constituted a public body holding funds for public purposes, they cannot be said to be "trustees" within the meaning of the Act of 1889.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—Corporations can be trustees for charitable purposes in respect of property vested in them: In re Norwich Town Close Estate Charity, 36 W. R. 853, 37 Ibid., 362, 40 Ch. D. 298; In re Clergy Orphan Corporation, 22 W. R. 789, L. R. 18 Eq. 280. [North, J.—I feel some difficulty as to what is the "instrument creating the trust." Although I think the special Acts relating to the charity are private Acts, still I have considerable doubt whether they are "an instrument" within section 2 of the Act of 1889]. The plaintiffs only asked for a declaration that they are trustees within the meaning of the Act of 1889.

North, J.—This case raises a question as to the application of the Trust Investment Act, 1889. [His lordship stated the provisions of the special Acts, and continued:—]. The corporation have very considerable funds belonging to them, the bulk of which is invested in the name of the corporation, though there is a small amount standing in the name of the official trustee of charities.

The question is upon what securities can these funds be now invested—in other words, does the Act of 1889 apply to them. The Act is entitled, "An Act to amend the law relating to the investment of trust funds." It provides by section 3 that "it shall be lawful for a trustee unless expressly forbidden by the instrument (if any) creating the trust, to invest any trust funds in his hands in manner following." We have, first of all, to find whether a person is a "trustee" within the meaning of the Act, and if he is a trustee then the extended power of investment applies to "any trust funds in his hands." Then section 5 provides that "every power conferred by this Act shall be exercised according to the discretion of the trustee, but subject to any consent required by the instrument (if any) creating the trust with respect to the investment of the trust funds." And by section 6 the Act is to apply as well to trusts created before as to trusts created after the passing of the Act, and the powers thereby conferred are to be in addition to the powers conferred by the instrument (if any) creating the trust.

Then section 7 is, I think, material in this way. First of all, it seems to me to contemplate that such bodies as the council of a county or borough, or an urban or rural sanitary authority come within the scope of the Act, because I do not think it would be the right construction to say that this section is dealing with bodies entirely outside the Act, and giving them powers which, unless they have them as trustees, would not properly find a place in this Act at all, but ought to be found in an Act relating to different subjects. It shows that this section is not, as I was at first inclined to think, one which merely limits the powers of these bodies, but that they have power to make the investments which are contemplated in the Act.

Then the point put, and it is one requiring serious consideration, is whether it can be said that the property belonging to this corporation, which is their own property, is a trust fund in their hands as "trustees" within the meaning of the Act. I think it is. I think that the money is clearly held on trust for charitable purposes. It was, in the first instance, in terms vested in trustees by the Act of 1808, and when by the subsequent Act the funds were vested in the corporation, this was done for the purpose of facilitating the dealing with the funds, but I do not think it in any way prevents that from continuing to be a trust fund which beyond all question had been a trust fund down to that time. Moreover, it is a fund for the purposes of the Infirmary Lunatic Asylum, which is referred to in the Acts. It seems to me beyond all question that the funds are held on a charitable trust, with respect to which the rights and duties of trustees belong to, and are imposed on, the body in whom the funds are now vested in trust, just as they would in the case of any ordinary trustee. Suppose that this corporation proposed to advance some of their money to the Corporation of Manchester for the improvement of their streets, that would clearly be a breach of trust, and on the application of the Attorney-General I should at once restrain them from committing any such breach of trust. Supposing that an advance was actually made in the same way, but a security was taken for the money, precisely the same rules would apply, unless it turned out that the security taken was one upon which the corporation are authorized to invest their funds, in which case the advance would not be a breach of trust.

It seems to me, therefore, clear that these funds are trust funds vested in the corporation of the Manchester Infirmary as a "trustee" within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. Cozens-Hardy referred to In re Clergy Orphan Corporation, which is very like the present case, but, curiously enough, the point which I have now to decide seems to have been withdrawn from the consideration of the judge there. The headnote to the report is as follows:—"Stock in the funds belonging to a charity incorporated by Act of Parliament, and having power to invest in the public funds, may, under section 11 of the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, be sold out for the purpose of reinvestment on any of the stocks, funds, and securities on which cash under the control of the court may be invested." Section 11 of that Act provided that "when any such general order as aforesaid shall have been made" (that is, as to cash in the control of the court) "it shall be lawful for trustees, executors, or administrators having power to invest their trust funds upon Government securities or Parliamentary stocks, funds, or securities, or any of them, to invest such trust funds, or any part thereof, in any of the stocks, funds, or securities in or upon which by such General Order cash under the control of the court may from time to time be invested." But the petition presented sought the advice and direction of the court as to whether funds already invested could be sold for the purpose of reinvestment, and the argument of Mr. Cozens-Hardy for the petitioners was this: "No question is asked as to the power under section 11 to invest in the manner desired any funds to be hereafter acquired by the society, but the decision in In re Warde, 2 J. & H. 191, has caused a question to be raised as to the power of the trustees to sell out funds already invested with a view to reinvestment where there is no express power of varying existing securities." Then Malins, V.C., said: "I consider that the intention of section 11 was to enlarge the powers of investment previously belonging to trustees by allowing them to invest any fund in their hands in the stocks, funds, and securities from time to time sanctioned by the court; and my opinion is that the petitioners, being trustees, and having funds directed by their Act of Parliament to be invested in the public funds, come within the enabling clause, and that, consequently, all the funds of this charity, whether invested or not, may be dealt with as cash under the control of the court. I do not say that the decision in In re Warde was not right, but though I do not see very clearly the grounds of that decision, it must, I think, be treated as depending upon its special circumstances. I consider, therefore, that the petitioners may sell out the existing stock with a view to reinvestment, and I shall, therefore, answer the question in the affirmative." The point, therefore, decided there, was not whether the trustees could reinvest, but whether they could sell out existing stock for the purpose of reinvestment. No doubt there is an observation made by Malins, V.C., which shows he thought that they were trustees within the meaning of the Act, although that was not the point to which his attention had been directed by the argument, and which was being answered by him. The further point was suggested whether Metropolitan Consolidated Stock was within the power of investment, and that turned upon section 13 of the Board of Works Act, 1871. The Vice-Chancellor said: "That section seems wide enough to include the present charity. The petitioners will, therefore, be allowed to invest in that stock." That, again, was an observation upon a point not raised by the petition, and not calling for decision; still, so far as the case goes, it shows that the Vice-Chancellor took that view, although the point had not been argued, and that is in favour of the view which I have taken of the construction of the Act of 1889.

I propose, therefore, to make a declaration that the corporation are trustees within the meaning of the Trust Investment Act, 1889, and are entitled to invest any trust funds in their hands in the manner thereby authorized unless expressly forbidden by any instrument creating the trust.

I should add that I do not consider In re Clergy Orphan Corporation in any way interferes with the decision in In re Warde, and therefore my decision is not intended to go to this, that the corporation have any power to sell existing securities for the purpose of making other investments under powers given by the Act. That depends entirely on what those powers may be, independently of the Act. The Act does especially provide by the final clause of section 3 that trustees who may invest as therein mentioned may "also from time to time vary such investments." Those words are necessary for this reason. If trustees, by the instrument creating the trust, had a more limited power of investment, and had also power to vary investments, there might have been a question whether the power contained in the instrument to vary the investments authorized by it, could extend to investments which are authorized, not by the instrument, but by the Act, and it is for the purpose of preventing any question of that sort from arising that the words which I have just read are inserted in section 3. But the express direction that trustees are to have power to vary the investments authorized by the Act goes a long way to show that it does not touch the question whether they had any previous power to vary securities for the purpose of making such investments as are authorized by the Act. That is the reason why I limited the declaration which I have made expressly to funds in the hands of the corporation.

actions to have their names removed from the list of shareholders. The same solicitor acted for the plaintiff in each action. W.'s action was decided first, and it was arranged that the evidence taken in that action should be used in the other two, which subsequently came on and were decided by the same judge on the same day, judgment being given for the plaintiff in each case, with costs. T.'s costs were taxed in the usual way, but the taxing master struck out en bloc a number of items in G.'s bill, on the ground that the two actions were similar, and that duplicate copies of documents ought not to have been prepared: he therefore disallowed the charges for copies which had already been allowed in T.'s bill. The same counsel appeared for the plaintiff in each case, and the taxing master reduced their fees in G.'s bill.

Held, that the whole bill must be referred back to the taxing master, with the direction that, except as regards attendance or other matters which were, or ought to have been, done at one and the same time in both actions, the plaintiff's solicitor was entitled to charge in G.'s action as if he had not been engaged in T.'s action.

This was a summons to review taxation taken out by the plaintiff, and he asked that his objections to the taxation might be allowed, and that it might be referred back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accordingly.

The judgment under which the taxation was made, was dated the 16th of January, 1890, and made on a motion by H. L. O. Grieb to have his name removed from the list of shareholders of the association on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentations. The court granted the relief asked, and ordered that the register of members should be rectified accordingly, the applicant's money returned to him, and his costs of the application paid by the association, such costs to be taxed by the taxing master.

A similar application was made by one Thursby on the same day, and to the same judge, but before Grieb's case, and a similar order made. Both applicants appeared by the same counsel and solicitor.

The taxing master taxed Grieb's costs at £65 11s. 3d., and disallowed a number of items on the ground that they were duplicates of copies which had been allowed in Thursby's bill, and he also reduced counsel's fees as excessive.

Grieb filed objections to the certificate, in which he stated that his action and Thursby's were quite distinct, and that there was no agreement between them that the result of one should affect the other; that the grounds of opposition were different; that Thursby's documents belonged to him and could not be used by the plaintiffs; and that it was a mere accident that they were represented by the same counsel. The items which had been disallowed consisted of copies of evidence taken in Wainewright's case, minutes of the association, notice to produce correspondence, shorthand notes, articles of association, petition to wind up the company, notes of inspection of minute book, and a copy of correspondence for the judge.

The taxing master reviewed his taxation, and stated as his reasons that Wainewright, Thursby, and Grieb, three shareholders in the Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Association, brought separate actions to have their names removed from the register of shareholders. The same solicitor acted for the plaintiffs in all the three actions. Wainewright's action having been tried and decided in favour of the plaintiff, it was arranged that the evidence taken in that action should be used in the other two actions, which were set down for trial and succeeded one another in the list of Kay, J. Both actions were heard on the 16th of January, 1890, the plaintiffs in the two actions being represented by the same counsel, each of whom was supplied with two copies of all the documents and evidence mentioned in the objections—the copies supplied being identical—identical copies being also supplied to the judge. The items in question were disallowed because items similar in every particular were allowed in the bill relating to Thursby's action.

George White, for the summons, asked the court to direct the taxing master to tax the costs on the same principle as if the parties had appeared by separate solicitors: Oppenshaw v. Whitehead, 2 W. R. 172, 9 Ex. 384; Sharp v. Wright, 14 W. R. 552, L. R. 1 Eq. 634; Robb v. Connor, 9 Ir. Rep. Eq. 373, 23 W. R. Dig. 164.

Quin, for the official liqdidator.—The question is within the discretion of the taxing master: R. S. C., ord. 65, r. 27 (8); Appx. N. "Copies"; Annual Practice, p. 1154.

KEKEWICH, J. — There has been a miscarriage of justice in this case. I regard the question from the client's point of view. Grieb sued the company for rescission of contract. He said that he had been induced to take shares by fraudulent misrepresentations. When he retained a solicitor, Grieb was entitled to say to him, "I will have my case taken into court in the best possible way. The briefs and the proofs and the documentary evidence shall be complete; counsel must be instructed; you must go in to win." If the solicitor had said that he was engaged in another case of a similar character, and that it would save expense if he only made one copy of the documents and treated the two actions as one action—if he had said that—Grieb might have said, and if a sensible man he would have said, "I have nothing to do with that action, but I am entitled to the full benefit of your experience, and I ask you to use it for me, and put my case fully before the court." If that is a proper view for the client to take, the solicitor must be entitled to be paid for carrying out those instructions, and if he does the same thing for another client, he is entitled to be paid by him too. It is said that the cases were so much alike that the decision in one must cover the other. But this is a case of fraud, and it does not follow that what was conclusive in one case must be conclusive in the other; and if so, the defendants ought to have said, "Let us try one case, and we will then submit to a similar decision in the other." In my opinion, the solicitor is entitled to be remunerated as if Grieb's case had been the only case. If he had had to serve a subpœna on the same person in both actions, or make a journey, he could not have made the full charge against both his clients, and there are several other matters of the same character which might require to be done but once, for both actions, in which duplicate charges could not be allowed. That was held in Oppenshaw v. Whitehead, which is a useful case, and one which I shall endeavour to follow. Then there is the question of counsel's fees. I am extremely unwilling to refer this question back to the master. He is competent to decide it, and in an ordinary case I should say nothing about it. But I cannot help seeing that the circumstances on which he relies in making the reduction are that the cases are similar, and that they came on together. I do not think that is right. I think counsel ought to have proper briefs in every case. Accordingly, I will refer the whole bill back for taxation, with the direction that, except as regards attendances or other matters which were, or ought to have been, done at one and the same time in both actions, the plaintiff's solicitor is entitled to charge in this action as if he had not been engaged in Thursby's action. The costs of the applicant will be paid to him in any event.

Summons allowed.

REG. v. BRIDGE. (a.)

Justices—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 125-9—Removal of refuse—"Trade refuse"—Decision of magistrate—Right to require magistrate to state case—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33.

The decision of a magistrate under section 129 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, as to what is "trade refuse" within the meaning of that Act is a decision involving a question of law, and a person aggrieved thereby may require the magistrate to state a case for the opinion of the High Court, section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, having modified section 129 of the earlier Act, which states that the magisterial decision shall be "final and conclusive."

Rule nisi under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33, for an order requiring one of the Metropolitan police magistrates to state a case for the opinion of the High Court.

The circumstances were these. The proprietors of the Hotel Metropole in Northumberland-avenue laid an information against the vestry of St. Martin's-in-the-fields complaining that they had not removed from the hotel the produce of certain furnaces. These furnaces were used for working engines which served various purposes connected with the hotel, such as supplying electricity and pumping water, and they produced a large quantity of hard vitrified matter called "clinkers." The vestry was the proper body (referred to in the Act as "scavengers") for "collecting and removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth, . . . in or under houses and places within their parish or district," within section 125 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. Section 128 of that Act provides that the scavengers shall, if required to remove "the refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business," be entitled to be paid a reasonable sum for so doing. Section 129 provides that "If any dispute or difference of opinion arise between the owner or occupier of any such house or land and the scavengers required to remove such refuse as to what shall be considered as refuse, it shall be lawful for any two justices, upon application made to them by either of the parties in difference, to determine whether the subject-matter of dispute is or is not refuse of trade, manufacture, or business . . . and in every such case the decision of such justices shall be final and conclusive." The magistrate decided that the "clinkers" were not trade refuse, and made an order against the vestry. He refused to state a case for the opinion of the High Court on two grounds, firstly that there was no point of law involved, and secondly that under section 129 his decision was final and conclusive.

Crump, Q.C., showed cause.—The question is one of fact, and there was no power to state a case. In Gay v. Cadby, 2 C. P. D. 391, 25 W. R. Dig. 156, the question of whether the magistrate's decision was final was not argued, and section 129 is distinct upon the point and has never been repealed.

R. G. Glenn, in support of the rule.—The decision of the magistrate is no longer final since the Summary Jurisdiction Acts were passed: 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43; 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33. The magistrate is bound to state a case if "a person aggrieved desires to question" his decision "on the ground that it is erroneous in point of law or is in excess of jurisdiction." That the question which arises here—whether these "clinkers" are or are not trade refuse—is a point of law is clear from the case of Gay v. Cadby.

FRY, L.J., after stating the facts, said:—The learned magistrate refused the application that he should state a case upon two grounds—namely, that his decision was final and conclusive under section 129 and that there was no question of law involved. It is no doubt true that for some time after the Act of 1855 was passed the decision of the magistrate was final and conclusive, but now, under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, a party can require the magistrate to state a case for the opinion of this court, on the ground that his decision is erroneous in point of law or is in excess of jurisdiction. In a large number of cases the decision of the magistrate was without appeal, but it was the intention of the Legislature that where a question of law arose it should come before the High Court to decide. The Act of 1855 is so far modified by the later Acts. As to the magistrate's second ground, I consider that a point of construction of a statute is a point of law. There might be cases in which there was simply a dispute as to fact, the words of the Act being clear, and the difficulty being as to the nature of the particular thing in question. But here the question arises on the meaning of the words "ashes" and "trade refuse" in the Act itself, and then the further question may arise as to whether the vestry is bound to remove this refuse. For these reasons I think the magistrate is bound to state a case.

MATHEW, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is a point of construction arising here; that is a point of law and must be decided by this court.

TRUBNER v. TRUBNER AND CHRISTIANI. (a.)

Divorce — Service of citation — Foreign law—Person serving English process liable—Registered letter.

The respondent and co-respondent to a husband's petition for divorce were living in Switzerland. The co-respondent was a foreigner, and, by the Swiss law, anyone serving him with the citation would be liable to an action for damages.

The court dispensed with personal service, and allowed the petitioner to serve the citation by inclosing it in a registered letter, sending also in the same way a copy to the wife, who was living in the same house with the co-respondent.

Motion for leave to dispense with personal service of the citation on the co-respondent.

This was the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The respondent and co-respondent were living together in the same house at Geneva. The respondent had been served there, but the agent of the petitioner's solicitor stated that he could not serve the co-respondent, who was an Austrian subject, as, by the Swiss law, any person serving him would be liable to an action for damages.

Dove, for the petitioner, in support of the motion.

BUTT, J.—You may serve the co-respondent by enclosing the citation in a registered letter addressed to the co-respondent, and also sending a copy to the wife by registered letter.

WOOLCOTT v. PEGGIE. (a.)

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—Rescission.

Among conditions of sale it was provided that, if the purchaser should, within the time limited, make any objection to, or requisition on, the title, which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to remove, it should be lawful for the vendor to annul the sale.

The purchasers offered to give time for the removal of an objection they had made, but only on condition of being given an indemnity, and threatened litigation if the condition were not accepted.

Held, that the vendor acting bonâ fide, was entitled to rescind.

This was an appeal from a judgment dated the 24th of July, 1888, affirming a judgment of Webb, J., dated the 13th of April, 1888.

The facts appear in their lordships' judgment.

Finlay, Q.C., and G. Lawrence, for the appellants, cited Bowman v. Hyland, 26 W. R. 877, 8 Ch. D. 588.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Methold, for the respondent, were not called upon.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord MACNAGHTEN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This is a purchasers' action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of some real property. The defence was that before the action was brought the contract had been annulled by the vendor under a condition in the contract. There was a counter-claim, the result of which necessarily depended on the result of the action.

The condition on which the vendor relied provided that in case the purchaser should, within the time limited, make any objection to, or requisition on, the title which the vendor should be unable or unwilling to remove, it should be lawful for him to annul the sale.

The requisition which led to the question between the parties was, in substance, this. The purchasers called the attention of the vendor to the fact that on the registry there appeared to be the entry of a previous contract by him for the sale of the very same property to a Mr. Taylor, and they required that this entry should be removed. After some little delay, which is fully accounted for by the circumstances of the case, the vendor stated, apparently with perfect truth, that he had never heard of the entry before the purchasers brought it to his notice; and he asserted, and apparently with equal truth, that he had never entered into such a contract as that referred to in the entry. The vendor at once set about getting the entry removed. He commenced proceedings against the person who had improperly procured the entry to be made, but as that person had left the colony he found that it was impossible to bring the matter to a speedy issue. All this was communicated to the purchasers, and they were asked what course they proposed to take. They were willing to give time if the vendor would give an indemnity, but otherwise they insisted on the entry being removed according to the requisition—that is removed forthwith, or, at any rate, before the vendor was to be at liberty to deal with any part of the purchase-money. The vendor was unwilling to give the required indemnity, and unable to remove the entry forthwith. At last, on the 2nd of September, 1887, one of the purchasers, who was a solicitor, and had the conduct of the matter, wrote as follows:—"With regard to Mr. Taylor's claim, I will, as already stated, give you any reasonable time to clear this away. Unless you accept my offer, which is in terms of your letters and the contract, on or before Monday next, I shall take such action as I may be advised to enforce the same." That was in distinct language, threatening the vendor with litigation unless he accepted the purchasers' offer. Their offer was an offer to give time on condition, but only on condition, that he gave an indemnity. The vendor intimated that he should be obliged to annul the sale. The purchasers still insisted on what they considered to be their strict rights. Under these circumstances the vendor gave notice that he rescinded the contract. Their lordships agree with the courts below that he was justified in so doing.

Whether his action is to be regarded as founded upon inability to remove the objection in accordance with the exigency of the requisition, or on unwillingness to proceed further on the footing of a subsisting contract, in face of the consequences with which he was threatened (which seems the more natural view) is wholly immaterial. In either case he was entitled to rescind the contract, provided he acted in good faith.

Their lordships, therefore, will humbly advise her Majesty to dismiss the appeal, and the appellants will pay the costs.

BANK OF NEW SOUTH WALES v. O'CONNOR. (a.)

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.)

Mortgage—Equitable mortgage—Title deeds—Detinue—Summary proceeding for recovery.

The refusal by a mortgagee of a proper tender of the money due to him does not entitle the mortgagor to an action to recover the deeds.

It is now the practice, in relaxation of the rule in Postlethwaite v. Blythe, 2 Swans. 256, where a proper tender has been made and refused, to make an order giving the mortgagor liberty to pay into court a stated sum sufficient to cover the amount of principal, interest, and probable costs of suit, and, upon such payment, requiring the mortgagee to deliver up the title deeds.

Chilton v. Carrington, 3 W. R. 17, 248, 376, 15 C. B. 95, 730, 16 Ibid. 206, explained.

The action which gave rise to the present appeal was for detinue of title deeds against mortgagees with whom they had been deposited as equitable security for a loan; and damages to the amount of £1,500 was awarded by the court below. The facts and proceedings in the Supreme Court of Victoria, including the orders appealed from, dated the 26th of August, 1887, and the 2nd of November, 1887, respectively, appear in their lordships' judgment.

Finlay, Q.C., and Lofthouse, for the appellants, contended that the damages awarded were too remote, and the evidence thereof inadmissible.—In any case they were excessive.

They cited The Notting Hill, 32 W. R. 764, 9 P. D. 105; British Columbia Saw Mill Co. v. Nettleship, 16 W. R. 1046, L. R. 3 C. P. 499.

Channell, Q.C., and Gould, for the respondents.—Detinue will lie in a case of this kind when the detention is wrongful: Chilton v. Carrington, 3 W. R. 17, 248, 376, 15 C. B. 95, 318, 730, 16 C. B. 206; Phillips v. Hayward, 3 Dowl. 362; Williams v. Archer, 5

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord WATSON, Lord FITZGERALD, Lord HOBHOUSE, Lord MACNAGHTEN, and Sir WILLIAM GROVE) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The question involved in this appeal is one of some importance to persons who may be concerned in lending or borrowing money on mortgage in Victoria.

There are no facts in dispute.

O'Connor, the plaintiff in the action, was a coach builder in Beechworth, a comparatively small town in daily communication by rail with Melbourne, and distant, apparently, some few hours' journey from that city. He was in a fair way of business. His profits, he says, averaged from £400 to £500 a year, and his business seems to have been increasing down to the end of 1886.

O'Connor kept an account with the Beechworth branch of the Bank of New South Wales from October, 1884. In the course of the next two years he somewhat crippled his resources by contesting a seat in the Legislative Assembly, and by incurring some expense in furnishing a house on the occasion of his marriage. He borrowed from his mother, Mrs. Pye, who lived in Melbourne, two sums of £150 and £200 without security, both of which he paid back with interest. He also incurred a debt of £100 to the bank. To secure that sum he deposited the title deeds of a small plot of ground where he carried on his business. The land is said to have been worth £200, and the buildings on it, which were of wood, and about eight years old, some £400 more. He acquired the property from his uncle by a voluntary conveyance in January, 1886. He mortgaged it to the bank by a deed dated the 22nd of February, 1886, which was duly registered. The mortgage was in the form of an absolute conveyance in trust for sale. The proceeds were to be applied in payment of expenses, and then in satisfaction of the debt, with interest, and the surplus was to be paid to the debtor as personal estate. The deed had a proviso that nothing therein contained should extinguish, prejudice, or affect any lien or security which the bank was entitled to in respect of the deposit of the title deeds relating to the property.

On the 24th of January, 1887, O'Connor's working account with the bank was in credit to the amount of £1 4s. 9d. On the following day it was overdrawn, and it was never again in credit. On the 4th of February, Hannaford, the manager of the bank at Beechworth, wrote to O'Connor, stating that his account was £61 overdrawn, and requiring him to pay in £125 to cover the overdraft and some bills maturing that day. Besides his working account and the account secured by the mortgage of February, 1886, O'Connor had a discount account with the bank. It comprised two classes of bills discounted for him by the bank—(1) bills of which he was indorsee, and (2) acceptances of his discounted at his request for the convenience of other persons. In reply to Hannaford's letter O'Connor called at the bank and said that he could not pay in £125 straight off at such short notice. He seems to have satisfied Hannaford that the bills referred to in his letter were or would be provided for.

On Monday, the 14th of February, 1887, Hannaford wrote again to O'Connor, stating that his working account was £67 overdrawn, that it was the balance day of the week, and that O'Connor must get the account largely reduced before three o'clock. He added that he hoped that O'Connor did not give out any wages cheques on Saturday. O'Connor went immediately to the bank, and assumed a somewhat indignant tone, apparently on the ground that he had been in the habit of having an overdrawn account. It was a strange way of doing banking business, he said, to send him a letter on Monday, knowing his wages cheques were all paid on Saturday. However, he got Hannaford to promise to honour some small cheques of his which were outstanding, and then he said, "One thing, you won't trouble me much longer with letters of this kind. I'll go to Melbourne some time this week, and get enough money to carry on independent of the bank."

On Friday, the 18th of February, O'Connor called at the bank, and said he was going to Melbourne to get the money to carry on his business. Thereupon, at his request, Hannaford consented to pay a bill for £12 15s., which would fall due on the next day. O'Connor promised to be back about Wednesday, the 23rd.

O'Connor went to Melbourne and saw his mother. She promised to lend him £600. She said at the trial he might have had £1,000. She advanced him £300 in cash, on the terms that the money was to be used for lifting his deeds at the bank, and for no other purpose. He was to take his sister with him to the bank and hand over the deeds to her. The deeds were to be brought back or the money restored at once.

O'Connor returned to Beechworth on Saturday night. The wages of his men, which were due at one p.m. on that day, were unpaid. When he returned home he had only £6 or £8 of his own, and he owed about £20 for wages. The men reassembled for work on Monday, the 21st. He told them he would pay them at dinner time, but he failed to do so, and some of the men struck work then and there.

On the same day, Monday, the 21st—but whether before or after this occurrence is not stated—O'Connor went to the bank with his sister, taking with him his mother's money in a bag. Hannaford had made out O'Connor's account up to the 23rd of February, showing a balance of £371 3s. 4d. in respect of indebtedness and liability. The items shortly were as follows:—

Secured account	103	12	0
Working account	81	14	5
Discount account—
As indorsee	106	7	6
As acceptor	79	9	5
	£371	3	4

O'Connor objected to the last item of £79 9s. 5d., saying it was "monstrous," as the bills would not be due for months. He struck it out, and then tendered the balance and demanded his securities. Hannaford refused to hand them over unless the whole amount of debt and liability were cleared off, saying he had to obey instructions. O'Connor observed that he had to return the money or take back the deeds at once. Hannaford then said that he would send the deeds and bills to the head office in Melbourne. O'Connor, after consideration, said that he would take the money to Melbourne, and he asked for and obtained a copy of the document on which the bank relied. It does not appear that O'Connor told Hannaford, at that interview, how he was situated with his workmen, or that he asked for any further indulgence from the bank.

Instead of taking the money to Melbourne at once, O'Connor wrote a letter to his mother which she seems to have mislaid. On Tuesday, the 22nd, she sent a reply in the handwriting of her son, a boy of about eight or nine years old, which said, "Ma went to the bank and found that the money did not come down. Ma is annoyed about it, as she expected the money to be there to-day. Ma said she does not want no humbugging with you." On receipt of this letter O'Connor went to Hannaford and said his mother had written to him an angry letter, and that he should now be unable to get money from her. On Thursday O'Connor took the money back to his mother.

On Saturday, the 26th of February, Hannaford wrote to O'Connor, saying that he had had a communication from the head office, and that the bank would not insist on payment of the £79 9s. 5d., less rebate, though they were entitled to do so.

On the 28th of February the writ in this action was issued.

On the 8th of March the bank waived their claim to a general lien.

Under these circumstances, if O'Connor had brought an action for redemption on the day on which the writ was issued, he might possibly have been entitled to costs up to the 8th of March. On the other hand, if he had persisted in the action after the bank offered to release the securities on payment of the amount expressly secured, he would, according to the ordinary and settled practice of the court, have had to pay the costs of the action.

A mortgagee is entitled to his principal and interest, and the ordinary charges and expenses connected with the security. He is also entitled as of right to the costs properly incident to an action for foreclosure or redemption, though he may forfeit those costs by misconduct, and may even have to pay the costs of such an action in a case where he has acted vexatiously or unreasonably. In Cotterell v. Stratton, 21 W. R. 234, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 295, Lord Selborne observes that this right, resting substantially upon contract, can only be lost or curtailed by such inequitable conduct on the part of the mortgagee as may amount to a violation or culpable neglect of his duty under the contract, and that any departure from these principles would tend to destroy, or at least very materially to shake and impair, the security of mortgage transactions, and he goes on to point out that such a departure, instead of being beneficial to those who may have occasion to borrow money on security, would, in the result, throw them into the hands of those who indemnify themselves against extraordinary risks by extraordinary exactions. In the present case it is not easy to understand how the bank, or their manager, can be charged with vexatious or unreasonable conduct. It is admitted that Hannaford acted in good faith. Whether the claim to a general lien was well founded or not, there was some colour for it in the mortgage deed. Considering that the bank were careful to take a formal security for £100, it is difficult to suppose that they would have allowed O'Connor to get so deeply into their books, or that he would have assumed so bold and defiant a tone in his communications with Hannaford, if it had not been taken for granted on both sides that the bank had some security in their hands. Hannaford was merely a subordinate, acting under instructions, as O'Connor knew. O'Connor had given no notice that he intended to draw a line at a certain point in the account. There was no opportunity of consulting the head office. Hannaford, therefore, seems to have taken a reasonable course in sending the deeds up to Melbourne, where Mrs. Pye lived. O'Connor apparently acquiesced at the time in the course proposed. That the affair was not completed in Melbourne was not the fault of the the bank or the fault of Hannaford. Unless due to a capricious change of purpose on the part of Mrs. Pye, or to a determination on O'Connor's part to bring a speculative action, it must have been due to want of confidence created in Mrs. Pye's mind by O'Connor's failure to return the money to her at once. On the notes of the evidence there is nothing to account for it but this passage in O'Connor's deposition,—"My mother would not lend me the money again. She was angry with me."

The action, however, which O'Connor brought against the bank was not an action for redemption. It was an action of detinue. The writ was issued in haste. But the statement of claim was not delivered until the 14th of April. It is certainly a singular document. It does not refer to the mortgage of February, 1886, or notice the fact that the deeds were deposited as a security. It simply states that the bank on the 21st of February, 1887, detained, and had always since such time detained, from the plaintiff his title deeds. It specifies the deeds, and states that by reason of such detention the plaintiff had suffered damage as follows:—"He was rendered unable to procure a loan of £600 from Annie Pye . . . and unable to pay his workmen in his business as coach builder, and was compelled to discharge some of his said workmen, and was rendered unable to meet his liabilities in his said business, and was sued in respect thereof, and his credit was injured and his trade diminished, and his said business was otherwise injured." Then it claims a return of the deeds, or £1,000 for their value, and £2,000 for their detention.

The defence was delivered on the 29th of April. It is equally remarkable. For some unexplained reason, the bank also abstained from referring to the mortgage of February, 1886, which apparently in any view would have been an answer to the action as framed. But they did plead that before the alleged detention the plaintiff deposited the said deeds with them to secure the repayment of £100, and that the said sum was due at the time of the detention, and still remained due. Without admitting liability, they brought into court £50 and one shilling, and they delivered a counter-claim for money due to them.

In reply, the plaintiff admitted the deposit by way of security, as well as the fact that the sum intended to be secured was due at the time of the detention, and still remained due. He then stated the tender on the 21st of February, and its refusal.

Instead of applying to have the question raised by the pleadings disposed of at once, and the action stayed or dismissed, the bank allowed the action to be set down for trial. It came on to be tried on the 20th of July, 1887, before Mr. Justice Holroyd and a jury. In addition to proof of the facts already stated, evidence of a somewhat loose and unsatisfactory description was offered, with the view of proving the special damages alleged in the statement of claim. This evidence was objected to, on the ground that the damages claimed were too remote. The learned judge admitted the evidence, but reserved the question of its inadmissibility for the consideration of the full court. No evidence was given on the part of the defence. The jury estimated the value of the property at £700. They gave £1,500 damages for detention, and they found that there was due to the bank under the counter-claim the sum of £284 2s. 7d., which was afterwards reduced by consent to £202 1s.

The question reserved came on to be argued before the full court on the 10th of August, 1887, when it was held that the evidence objected to was admissible.

On the 26th of August, 1887, on motion for judgment, the court adjudged:—

1. That the plaintiff recover against the defendant £1,500 on his claim.

2. That the defendant recover against the plaintiff the sum of £202 1s. on the counter-claim.

Provision was made for set off and payment of the balance, and the bank renouncing any further claim on the deeds, the subject of the action, they were to be delivered up to the plaintiff. The bank was ordered to pay the costs of the action and the costs of the argument before the full court, after deducting the costs of the counter-claim.

On the 2nd of November, 1887, the bank moved the full court for an order to set aside the verdict for the plaintiff, on the grounds that it was against the weight of evidence, that the damages were excessive, and that evidence had been improperly admitted. The only ground argued was that the damages were excessive. The court ordered that the verdict should be affirmed, and that the motion for a new trial should be dismissed, with costs.

The bank has appealed to Her Majesty in Council from the two orders of the full court and the judgment of the 26th of August, 1887.

The whole matter is therefore open with this exception, that the bank cannot now be permitted to rely upon the legal mortgage of the 22nd of February, 1886, although it was put in evidence at the trial by the plaintiff. They deliberately elected to treat the case as if they had only an equitable mortgage by deposit, and the appeal must be decided on that footing.

The learned counsel for the appellants dwelt with much force on the extravagance of a verdict which even their opponents described as liberal, and on the novel dangers to which mortgagees would be exposed if such a verdict were upheld. They contended, too, that no damages, or at any rate no substantial damages, were due either in fact or in law. These contentions and the arguments by which they were supported would be worthy of careful attention if it were necessary to consider them. But in their lordships' opinion there is a more serious question which must be disposed of in the first instance. That question is raised on the pleadings, though the attention of the court below was apparently not called to it. The appellants are to blame as well as the respondent for the way in which the litigation was conducted. But their lordships are not at liberty to countenance a departure from settled principles, because in the conduct of the action both parties have chosen to ignore them.

The question that suggests itself is, can such an action as this be maintained? It was treated by the learned counsel for the respondent, and indeed by the learned counsel for the appellants, during a great part of their argument, as an action for damages occasioned by a wrongful act arising out of breach of contract. What is the wrongful act? And what is the breach of contract? Their lordships have not had the advantage of seeing a note of the summing up. But in the full court the learned judge who tried the case states his views as follows:—"In my opinion there was a contract here to deliver up the deeds on payment of a certain sum of money. That was broken when the money was tendered and ought to have been accepted. Then the bank was in the same position as if it had actually taken the money and then refused to deliver up the deeds. That was a wrongful detention of another man's property, and, therefore, a tort." The bank was, no doubt, bound to deliver up the deeds on payment of the sum secured, with interest and costs, if any. But, in their lordships' opinion, there is no foundation for the proposition that a tender properly made and improperly rejected is equivalent to payment in the case of a mortgage. The proposition seems to be founded on a mistaken analogy. If a chattel be pledged, the general property remains in the pledgor. The pledgee has only a special property. According to the doctrines of common law, that special property is determined if a proper tender is made and refused. The pledgee then becomes a wrong-doer. The pledgor can at once recover the chattel by action at law. But it is not so in the case of a mortgage, where the mortgagor's estate is gone at law, nor is it so in the case of an equitable mortgage. A mortgagor coming into equity to redeem, must do equity and pay principal, interest, and costs before he can recover the property which at law is not his. So it is in the case of an equitable mortgage. It is a well established rule of equity that a deposit of a document of title without either writing or word of mouth will create in equity a charge upon the property to which the document relates to the extent of the interest of the person who makes the deposit. In the absence of consent that charge can only be displaced by actual payment of the amount secured. Before the fusion of law and equity a court of equity would undoubtedly have restrained the legal owner of the property from recovering his title deeds at law so long as the charge continued, and now, when law and equity are both administered by the same court, if there be any conflict the rules of equity must prevail. In Postlethwaite v. Blythe, 2 Swans. 256, where property had been conveyed to secure a debt of a comparatively small amount, the Lord Chancellor refused to direct a release upon payment into court of the largest sum to which the debt would in probability amount. Lord Eldon said: "I take it to be contrary to the whole course of proceeding in this court to compel a creditor to part with his security till he has received his money. Nothing but consent can authorize me to take the estate from the plaintiff before payment." To some extent the strictness of that rule has been relaxed in modern times, and it is now the practice, where a proper tender has been made and refused, to make an order giving the mortgagor liberty to pay into court a stated sum sufficient to cover the amount of principal and interest and the probable costs of the suit, and then upon payment into court, but not till then, the mortgagee is required by the order to deliver up the title deeds. It would be contrary to equity to order a mortgagee to deliver up the title deeds of property on which he has a security upon any other terms. A mortgagor has no right even to see the deeds before payment. It is no hardship upon the mortgagor, for if he has made a proper tender he can always obtain his deeds on a summary application on the terms of substituting for the security a sum of money equal to the amount secured with a proper margin. A form of order adapted to such a case is to be found in Seton on Decrees, 3rd ed., p. 1040.

No doubt it is the duty of a mortgagee, on proper notice, or without notice in a case where notice is not required, to accept a proper tender. No doubt that duty is founded upon contract. But there are other terms of the contract of at least equal importance. A court of equity can take all the circumstances of the case into consideration, and do complete justice between the parties, however complicated their relations may be. That is not within the province or power of a jury. If a mortgagee rejects a tender he rejects it at his own risk, and in an action for redemption he may be refused his costs in consequence, or may even be ordered to pay costs. Further, a proper tender will stop the running of interest if the mortgagor keeps the money ready to pay over to the mortgagee; Gyles v. Hall, 2 P. W. 377. But there is no authority for saying that refusal to accept a proper tender is a breach of contract, for which an action at law will lie.

The learned counsel for the respondent were invited to produce some authority for such an action. One case, and one case only, was cited as a precedent. In Chilton v. Carrington, the experiment was tried once and again. But the result of two actions in that case, so far as they are reported, affords but little encouragement for a repetition of the experiment.

In Chilton v. Carrington the assignee of a bankrupt publican sought to recover the title deeds of a public-house which had been deposited with the defendants to secure a sum of £150. The action was brought after tender. The plaintiff sued for detention of the deeds, which were described in the declaration as "goods and chattels," and for damages. The defendants did not put in an equitable plea, but their case was that the deposit was intended to secure an account for beer as well as the £150. That question was tried on demurrer. It was held that the deposit was only a security for the £150. The parties then went to trial, and, there being no equitable defence, they agreed that the jury should find the damages for the detention, and that they should not be required to assess the value of the so-called goods and chattels. Upon this arrangement the jury found a verdict for £60 damages. The plaintiff then applied to the judge in chambers for delivery up of the deeds. The defendants urged that they ought not to be required to deliver up the deeds before payment. The learned judge, however, made the order. The defendants then applied to the full court to set aside the order, and argued that, according to the settled principles of equity, they could not be required to part with their security until they were paid. The learned judges were puzzled by the course which the parties had taken. In the course of the argument, addressing the counsel for the defendants, Williams, J., observed with perfect accuracy, "If you are right the plaintiff ought not to have succeeded in the action." Ultimately, the court got over the difficulty by setting aside the order in chambers, on the ground that by arrangement between the parties the jury had been discharged from finding the value of the deeds detained. As the result of that action the plaintiff was no nearer getting back his deeds. However, he still contended that, having made a proper tender, and that tender having been refused, he was entitled to have his deeds without payment of the money. So he brought another action of detinue. On this occasion the defendants were better advised, and they put in a plea by way of equitable defence that the deeds were deposited to secure £150, and that that sum remained unpaid. On argument, the court allowed the plea to be put in, and nothing further seems to have been heard of the action.

That case, so far from being an authority in favour of the respondent, is really an authority against him.

Their lordships are therefore of opinion that it is clear, both on principle and authority, that such an action as the present cannot be maintained. Under these circumstances their lordships do not propose to give any opinion as to the admissibility of the evidence objected to or as to the amount of the damages recovered. Those questions, in the view of their lordships, cannot arise.

The proper order will be to dismiss the action, to allow the verdict on the counter-claim as reduced by consent to stand, and to direct payment to the appellants of the reduced amount, together with interest and the costs of the counter-claim.

As to the costs of the action, having regard to the way in which the bank has acted in the conduct of the litigation, their lordships have come to the conclusion that there ought to be no costs on either side, and there will be no costs of the appeal.

Their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty accordingly.

Appeal allowed.

In re BRYANT AND BARNINGHAM'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract for sale of settled land by trustees—Trustees with no power of sale at date of contract—Tenant for life willing to convey under the Settled Land Act, 1882*—Repudiation by purchaser before day fixed for completion.*

Trustees of real estate, with a power of sale only arising on the death of a tenant for life, who have during the life of the tenant for life entered into a contract as vendors to sell the estate, cannot make a good title by showing, before the date fixed for completion, both that the tenant for life is willing to convey under the Settled Land Act, 1882, the estate to the purchaser, and that trustees for the purposes of the Act have been appointed.

Trustees entered into a contract to sell the fee simple in possession of certain real estate. The conditions of sale fixed a day for completion, and stipulated that the vendors and other necessary parties (if any) would, on completion, convey the property to the purchaser. The abstract of title disclosed the fact that the vendors' power of sale did not arise until the death of a life tenant. The purchaser by his requisitions took this objection, and the vendors answered that the tenant for life (who was living) would make a title under the Settled Land Act, and had agreed in writing to the sale by the vendors, and would execute all necessary assurances to give effect to the sale, and that an appointment of trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, was then pending. The purchaser, in reply—and before the day fixed for completion of the contract—declined to purchase from the tenant for life, repudiated the contract, and demanded a return of the deposit. Trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act were appointed, and notice of such appointment was given to the purchaser by the vendors before the day for completion.

On the day fixed for completion the purchaser took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to have it declared that the vendors had not shown a good title in accordance with the contract, and claiming a return of the deposit, with interest thereon at four per cent. per annum from the date of the contract until payment, and the costs of investigating the title.

Held (affirming Kay, J.), that the purchaser was entitled to an order in the terms of his summons.

Appeal from Kay, J.

By the will, dated the 12th of March, 1884, of W. J. Bryant, deceased, a small residential estate called "Highwoods" was devised unto and to the use of Walter G. T. Bryant and F. J. Cullingford, upon trust, to permit the testator's wife to reside therein during her life, she keeping the same in repair, and after her decease the same was to fall into the residue and be held upon the trusts thereof; and the residuary real and personal estate was devised and bequeathed unto and to the use of the said Walter G. T. Bryant and F. J. Cullingford, on trust to sell.

On the 22nd of October, 1889, a contract for the sale of the "Highwoods" estate was entered into between the said Walter G. T. Bryant and F. J. Cullingford, as vendors, and W. Barningham, as purchaser.

This contract was entered into by the trustees with the approval of the tenant for life (the testator's widow), who was then, and still is, living, but she was not a party to the contract.

The conditions of sale stipulated that the contract was to be completed on the 2nd of December, 1889; that the purchaser was to pay a deposit on signing the contract; and that (condition 8), "upon payment of the remainder of the purchaser-money, . . . the vendors and other necessary parties (if any) will convey the property to the purchaser. The conveyance, and every assurance, act, matter, and thing (if any) which shall be required by the purchaser for getting in or releasing any outstanding estate, rent, or interest, or for completing or perfecting the vendor's title, or for any other purpose, shall be made and done by, and at the expense of, the purchaser."

The purchaser, in his requisitions, sent in on the 14th of November, 1889, took the objection that the trust for sale did not arise till after the death of Mrs. Bryant; that her death was not abstracted; and that if she were still living the trustees could not make a good title.

The reply was, that Mrs. Bryant was still living, and would make a title as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act; that an application to the court for the appointment of trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Act was, in fact, pending; and that Mrs. Bryant had given her consent in writing to the sale being carried out and to execute all necessary documents to give effect to the sale.

On November 25, 1889, the purchaser, with reference to this answer, wrote that he declined to enter into any fresh arrangements or to purchase the property from Mrs. Bryant, and that he, therefore, required the vendors to return his deposit, with interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum from October 22 until payment, and to pay his costs of investigating the title.

On November 28 Walter G. T. Bryant and F. C. Johnson were appointed trustees of the will for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts.

On November 29 the vendors' solicitors wrote giving the purchaser notice of this appointment of trustees, and that the vendors insisted, both on their own behalf and on behalf of Mrs. Bryant, that the purchaser must complete his contract.

On December 2, 1889, the purchaser issued a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, asking to have it declared that a good title to the property comprised in the contract of sale had not been shown in accordance with such contract; that the vendors might be ordered to repay to the purchaser his deposit, with interest at 4 per cent. from October 22, 1889, until payment, and to pay the purchaser's costs of investigating the title, to be ascertained by the judge in chambers in case the parties differed, and the costs of the application.

The summons was adjourned into court, and was heard before Kay, J., on December 19, 1889, who decided in favour of the purchaser, the applicant, and made an order in the terms of the summons.

The vendors appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Frederic Thompson, for the appellants.—The contract was repudiated by the purchaser on November 25, but it was not open to the purchaser to repudiate until December 2, the day fixed for completion; if the tenant for life had died before December 2 the trustees could have given a good title to the purchaser. Though vendors may not have a good title at the date of the contract, it is settled law that if they acquire a good title before the day fixed for completion, or even before the date of the chief clerk's certificate, the court will decree specific performance of the contract: Langford v. Pitt, 2 P. Wms. 629; Mortimer v. McCallan, 6 M. & W. 58; Hibblewhite v. McMorine, 5 M. & W. 462. The 8th condition of the contract of sale shows that it was contemplated that there might be a conveyance required from persons other than the vendors for the purpose of completing the vendors' title, "or otherwise." The vendors are not, therefore, forcing a new contract on the purchaser. On December 2 the vendors were in a position to carry out the contract and to give the purchaser a complete title to the fee by means of the concurrence of the tenant for life in the sale, Marlborough v. Sartoris, 35 W. R. 55, 32 Ch. D. 616; Hatten v. Russell, 36 W. R. 317, 38 Ch. D. 334. If A. contracts to sell land which he has not got, but which B. has got, if B. consents to the sale by A., the purchaser will be held to his bargain: Sidebotham v. Barrington, 4 Beav. 110; Paton v. Rogers, 1 Ves. & B. p. 353; Wynn v. Morgan, 7 Ves. 202; Murrell v. Goodyear, 8 W. R. 398, 1 De G. F. & J. 432; Nock v. Newman, cited in Dart. V. & P. 6th ed., vol. 2, p. 1179.

Marten, Q.C., and J. G. Wood, for the purchaser, were not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—In my opinion this appeals fails. I do not doubt that if the vendors, the present appellants, could have made a good title before the date fixed for completion, the purchaser would have been bound to accept it. But that is not the case here. The vendors cannot even now make a good title; they, the vendors, cannot themselves convey the estate. The vendors' power of sale only arises on the death of a tenant for life, and she is still living. If the tenant for life was a person who could concur so as to make the title of the trustees as vendors a good title, the case would be very different. But the title of the trustees as vendors is not made good by the concurrence of the tenant for life. The trustees cannot, therefore, make a good title as vendors, and, though the tenant for life can make a good title as vendor under the Settled Land Act, yet the purchaser has never contracted to buy from the tenant for life as vendor, and cannot, therefore, be compelled to do so.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I agree.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The contract with the purchaser was that a good title was to be made out by the trustees as vendors, and what is now proposed is, to substitute the tenant for life as vendor. The purchaser cannot be forced to accept that.

Appeal dismissed.

Practice — Originating summons — Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 55, r. 3—Jurisdiction—Will—Power of appointment—Remoteness.

A testatrix devised freehold estate to the use of trustees in fee, upon trust to pay the net income to her sister M. for life, and then to M.'s children for life successively in order of age, and after the death of M. and all her children, to the testatrix's sister E. for life, and then to E.'s children for life successively in order of age, and after the death of M. and E. and all their children, the said trustees were to stand seised of the property in trust for such persons and in such manner as the longest liver of M., E., and their children should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for the testatrix's heir-at-law absolutely. M. and E. having both survived the testatrix, one of M.'s children, who turned out to be the longest liver of M., E., and their children, made a will purporting to appoint the property

Held, by the Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of Kay, J.), that the case was within ord. 55, r. 3, and that there was, therefore, jurisdiction to decide it on originating summons.

All the parties being present and requesting to have the case on the merits decided, it was held by the Court of Appeal that the longest liver of M., E., and their children, being not necessarily ascertainable within a life in being and twenty-one years, the power of appointment given to such longest liver was void, and, therefore, upon the termination of the life estates given to M., E., and their children, the heir-at-law of the original testatrix was entitled to the property as undisposed of.

By will of the 24th of November, 1838, Hannah Hargreaves devised specified freeholds to the use of John Townsend and Henry King upon trust to receive the rents, issues, and profits, and, after deducting expenses, pay the residue to the testatrix's sister Mary for life for her separate use, as therein mentioned, and after her decease upon further trust to pay the residue of such rents, &c., to her oldest child during his or her life, and after the decease of such oldest child to the next oldest child during his or her life, and so on in succession till all the children of Mary should have died, and after the decease of Mary and all her children upon further trusts to pay the residue of such rents, issues, and profits to the testator's sister Eliza for life for her separate use, as therein mentioned, and after her decease to pay such residue to her children successively in the same way as to Mary's, and from and after the decease of the testatrix's said sisters Mary and Eliza and all their children, she directed that the trustees should stand seised of the said freeholds, in trust for such person or persons, in such parts, shares, and proportions, as the longest liver of the said sisters Mary and Eliza and their children should, notwithstanding coverture, by deed or will appoint, and, in default of appointment, upon trust for the testatrix's heir-at-law absolutely.

The testatrix died in December, 1838. Her sister Mary died in 1864, leaving two children. The testatrix's other sister Eliza died in 1873, without issue. Of Mary's two children, one died in 1871, and the other, Hannah Tatley, in 1889, after appointing the property by will to a trustee in trust for her children.

An originating summons was taken out by the persons on whom the legal estate in the property had devolved to decide the question whether the trust limitations following the limitations of life estates to Mary, Eliza, and their children were valid, and, if not, who was entitled to the property. The person claiming under the original testatrix's heir-at-law and the trustee appointed under Hannah Tatley's will were made defendants. The summons was adjourned into court.

Kay, J., held that he had no jurisdiction on an originating summons to determine a question affecting the rights of a person claiming adversely to the will, and that this was really an equitable ejectment. He therefore declined to hear it.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Byland, for the appellants.—There is jurisdiction to decide such a case as this upon an originating summons under ord. 55, r. 3: In re Davies, 36 W. R. 587, 38 Ch. D. 210; In re Royle, ante, p. 17, 43 Ch. D. 18. Everything which can be decided in an administration action can be decided on an originating summons. We are willing to have the case decided here upon the merits.

Upjohn, for the person claiming under the heir-at-law.—The court has jurisdiction to decide this question upon summons. As the property is very small it is desirable to have the case disposed of here without further expense.

F. Thompson, for the trustee of Hannah Tatley's will, concurred.

The COURT decided to hear the case on the merits.

F. Thompson, for H. Tatley's trustee.—This being a general power, the appointment is not to be read into the will of the original testatrix: Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., pp. 394-5. The appointor's children could have disposed of their interests, vested and contingent, immediately after the death of the tenants for life, so that the case is not within the mischief of the rule against perpetuities, which is intended to prevent land being rendered inalienable. In Avern v. Lloyd, 16 W. R. 669, L. R. 5 Eq. 383, where the gift of the absolute interest to the survivor of unborn issue was substantially equivalent to the power here, that gift was held not void for remoteness.

He also referred to Gilbertson v. Richards, 4 H. & N. 277, 5 Ibid. 453, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 82, 8 Ibid. 69; In re Harvey, Peek v. Savory, 39 Ch. D. 289, 297, 37 W. R. Upjohn was not called on.

COTTON, L.J.—This case came before Kay, J., who appears to have thought that he had no power to decide it upon an originating summons under ord. 55, r. 3; but I cannot quite agree with his view. It is a case in which trustees of a will who have vested in them the legal estate in fee in the property, and are also in possession of it, come here and ask us to decide the question to whom they ought, upon the construction of the will, to hand over the property. I think it would be giving too narrow a construction to rule 3 of order 55 if we were to decide that this question cannot be raised by the trustees by an originating summons under that rule. That being so, and all parties being willing to have the question decided here, we have, in order to save further expense, heard the question of merits in this court.

The question to whom the beneficial interest in the property now belongs depends upon whether the power of appointment given by the will to the longest liver of the sisters of the testatrix and their children was void for infringing the rule against perpetuities. Of course the gifts to the sisters themselves and their children for their lives were good; but, in my opinion, the power of appointment was bad. Can it be said that this limitation was to persons who must be in existence within the period fixed by the rule against perpetuities? The power was given to the last survivor of the sisters and their children. Well, the last survivor might not have been ascertainable within the period allowed by that rule. Therefore, in my opinion, that limitation was bad. On the death of the last survivor of the class the equitable estate devolved upon the testatrix's heir-at-law, not under any trust in his favour contained in her will, but by reason of the intestacy caused by the invalidity of the ulterior limitations.

The case of Avern v. Lloyd, before Stuart, V.C., was very like this indeed. I do not say whether that case is consistent with the decision in London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm. In Avern v. Lloyd Stuart, V.C., asks why, a limitation of life estates to unborn children being valid, an ultimate limitation following those life estates should not be valid too? Unquestionably it may be, provided it is to persons who are necessarily ascertainable within the period allowed by the perpetuities rule. But that is not the case here—the question is whether the limitation is not made to a class of persons the last survivor of whom may not be ascertainable within that period. It is true (apart from the question of invalidity for remoteness) that the children could have disposed of their vested and contingent interests immediately after the death of the tenants for life, and it was contended that, therefore, as there was nothing to prevent alienation, the limitation was not within the mischief of the rule against perpetuities. But, in my opinion, that is not the way in which we must look at this case. An executory limitation which is to take effect on the happening of an event which may possibly not happen within a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards, is not rendered valid by the fact that the person in whose favour it is made may be able to dispose of it.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The person who is to exercise this power is not necessarily ascertainable within the limits of the rule against perpetuities, and therefore the power cannot be good, though the case of Avern v. Lloyd is relied on against that view by the appellant.

As regards the point of jurisdiction, I cannot help thinking that Kay, J., must have formed his judgment under some misapprehension as to the nature of the case. It is impossible to say that this case is not within both the words and the spirit of ord. 55, r. 3. There may be cases where, the facts being disputed, the judge may think he cannot safely decide the question in a summary way, and may therefore require the parties to proceed by action; but there are no facts in dispute here at all, and it is clear that there is jurisdiction to decide the question upon a summons.

Then, as regards the merits of the case, as I have said, the person to exercise this power is not necessarily ascertainable within the prescribed period, and the power is therefore void. The only difficulty is presented by the case of Avern v. Lloyd, but, as that case has not been followed, that difficulty can be got over, as I do not think it was rightly decided.

LOPES, L.J.—I think this case comes within the words and spirit of rule 3 of order 55, and that Kay, J., had, therefore, jurisdiction to decide it on an originating summons under that rule.

As regards the question of validity, I am of opinion that the ulterior limitations are bad for the reasons given by Cotton, and Lindley, L.JJ.

Ship—Action by master for disbursements—Arrest of ship—Mortgagees paying claim—Indemnity against owners.

A ship having been arrested in an action by the master for disbursements, the plaintiffs, who were the registered mortgagees of forty-eight sixty-fourth shares, in order to obtain the release of the ship, paid the master's claim, and brought an action to recover the amount so paid from the defendants, the owners of the remaining sixteen sixty-fourth shares.

Held, that, as the plaintiffs' shares in the ship had been lawfully seized for a debt for which the defendants were liable, and as the plaintiffs had been compelled to pay that debt in order to obtain the release of their property, there was an implied promise on the part of the defendants to reimburse the plaintiffs the sum so paid; and the action was, therefore, maintainable.

Edmunds v. Wallingford, 33 W. R. 647, 14 Q. B. D. 811, followed.

Appeal from the judgment of Butt, J.

The plaintiffs were the registered mortgagees of forty-eight sixty-fourth shares in the steamship Orchis, belonging to the defendant Hornstedt, who was the managing owner of the ship, and who had mortgaged the shares to the plaintiffs. The defendants other than Hornstedt were the owners of the remaining sixteen sixty-fourth shares.

In May, 1886, the defendants became liable to the master of the ship for necessary disbursements to the amount of £422 15s. 7d. incurred while the ship was prosecuting a voyage for the joint benefit of the defendants, and the master brought an action in rem in the Admiralty Division to recover that amount, and the ship was arrested. The plaintiffs, being desirous of taking possession of the ship under the mortgage, and in order to do so, paid the master the above-mentioned sum and £18 9s. 3d. for costs, and obtained the release of the ship. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action to recover the sum so paid, on the ground that the payment was made by the plaintiffs under compulsion, and was one which the defendants were legally compellable to pay. The defendant Hornstedt admitted liability, and the action was proceeded with against the other defendants, the owners of the sixteen sixty-fourth shares.

Butt, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

French, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants.—The master had no maritime lien on the ship for disbursements: The Sara, ante, p. 129, 14 App. Cas. 209,* and, therefore, had no priority over the mortgagees. The master had no right as against the mortgagees' shares, and the plaintiffs were not, therefore, compelled to pay.

They also referred to Edmunds v. Wallingford, 33 W. R. 647, 14 Q. B. D. 811; The Volant, 1 W. Rob. 383; The Nelly Schneider, 3 P. D. 152, 27 W. R. Dig. 202; The Heinrich Bjorn, 33 W. R. 719, 10 P. D. 44, 11 App. Cas. 270, 34 W. R. Dig. 179; The Cels, 36 W. R. 540, 13 P. D. 82.

J. G. Barnes, Q.C., and J. P. Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This action, which is a pure common law action, though tried in the Admiralty Division, is brought by the mortgagees of forty-eight sixty-fourth shares in The Orchis to recover a certain sum of money from the defendants. This sum was paid by the plaintiffs to secure the release of the ship from arrest by the Admiralty Court in an action by the master for disbursements for necessaries. To enforce his claim the master was entitled to have the ship seized. The arrest was, therefore, legal. The plaintiffs were entitled as mortgagees to possession of the ship, but, in consequence of the arrest, they could not get possession. They accordingly paid the master's claim, and obtained the release of the ship. They now seek to recover this sum from the defendants, and the question is, whether the defendants, who are the owners of sixteen sixty-fourth shares in the ship, are liable? It seems to me that the moment that state of facts is established—a lawful seizure of the ship as between the owners and the master, and payment by the mortgagees to obtain its release—it is clear that the mortgagees have a claim to be repaid that sum.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

* See now the Merchant Shipping Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 46), s. 1.

In Edmunds v. Wallingford Lindley, L.J., in delivering the judgment of this court, said:—"In order to bring the present case within the general principle alluded to above, it is necessary that the goods seized shall have been lawfully seized; and it was contended before us that the sons' goods were in this case wrongfully seized, and that the defendant, therefore, was not bound to indemnify them. But when it is said that the goods must be lawfully seized all that is meant is that, as between the owner of the goods and the person seizing them, the latter shall have been entitled to take them. It is plain that the principle has no application, except where the owner of the goods is in a position to say to the debtor that the seizure ought not to have taken place; it is because as between them the wrong goods have been seized that any question arises." There we find the principle clearly stated. The result is that where there is a seizure rightful in law the person, who pays money to extricate property of his own from that seizure, and who in extricating that property pays money on behalf of another person, can recover the money so paid from that other person. That principle applies to and covers this case, and the plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to recover.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is a question of some general importance. The action is a common law action for money paid on behalf of the defendants upon an implied promise by the defendants to repay it. Before the Judicature Act I do not think that this action could have been tried in the Admiralty Court, and now it is tried by the judge of the Admiralty Division as a common law action. It is only necessary to refer to the admiralty law for the purpose of ascertaining the master's rights. The master was employed by the owners of the ship, both by the part owner who had mortgaged his shares and by the other owners. They were not merely co-owners of the ship, but they had agreed to employ the ship as a money-earning machine, and were, therefore, partners in the adventure in respect of which they had employed the master. The master was not employed by the mortgagees. The master made certain disbursements for the benefit of the ship while so employed. The rights of the master according to admiralty law were that if he was not paid he could institute proceedings in the Admiralty Division and have the ship arrested, and the effect of the arrest would be that the ship would be held by the court as security for the master's claim if he made it out. That would be a good seizure against all the world, and, therefore, good as against the mortgagees, though they did not owe the master anything.

The mortgagees, however, by their mortgage, had a right to immediate joint-possession of the ship with those owners who had not mortgaged their shares. The admiralty law stepped in, and prevented them from exercising that right. They could not obtain joint-possession of the ship without an order of the Admiralty Court, and the court would not take off its hands unless the claim of the master was paid, or bail put in. If the claim were paid or bail put in, the ship would be released, and the mortgagees and co-owners would be entitled to take joint-possession, and if either took possession it would be a possession taken for all. The mortgagees desired to have possession of the ship, and they had good business reasons for such desire. They had rights which the law prevented them from exercising, and this occurred solely through the default of the defendants in not paying the master. Under these circumstances, in order to get immediate possession, they paid the amount, and that brings the case at common law within the rule laid down in Edmunds v. Wallingford, that if, by reason of the default of one person, another person's goods are lawfully seized for that person's debt, and the latter pays the debt, the law implies a promise by the one whose debt is paid to reimburse the person paying it. The judgment, therefore, was right, and must be affirmed.

FRY, L.J.—I agree. It seems to me that this case is peculiar to this extent, that the pressure on the plaintiffs arose from the right of the Admiralty Court to seize the entire ship and detain it until the master's claim was paid. It was said that there was no compulsion on the mortgagees, as their shares in the ship could not be made liable to satisfy the master's claim. That may be true, but, inasmuch as the whole property was seized under the admiralty law, and might have been detained until the questions in the action had been settled, an implication arises in law of an implied promise on the part of the defendants to repay the plaintiffs the sum paid by the latter to protect their property.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS to KING. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Site of parsonage house—Power to resell site purchased—Church Building Acts (58 Geo. 3, c. 45, s. 51; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107, s. 9).

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have power under the Church Building Acts to sell lands which have been purchased by them for the site of a parsonage house, and which have subsequently become unsuitable for that purpose.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

This was a question as to whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners can resell land purchased by them for a site for a parsonage house.

By a deed of the 27th of February, 1884, made under the Church Buildings Acts, and particularly under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 55, a piece of land situate in the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, was, together with other hereditaments since sold, conveyed by way of sale by E. W. Javens to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, for the purposes of the said Acts and to be devoted to ecclesiastical purposes for ever as and for the site of a parsonage, or house of residence with garden and glebe thereto, for the incumbent for the time being of the said parish of St. James according to the meaning of the said Acts.

No parsonage house was ever built on the site so purchased, the land having become unsuitable for the purpose.

The commissioners took steps to sell the land, and for this purpose on the 22nd of July, 1889, entered into a contract with Edwin King to sell the same to him.

(a.) Reported by W. H. QUARRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

King raised the objection that the commissioners had no power to sell, particularly under 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, s. 51, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107, s. 9.

Blakesley (F. H. Jeune, Q.C., with him), for the commissioners.—The commissioners have power to resell the land purchased by them for the site of a parsonage. It is admitted they have power to resell land acquired for the site of a church. The power to acquire land for church sites is given by 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, ss. 35, 36, and the power to resell lands not used for the purposes of the Acts is contained in section 51. There is a distinction between lands purchased and lands acquired by gift, but that does not arise in the present case, for the land was purchased by the commissioners. All the powers created by 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, are incorporated by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107, s. 9, and are extended by that enactment so as to apply to lands taken by purchase for the site of a parsonage house.

A. R. Rudall, for King.—This is a case of purchase, not of gift, so section 33 of 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, does not apply. The recital at the beginning of section 51 restricts the power of resale to lands acquired for sites of churches or chapels, and the commissioners only obtain power by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107, s. 9, to acquire land for sites for houses by sale or exchange. The power, created by section 51 of the first Act is not incorporated, and section 9 of the second Act gives no special power to resell. No further incorporation of 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, with 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107 is caused by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 25. King is a willing purchaser.

Blakesley replied.

CHITTY, J.—The question is whether, upon the true construction of the Church Building Acts, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have power to sell a piece of land which they acquired by purchase for the site of a parsonage, but which site they now find is not required for the purpose for which they bought it. Their power to acquire arose under section 9 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107. By that section it is enacted that all powers and authorities given by 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, "for enabling the bodies politic and persons therein mentioned to convey, and the commissioners to take, land for the sites of churches and chapels, shall extend to the transfer, by sale or exchange only, of land for a site for a house of residence of any incumbent provided the same do not exceed five acres." That in terms, therefore, relates only, so far as the commissioners are concerned, to their taking the land, and the only mode in which they can take the land under this section is by sale or exchange. In terms, in 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107 there is no power of sale conferred on the commissioners, and the question is whether the land thus acquired under section 9 does not become, by virtue of the joint operation of the two statutes taken together, subject to section 51 of 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, which does empower the commissioners to sell the land not wanted. Now the Act of Geo. 3 contains, in section 33, provisions under which the commissioners may take, by way of gift, the sites for churches, and also sites for the residences of the spiritual persons serving the churches. That Act contains also a power for the commissioners to buy sites for churches, but no power for them to buy sites for parsonages. Section 51 no doubt only extended at the time when this statute became law to the sites purchased for churches, for the commissioners had then no power to buy land for sites for houses. The recital in section 51 shows the motive of the enactment which follows, but that enactment is in wider terms than the recital, and is not, according to the rule, to be cut down by the recital; and the words are: "It shall be lawful for the commissioners to grant and convey by way of absolute sale for a consideration in money," not the lands purchased for the site of a church, but "such lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any such part or parts thereof as shall not be wanted for the purposes of this Act." So that it is in form a general enactment enabling the commissioners to sell lands not wanted for the purpose of that Act.

I think it is reasonably clear that the land acquired under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 107, s. 9, which is not wanted for the purposes for which that land was originally acquired falls within the power of sale created by 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, s. 51. It cannot be supposed that the Legislature could have left matters in such an extraordinary position, I mean that if the commissioners buy a site for a church which is not wanted, they can sell it, but if they buy a site for a parsonage house which is not wanted, they must keep it in their hands for ever. No one can suggest a reason why the law should have intentionally been so framed. This is the general reason why I give this interpretation to the statute, and there is also a particular reason which is of weight, that is the peculiar form of section 9. That is an extension of some of the powers—namely, the powers of purchase—and it seems to bring property bought by means of that extended original power into the same category as other lands of a similar class, which have been bought under the original power, so I hold that the commissioners can make a good title.

I will say nothing on 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 25, on account of the complicated condition of that enactment, except that it seems to contain nothing contrary to my judgment.

ZUCCATO v. YOUNG. (a.)

Practice—Setting aside writ for irregularity—Misdescription of defendant—Entry of conditional appearance—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 12, r. 30.

The writ in an action described the defendant as "J. L. Young, carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co., at No. 60, Ludgate-hill." The defendant, who was not in fact carrying on the business, entered an appearance as "J. L. Young, sued as J. L. Young, carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co., at No. 60, Ludgate-hill, but who denies that he is carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co. at No. 60, Ludgate-hill aforesaid or elsewhere."

Held, on motion by the defendant to set aside the writ and subsequent proceedings on the ground of irregularity, that there was no irregularity in the writ, and that the mistake had been set right by the form in which an appearance had been entered by the defendant; and the motion was refused.

Motion.

The action was brought by Messrs. Zuccato & Wolff, who were the owners of certain letters patent, to restrain an alleged infringement of their patent. The writ, which was issued on the 6th of February, 1890, described the defendant as "J. L. Young, carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co." in the title, which description was repeated in the body of the writ, with the addition of the words "at No. 60, Ludgate-hill, in the City of London," and claimed an injunction, damages, and an account. The writ was served on the defendant at No. 60, Ludgate-hill on the 10th of February, together with a notice of motion for an injunction.

On the 12th of February a letter was received from the defendant's solicitor stating that he had been instructed by the defendant, and would enter an appearance in due course, and on the 15th of February the defendant's solicitor gave notice to the plaintiffs and their solicitors that he had that day entered an appearance "for the defendant, J. L. Young, sued as J. L. Young, carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co., of No. 60, Ludgate-hill, in the City of London, but who denies that he is carying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co. at No. 60, Ludgate-hill aforesaid or elsewhere."

This was a motion by the defendant, J. L. Young, notice of which was given on the 18th of February, asking "that the writ of summons in this action, and all subsequent proceedings therein, and the service of such writ upon the defendant, may be set aside, on the ground that the said writ of summons describes, and was issued against, the said defendant as carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co. at No. 60, Ludgate-hill, in the City of London, whereas the defendant, Jonathan Lewis Young, does not carry on business, and never has carried on business, and has no interest in the business carried on as the Edison Mineograph Co. at No. 60, Ludgate-hill aforesaid or elsewhere, and on the ground that No. 60, Ludgate-hill aforesaid is not the usual or proper address of the said defendant."

It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiffs, having reason to suppose that articles which they regarded as an infringement of their patent were being sold at the office of the Edison Mineograph Co. at No. 60, Ludgate-hill, sent an agent and purchased one, which was sold to him by the defendant, who, the agent deposed, had been pointed out to him as the manager of the business; and the plaintiffs, when they issued their writ, believed that the business of the Edison Mineograph Co. was, in fact, carried on by the defendant alone. The defendant, however, in an affidavit, stated to the effect that the business belonged to his brother, and that he himself had no interest in it, though he had lent money to his brother for the purposes of the business.

Bramwell Davis, for the motion.—The defendant is entitled to have the writ and subsequent proceedings in the action set aside on the ground of irregularity: Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 12, r. 30.

He also referred to rules 15 and 16 of order 12; The W. A. Scholten, 36 W. R. 559, 13 P. D. 8.

Willis Bund, for the plaintiffs.—The proceedings ought not to be set aside, as, if there was any irregularity in the writ, it has been set right by the notice of appearance of the defendant.

He referred to ord. 70, rr. 1, 2; The Helenslea, 30 W. R. 613, 7 P. D. 57.

North, J.—I do not think there is any irregularity in the writ. The effect of the evidence is that the defendant is not carrying on business as the Edison Mineograph Co., but it is not denied that he did what he is alleged to have done. It is the same thing as if a defendant named John had been sued as James, in which case the mistake could be easily corrected in all subsequent proceedings, as the mistake has been corrected in the present case. In this case matters have already been set right by the form in which the appearance has been entered by the defendant. If the amended title is used in the subsequent proceedings, they will be perfectly regular, and the defendant will be in no way prejudiced. I must refuse the motion, the costs to be costs in the action.

Motion refused.

In re National Permanent Mutual Benefit Building Society. (a.)

Building society—Trust funds—Trustees—Directors—Trust Investment Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 32).

The funds of a building society which are invested in the name of the society, or in the names of trustees who have no power of investment, but are trustees for the society acting under the direction of the board of directors, are not within the Trust Investment Act, 1889.

Petition.

This was a petition by the directors and trustees of the National Permanent Mutual Benefit Building Society, for the purpose of determining whether the funds of the society invested in the names of trustees under the direction of the board of directors, were trust funds within the Trust Investment Act, 1889.

The National Permanent Mutual Benefit Building Society was established in 1849, and registered under the Building Societies Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32). The certified rule of the society as to investments provided, that all money not employed in advancing the shares of members should "be laid out in such investments, or advanced upon such legal or equitable securities as the law permits in the names of the trustees, but under the direction of the board."

In 1880, the society was incorporated under the Building Societies Act, 1874, which repeals the Act of 1836, and enacts, by section 25, that "any society under this Act may, from time to time as the rules permit, invest any portion of the funds of the society, not immediately required for its purposes, upon real or leasehold securities, or in the public funds, or in or upon any Parliamentary stocks or securities, or in or upon any stock or securities, payment of the interest on which is guaranteed by authority of Parliament, or in the case of terminating societies, with other societies under this Act; and for the purpose of investments in the public funds, or upon security of copyhold or customary estate, the society, or the board of directors or committee of management thereof, may from time to time appoint and remove trustees;" and also, by section 27 (as amended by section 3 of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 63), enacts that "all rights of action and other rights, and all estates and interests in real and personal estate whatsoever, belonging to or held in trust for any society certified under the said repealed Act, shall, on the incorporation of the society under this Act, vest in the society without any conveyance or assignment whatsoever, save and except in the case of stocks and securities in the public funds of Great Britain and Ireland, and estates in copyhold or customary hereditaments, the title to which cannot be transferred without admittance."

The society possessed funds invested in the name of the corporation, and also sums invested in Consols in the names of trustees; and the petition was presented to obtain a decision of the question whether the Consols could be sold out, and the proceeds invested in some of the securities mentioned in section 3 of the Trust Investment Act, 1889.

The Trust Investment Act, 1889, s. 3, enacts that: "It shall be lawful for a trustee, unless expressly forbidden by the instrument (if any) creating the trust, to invest any trust funds in his hands in the manner following, that is to say, . . . and also from time to time to vary any such investment," and that section enumerates fifteen classes of securities. Section 5 enacts, "Every power conferred by this Act shall be exercised according to the discretion of the trustee, but subject to any consent required by the instrument (if any) creating the trust, with respect to the investment of the trust funds." And by section 6 the Act is made to apply to trusts created before, as well as to trusts created after, the passing of the Act.

Swinfen Eady, for the petition.—The funds of the building society which are not in use in advancing members, and are invested in the name of trustees, are trust funds within the Trust Investment Act, 1889. The trustees in whose names the Consols stand, and who are not "expressly forbidden by the instrument creating the trust," come within section 3 of that Act. Then the directors of the building society are trustees within the meaning of that Act. They have the control of the funds of the building society not employed in advancing members, which are trust funds: Hardy v. Metropolitan Land and Finance Co., 20 W. R. 425, L. R. 7 Ch. 427.

NORTH, J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—The question is whether the Consols belonging to the building society standing in the names of trustees can be sold by them and invested in other securities within the Trust Investment Act, 1889. In my opinion they cannot. In the first place I think that the powers of investment contained in the Act are larger powers given to trustees who have already power to invest, and merely apply to trustees who hold funds for the purpose of investment. In respect of building societies under the Building Societies Acts this general enactment relating to trustees, which does not refer to building societies, cannot be intended to alter the powers of such societies, which are regulated by the 25th section of the Building Societies Act, 1874. In order to give to such societies larger powers than are contained in that section, I think there should be in the Trust Investment Act, 1889, either an express direction, or something that shows by necessary implication an intention so to enlarge the powers. But I do not think that is the only answer. Even supposing the 25th section of the Building Societies Act would be affected by a general investment Act, does the Trust Investment Act, 1889, apply to such a case? In my opinion it does not. I do not think the funds of a building society are trust funds. The property of a building society belongs to the society or its members, and its members do not hold the property on any trust. The property of such a society is quite different from that of a charitable institution. In my opinion the funds of the society are not trust funds at all in the sense used in the Trust Investment Act, 1889. And, further, it is to be noticed that it is not the object of a building society to invest.

Then it is suggested that the trustees in whose names the Consols stand are trustees for investment, so as to bring the funds standing in their names under the operation of the Trust Investment Act, 1889. It will be recollected that the rule of the society relating to investments provided that funds should be invested in the names of trustees, but only under the direction of the board of directors. This is a rule which has not been altered, and is still subsisting so far as these investments are concerned. I do not think, therefore, these trustees are trustees holding funds in their hands which they can invest, or that this Act applies to trustees who do not hold funds in their hands upon trust to invest. In my opinion the Act extends the powers in respect of the kind of securities upon which trustees who already have limited power to invest may invest, but it does not give power to invest to trustees who have not power to invest independently of the Act. It seems to me that the trustees of the society are not trustees under the Act. If there were a person absolutely entitled to a fund in the hands of a bare trustee for him, and such person did not wish to take the funds into his own hands, and did not wish to have the investment of the fund changed, it could not be contended that the bare trustee could have power given him by this Act of varying such investment.

Then it is said that the directors of the society are trustees having trust funds in their hands within the meaning of the Act. In my opinion they are not. In point of fact they have not any trust funds in their names, and are not trustees for investment, but are the agents of the society for the purpose of carrying on its business. It is said that they are in a fiduciary position; and no doubt if property of the society come to their hands, is misappropriated, they will be liable for it. But so is any other agent. It seems to me, therefore, that the directors are not trustees having trust funds in their hands to invest within the meaning of the Act.

I come to the conclusion that the Act does not apply to a building society whose funds are invested in their own name, or in the name of trustees who have no power of investing. That view is confirmed by the 5th section of the Trust Investment Act, which provides "That every power conferred by this Act shall be exercised according to the discretion of the trustee, but subject to any consent required by the instrument, if any, creating the trust." From that it appears that the Act is intended to apply to trustees who have a discretion as to investment independently of the Act.

Motion.

This was a motion to set aside an award under the following circumstances. By deed dated the 1st of February, 1886, R. Oliver and T. B. Scott became partners for fourteen years from the 28th of January, 1884. By this deed it was provided that on the death of either partner the surviving partner should be entitled to purchase the business, by agreement between him and the executors of the late partner, on a valuation to be ascertained by arbitration. R. Oliver died the 4th of June, 1888, having appointed A. Oliver and J. B. Colton his executors. By agreement dated the 24th of July, 1888, and made between A. Oliver and J. B. Colton of the one part and T. B. Scott of the other part, T. B. Oakshott and C. S. Beecroft were appointed arbitrators, to ascertain the value of the capital and effects and goodwill of the partnership as provided by the partnership deed, and it was agreed that the submission to arbitration and any award thereunder might at the instance of either party be made a rule or order of any division of the High Court of Justice.

On the 11th of August, 1888, the arbitrators made and published their award, and on the 24th of October, 1889, it was ordered that the agreement of the 24th of

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July, 1888, and the award thereunder be made an order of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice.

On the 2nd of November, 1889, A. Oliver and J. B. Colton as executors of R. Oliver served T. B. Scott with a notice of motion asking that, notwithstanding that the time limited had expired, they might be at liberty to move to set aside the award of the 11th of August, 1888, on the ground of fraud on the part of T. B. Scott.

Warmington, Q.C., and Astbury, for the motion.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Roby, for T. B. Scott, raised the preliminary objection that the court had no jurisdiction to extend the time.

Warmington, Q.C.—Ord. 64, r. 7, empowers the court to enlarge or abridge the time appointed by the rules for doing any act. Rule 14 of the same order directs that an application to set aside an award may be made at any time before the last day of the sittings next after such award has been made and published to the parties. By 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, s. 2, it is provided that an application to set aside an award must be made in the "term" next after the award has been published; but by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 26, terms were abolished except as a measure for determining the time within which anything had to be done until "provision is otherwise made by lawful authority." The Judicature Act, 1875, section 17, empowered the judges to make rules relating to the "practice and procedure" of the court. This is a matter relating to the practice and procedure of the court, and the rules are made by lawful authority. This motion is on the ground of fraud: Rogers v. Hadley, 11 W. R. 1074.

He referred to Russell on Awards, 6th ed., p. 664 et. seq., and the cases there cited.

Henn Collins, Q.C.—This is not an arbitration in an action or under the Common Law Procedure Act, but under a statute which limits a certain time to apply to set aside the award; and unless that statute has been repealed by another statute, the court cannot hear an application after the expiration of that time. The Judicature Acts and Rules have substituted "sittings" for "terms"; but otherwise the matter stands as it was before the Judicature Acts and Rules, whose operation was to modify the practice and procedure of the courts, not to repeal a specific enactment like that in question. The inherent power in the courts of enlarging time on application after the time limited has never been extended to a case like the present: In re North British Railway Co. and Trowsdale, L. R. 1 C. P. 401, 14 W. R. C. L. Dig. 3; Moore v. Darley, 1 C. B. 445; In re Corporation of Huddersfield and Jacomb, 22 W. R. 255, L. R. 17 Eq. 476; Auriol v. Smith, T. & R., p. 126; Dawson v. Sadler, 1 Sim. & & S. 537; Heming v. Swinnerton, 2 Ph. 79.

Kekewich, J.—I have no doubt about this point. I shall certainly not hold that this Act of Parliament limiting the time could be altered otherwise than by the authority which made the enactment—namely, the Legislature itself. The Act of Will. 3 says that any motion to set aside an award must be made in the term next after the award has been made and published to the parties, and that applies to this award which was made under that Act. Unless I can find that that has been altered by Act of Parliament, I should have no hesitation in saying on this part of the case that the court has no jurisdiction to set aside the award, as the term next after the publication of the award has expired. But since that Act was passed terms have ceased to be operative for many purposes, indeed, they are now observed only for certain purposes outside the courts of justice. They have been abolished, being now fused in the "sittings." We in the Court of Chancery were familiar with both. We sometimes had sittings before term and sometimes sittings after term, and the year was made up quite as much of sittings out of term as of sittings in term. They were known as "sittings," but that, of course, did not alter the Act. When the Judicature Act came in, this anomaly of certain business being done in term time, the term having ceased to have the importance which it had before, was noticed and provided for, and by the 26th section of the Judicature Act, 1873, terms were abolished, but they were to continue to be regarded as a measure of time "unless and until provision is otherwise made by any lawful authority." Now before proceeding to discuss what authority was necessary, I wish to refer to the case of In re Governors of the College of Christ, Brecknock v. Martin, 25 W. R. 637, 3 Q. B. D. 16. There the application was made out of time according to the provisions of the Act of Will. 3, no alteration having been made by any lawful authority, and the Court of Appeal held that, there having been no provision made by lawful authority, they were bound by the Act of Will. 3, and that, hard as it might be, nothing could be done. Cockburn, C.J., said:—"This may lead to considerable conflict between the two modes of reckoning 'terms' and 'sittings,' and I hope something may be done to prevent hardship to suitors." The consequence, then, was that subsequently the rules were made which are called in question here—Ord. 64, rr. 7 and 14—and they make certainly an entirely different provision. I think rule 14 ought to be read first. "Application to set aside an award may be made at any time before the last day of the sittings next after such an award has been made and published to the parties." That was really only putting into the form of a rule with the one word "sittings" substituted for "term" what was in the Act of Parliament. That alteration of "term" into "sittings" is admittedly within the powers of the judges who have to make the rules.

Then rule 7 gives the court or a judge power "to enlarge or abridge the time appointed by these rules, or fixed by an order enlarging time for doing any act or taking any proceeding upon such terms (if any) as the justice of the case may require." Really the question is whether that was within the power of the Rule Committee who made the rules. For that purpose I must turn to section 17 of the Judicature Act, 1875, which provides that any rules may be made "relating to the practice and procedure of the court." Is this a matter of practice and procedure? It seems to me that the time within which an application may be made is necessarily procedure. Indeed, a large majority of the applications which are made to the court, and which are called procedure summonses or procedure applications, relate to the time within which a certain thing has to be done. Therefore that seems to me to be clearly procedure. Then it is said that, though the Rule Committee might alter the time in this sense, substituting "sittings" for "term," they cannot extend the sittings. I fail to comprehend that argument. That they might have shortened it seems to me perfectly clear. They might have said, "The sittings are very long, and the term is very short. The sittings are rather more than justice requires for setting aside an award, and, therefore, we will say only a certain portion of the sittings," and the rule might have said, "In the first three weeks of the sittings," or "In the first half of the sittings," or in any other way might have fixed the time being less than the whole of the sittings. And if they could make it less than the sittings, why not more, and why not in the next two or three sittings? I find it difficult to follow the argument that the Rule Committee can only substitute "sittings" for "term" when necessarily the sittings and term are not commensurate. I fail to see how one must be substituted for the other without any other alteration. We in the Chancery Division are in the habit of rising on the last day of the sittings, but the Queen's Bench judges are often detained on circuit, and do work some days after the sittings. It would have been very easy to say, "So long as the circuits continue," or to make some other arrangement of that kind. Instead of that they have said that the sittings shall be substituted for the term, with a proviso, that if the court before which the matter comes sees fit to enlarge that time, then that shall be done on such terms as justice requires. I think that, given the power to alter the Act of Parliament at all, which is not, and cannot be, denied, there was power to alter it in the manner which has been done. Therefore, I am of opinion that it is now competent for me to consider whether the justice of the case requires that, on terms which are within my judicial discretion, the enlargement for which the applicant asks shall be granted.

The motion was subsequently heard and decided on its merits.

Motion for security for costs.

An action for penalties had been brought in the county court at Swansea by the Society of Apothecaries against a herbalist for practising as an apothecary without a licence, and not being duly qualified so to practise. The defence rested upon the construction of 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 8. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs for a £20 penalty, with costs but gave the defendant leave to appeal.

Houghton, for the plaintiffs, applied for security for costs, as the defendant was a poor man.

Stanbury Eardley, for the defendant.—The county court judge said that the question raised upon such an old statute was an important one, and gave unconditional leave to appeal.

Cave, J.—I think this is a case where no security ought to be required. The county court judge thought the point raised to be a difficult one to decide, and gave the defendant leave to appeal. The defendant has a right to appeal. If no leave to appeal had been given the defendant, having a verdict against him, would still have been entitled to show some ground why the decision against him might reasonably be appealed from, and doubtless might have been required to show that he had some means of securing to the plaintiffs their costs should he fail in that appeal. For my own part I think this is a case in which we might have seen grounds for dispensing with such security had any been required. But, as it is, we should, by requiring him to give security now, be depriving him of a right to an appeal which the judge below thought reasonable. I think that where leave to appeal has been so unconditionally given by the court below we should not be right in restricting the exercise of that right.

Inland revenue—Inhabited house duty—Exemption—Library—House used as—Attendant sleeping on premises—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878 (41 Vict. c. 15), s. 13, sub-section 2.

A house was occupied by the London Library and used as a library and reading rooms for the use of members, who paid subscriptions thereto, but who derived no pecuniary profit therefrom. The use of a sitting room and bed room was given to an attendant, in addition to his wages, and the attendant and his wife dwelt in these rooms both by day and at night for the protection of the premises. No other person dwelt in the premises.

Held, that the library is liable to inhabited house duty, as it is not exempt therefrom by the provisions of sub-section 2 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878.

Case stated by Commissioners of Income Tax.

Appeal on behalf of the Committee of the London Library against an assessment to inhabited house duty made upon their premises situate and being No. 14, St. James'-square, in the parish of St. James, in the city of Westminster, under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, for the year 1887-8, in the sum of £600 at 9d. in the £.

The London Library occupy the whole house, which is used as a library and reading rooms, and is open to members between the hours of 10 a.m. and 6.30 p.m.

The use of a sitting room and bed room therein is given, in addition to his wages, to an attendant in the service of the library, and this man and his wife dwell in those rooms both by day and at night for the protection of the premises. No other person dwells on the premises.

The London Library is a society existing for the purpose of providing a public library from which books may be had by the subscribers at their own homes.

The government of the library is vested in a committee, and members of the library, when elected by the committee, pay an annual or life subscription, and the income of the London Library is wholly derived from these subscriptions; the income so derived is expended in the purchase and binding of books, and generally in the maintenance of the library.

The library is not conducted with a view to making a profit, one of its regulations providing that "no dividend, gift, division, or bonus in money shall be made unto or between any of the members."

It was contended, on behalf of the library, before the commissioners that the premises were occupied for the purpose of "business," and that the attendant who dwelt there came within the category of a "servant" or "other person," as contemplated by sub-section 2 of section 13, of 41 Vict. c. 15; that the words "trade," or "business" in the clause referred to should be taken by themselves, that they were not qualified by the succeeding words, "by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit," and that the latter words referred to "profession" or "calling" only, being severed from the words "trade" or "business" both by the grammar and punctuation.

The surveyor of taxes contended that this construction of the clause was not admissible, and, further, that the Committee of the London Library did not carry on a "trade" or "business" within the meaning of the sub-section.

The commissioners were of opinion that the sub-section should be read together as a whole; that the Committee of the London Library did not occupy the house solely for the purposes of any "trade" or "business," or of any "profession" or "calling" by which the occupier sought a livelihood or profit; that they were correctly charged to inhabited house duty; and they confirmed the assessment.

The Committee of the London Library appealed.

Douglas Walker, for the appellants.—These premises are occupied by the London Library for the purpose of a "business" within the meaning of sub-section 2 of section 13 of the Act. They are therefore exempt: The Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China, v. Wilson, 26 W. R. 265, 3 Ex. D. 108. The house is not an inhabited dwelling-house within the meaning of the statute: Riley v. Read, 27 W. R. 414, 4 Ex. D. 100.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Dicey, for the respondent were not heard.

Pollock, B.—It is admitted that this assessment would be a good assessment unless it be brought within a certain exemption in the Taxing Act.

The first and most material exemption to which our attention is called is that which is contained in the Act of 1878 (41 Vict. c. 15), s. 13, sub-section 2. The words are these: "Every house or tenement which is occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business or any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit," shall be exempted from the duties.

If we take the earlier Act of Parliament—namely, 57 Geo. 3, c. 25, s. 1—which uses the words, "houses used solely for the purposes of trade," then 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, which extended the exemption to houses used as offices or counting-houses for the purposes of exercising or carrying on any profession, vocation, business, or calling whereby the person occupying it seeks a livelihood or profit, I think it is quite clear that the broad intention of the Legislature is to make a distinction between a house which is inhabited for the purposes of dwelling, and a house which is occupied for the purpose of carrying on a business from the profit of which any person derives a benefit.

In the present case it seems to me that the London Library is not an institution, or a house in which an institution has its habitation, that it is not a house which is inhabited for the purposes of business or profession or calling whence any profits arise. It is an institution whereby a number of persons, all its members, derive an individual and mutual benefit, but in no way do they, or can they, make a profit by it, any more than persons make a profit by a clubhouse.

Many of our clubs have libraries, and many of the persons who meet there meet for the purposes of reading these books and bringing to their homes such books as they may not have. The same thing goes on in the London Library, and in no sense has any business for profit entered into the scheme. Therefore I think the London Library is not within that exemption.

A second point was taken, that the house is not an inhabited dwelling-house, and it is quite true that, within the decison of the court in Riley v. Read, there was no occupation of the club, no inhabitancy by the members. In the London Library there is a sitting room and a bed room which are given, in addition to the wages of the attendant, to that attendant, who is in the service of the library, and this man and his wife dwell in these rooms both day and night for the protection of the premises, and no other person dwells in the premises. It is obvious that there must be such an attendant that the members of the library should obtain the proper use of it, and the fair inference is that this man does inhabit that house and dwell in it for the benefit of the members. We were referred to the exemption in one of the earlier Acts, 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B., case 5, but in that case the person, and the only person, who resides in the house resides for the purpose only of taking care thereof. Therefore it is obviously intended to meet the case of what is called an empty house, a house awaiting a tenant, or awaiting its owner, a house in charge of a servant, who resides there for the purpose only of taking care of the house. That is not intended to meet the case which constantly occurs, of a servant of the owner being left in the house, not merely for the purpose of taking care of it, but for the purpose also of being ready to wait upon the owner when he comes to dwell there. In such a case his occupancy and inhabitancy is just as sufficient for the purpose of the inhabited house duty as if the master himself were there.

It seems to me, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

GRESHAM LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY v. STYLES (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Life assurance company—Sale of annuities for lump sum—Liability of company to income tax in respect of such annuities—Sums "paid out of profits or gains"—Schedule D, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34.—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 102.

A life assurance company which, in addition to its ordinary business, carries on the business of selling annuities for a lump sum paid down, is not entitled to deduct the amount paid in respect of such annuities from their gross income for income tax purposes, but such annuities are liable to income tax in the hands of the company, and the company are the proper persons to pay the tax in respect thereof, as such annuities are sums "payable out of profits and gains" within the meaning of section 102 of the Income Tax Act, 1842.

Case stated by the Commissioners for General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London.

The Gresham Life Assurance Society appealed to the Income Tax Commissioners for the City of London against an assessment of £276,278 under schedule D to the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 for the year ending the 5th of April, 1886.

The Gresham life assurance society carries on the ordinary business of a life assurance society.

The consideration for the granting of an insurance of a lump sum payable on death is either the payment periodically of sums of money or premiums, or the payment of a lump sum at the time of the insurance.

The consideration for the granting of an immediate annuity is the payment of a lump sum or premium paid down, and the consideration for a deferred or contingent annuity is the payment of periodical premiums or of a lump sum paid down.

The annuity obligations of the society are in many instances dischargeable abroad. The returns of the society are based (inter alia) upon actuarial calculations of prospective liabilities under existing contracts.

The valuation balance-sheet showed a surplus profit for three years of £93,056 16s. 8d., and the society had, during the triennium, paid income tax on £120,722, chiefly by the tax being deducted at its source on payment to them of interest and dividends. In arriving at the amount of profits and gains for three years—namely, the sum £93,056 16s. 8d.—the society had taken into account (among other items of expenditure) the following items:—

The sums paid in discharge of its annuity contracts, amounting to £253,252 5s. 10d., and the sum which had been paid for income tax, amounting to £3,247. These two sums added to the profit of £93,056 16s. 8d. amount together to the sum of £349,556 2s. 6d.

From this amount the surveyor of taxes admitted by way of deduction the sum on which income tax had already been paid—namely, £120,722—and he claimed that the appellants—the society—were chargeable for the three years with the difference—namely, £228,834 2s. 6d.

One year's proportion, or one-third part of this sum, amounts to £76,278 0s. 10d., for which amount the society was assessed for the year ending the 5th of April, 1886.

Before the commissioners, the surveyor of taxes contended that the exception of the annuities and the income tax paid by the society was by way of deduction from the gross income of the society in arriving at the amount on which income tax should be charged, and that that was not allowable under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 100, 159, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 40, and, further, that the society was entitled to deduct, and should deduct, the amount of the duty on payment of each annuity under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 102, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 40.

For the society it was contended that they had treated, and were entitled to treat, the payment of annuities in the same manner as the payment of sums payable on the death of the assured, and that the same cannot be treated as a deduction from, or be brought into account so as to increase profits, or be treated as paid out of profits or gains, either within the meaning of schedule D, 4th rule, 1st case, section 100 and section 102 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, or as otherwise brought into charge by such Act, or as sums on which income tax is payable under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, and they also contended that the amount of the gains and profits for the triennium being £93,056 16s. 8d., and they having paid tax on £120,722, they were not liable for any further assessment.

The commissioners confirmed the assessment of £76,278.

The Gresham Life Assurance Society appealed.

The questions for the opinion of the court were—(1) Whether the society is liable to be assessed in respect of the amount paid by them for annuities, or any part thereof? (2) whether the society is in any event liable to be assessed for any sum in excess of the amount on which tax has already been paid by way of deduction at its source?

Sir Horace Davey Q.C. (Lumley Smith, Q.C., and W. Fooks with him), for the appellants.—It is said that we are not to deduct these annuities from the gross income of the society, but we submit that the sums paid in respect of these annuities are payments of debts incurred by the society out of the gross income of the society. These annuities are not paid out of profits or gains brought into charge, and are therefore exempt from taxation in the hands of the society. When an annuity is sold a lump sum is paid down for the annuity, and this lump sum would most likely be invested, and the tax would be deducted from the interest arising from such investment, so that the society would already have paid the tax on the interest arising from such investments. That being so, they ought not to be asked to pay the tax on the annuities they pay in respect of those lump sums. These annuities cannot be treated as paid out of profits or gains, nor are they paid out of profits or gains brought into charge by virtue of the Act within the meaning of section 102 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. The society is entitled to deduct them from the gross income.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Dicey, for the respondent, were not called upon.

POLLOCK, B.—It seems to me we cannot decide in favour of the appellants without disturbing, not only the mere enactment in language, but the spirit of the Income Tax Acts, which has been acted upon for a long series of years. The question raised here is not whether this is a certain profit or gain belonging to the assurance company, who are the appellants, but the question is whether they who have to pay, pursuant to their contracts and mode of business, certain annuities, are the proper persons to be taxed in respect of those annuities, or whether the persons who are the recipients of those annuities ought and must be taxed.

The appellants are treated as any other trading company, and the process of ascertaining what are the taxable items in the receipts of a trading company is by showing what all their receipts are, and then, on the other side of the account, giving them credit for sums which must be taken off, being sums paid in the course of the trade without which it may be said the net profits never would have been earned. In the present case the important fact is this—the company, in the course of their trade and business, have two different classes of business, the one life assurance, the other the sale of annuities. In the case of life assurance no question can arise, because, on a life lapsing by the death of a customer, a lump sum is paid to his personal representatives, and therefore there is no question of annuity or annual payment at all. In the case of an annuity the reverse operation takes place, because the annuitant pays a lump sum to the society, and the society, in return for that, pay an annual sum or annuity to him during his life, and it is in respect of its being an annual sum that it comes within the language of the Act.

Now when we turn to the statute itself it is obvious that the intention of the Legislature is to give to the revenue the benefit of taxing upon the first possible occasion of taxation any moneys which are taxable. In the case of the Bank of England the matter is clearly provided for, and the provisions are compulsory. Those provisions are contained in section 89 and following sections of the Act, and it is expressly declared that, in respect of all dividends, the Company of the Bank of England must, in the first instance, set apart and retain for income tax such sums as are proper in respect of all dividends paid by them.

Now there are other cases where the payment is not in the nature of a payment made by the Bank of England or a public company, but where it is a payment made in respect of some private arrangement, and that was dealt with in section 40, which has been cited to us, in which the matter is left optional to deduct the income tax from any annuity or interest on money, which they have contracted to pay, which is spoken of in the section as a "personal debt or obligation by virtue of any contract." The deduction here is optional, but if it is made then it is provided that the person to whom the annuity is paid shall have the benefit of the payment as in the other case.

Now the present case is different from either of these cases, and the question is whether it comes within section 102 of the Act. It is said that this is not payable out of profits or gains. I think the true answer to that is that it is payable out of profits or gains, on the principle that, unless the lump sums received are chargeable with these annuities, those lump sums paid would be profits and gains. It is equally clear that, although they are not net profits or gains, they are as much gains as any sums brought into the account of a merchant, being a payment to him in respect either of goods sold, services rendered, or in respect of some personal contract.

Therefore, when you come to see what is the intention and the language of the Legislature, it seems to me clear that the intention is to do in this case what the Legislature have done with respect of the Bank of England, and other annuities in other cases, and to find at its source a taxable item and to tax it while in the hands of the assurance company, that those who are the annuitants may have the benefit if they should be called upon to account for the same sum.

It seems therefore on these grounds that the appellants must fail, and that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Hawkins, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not think it necessary to pronounce a separate judgment.

Appeal dismissed.

Ship—Collision at sea—Statutory Regulations, art. 18.

There is no power to absolve a vessel from the consequences of neglecting the Statutory Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, unless an absolute necessity is proved for disregarding them.

Where a vessel was proved to have been navigated recklessly, yet where another which collided with her had neglected to slacken speed in good time, in accordance with article 18,

Held, the latter to blame.

This was an appeal from a decree, dated the 3rd of August, 1888, of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Singapore. That court decided in favour of the respondents, the owners of The Arratoon Apcar, in an action brought by them against the steamship Hebe and freight, and also in an action brought by the appellants against the steamship Arratoon Apcar, and condemned The Hebe and her bail in the amount to be found due to the respondents in the first action, and in costs.

The facts appear in their lordships' judgment.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Kennedy, Q.C. (Aspinall with them), for the appellants.—The Hebe was alone or partly to blame for porting improperly. Article 22 of the regulations was infringed, also article 18 by not slackening in time: The Ceto, 14 App. Cas. 670; The Benares, 32 W. R. 268, 9 P. D. 17; The Beryl, 32 W. R. 648, 9 P. Sir W. Phillimore, and Hollams, for the respondents, argued that in the circumstances The Arratoon Apcar acted rightly, and non-compliance with article 18 was justified: The Jesmond, L. R. 4 P. Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord Macnaghten, Sir Barnes Peacock, and Sir Richard Couch), was delivered by Lord Macnaghten.—The collision which led to this litigation took place in the Straits of Malacca on the 22nd of May, 1888, about 3.35 a.m., between the steamship Hebe and the steamship Arratoon Apcar.

Both vessels were under steam alone. The wind was southerly and moderate. The weather was fine and the sky clear. The regulation lights of both vessels were in order and burning brightly.

Both vessels were considerably damaged by the collision.

Cross actions were brought in the Vice-Admiralty Court of the Straits Settlements. Each vessel accused the other of being the sole cause of the disaster. The actions were consolidated, and tried together. Judgment was given on the 3rd of August, 1888.

The learned judge found The Hebe alone to blame. He accepted the account given by the witnesses for The Arratoon Apcar, and came to the conclusion that The

(a.) Reported by J. M. Collyer, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hebe was navigated with reckless neglience, and that the persons in charge of her at the time of the collision were, one and all, ignorant and incompetent.

From the decree founded on this judgment the owners of The Hebe appealed.

At the hearing before their lordships the learned counsel for the appellants did not deny that The Hebe was to blame; but they contended that the evidence of the respondents' own witnesses proved that The Arratoon Apcar was also in fault.

The facts of the case as they may be gathered from the evidence on behalf of The Arratoon Apcar are in substance as follows:—The Arratoon Apcar, steering S. 60 degrees E. sighted the masthead light and the red and green lights of The Hebe when the two vessels were about five miles apart, and apparently as nearly as possible on opposite courses. The Arratoon Apcar was going about ten knots an hour at the time. She ported one point, and in about two minutes lost The Hebe's green light, and then she steadied on that course. Shortly afterwards the green light of The Hebe appeared again about two points on her port bow. The Arratoon Apcar then ported another point and again lost The Hebe's green light, and kept on that course until The Hebe, being about 2½ points on the port bow, suddenly shut out her red light and showed her green light for the third time. It is impossible to determine the distance between the two vessels at this moment; but their lordships think that the learned judge was probably right in supposing that it must have been a little more or a little less than half a mile. The officer in charge of The Arratoon Apcar at once saw his danger. He gave the order "hard-a-port," and went himself to the wheel house to make sure that the order was carried out. He saw his vessel beginning to come round before he left the wheel. Then he went to the telegraph and stopped the engines. The collision took place almost immediately afterwards, the starboard bow of The Hebe which was still going full speed striking the port bow of The Arratoon Apcar at something less than a right angle. The engines of The Arratoon Apcar were not reversed until after the collision.

On this state of facts it was contended by the learned counsel for the appellants that The Arratoon Apcar infringed the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea in three particulars. They argued (1) that The Arratoon Apcar ought to have slackened speed before the green light of The Hebe came into view the third time; (2) that the engines of The Arratoon Apcar ought to have been stopped and reversed at the time when the officer in charge gave the order "hard-a-port"; and (3) that at any rate the engines of The Arratoon Apcar ought to have been reversed as well as stopped before the collision.

The learned judge in the Vice-Admiralty Court, who does not seem to have had the assistance of nautical assessors, appears to have felt little or no difficulty upon any point of the case except upon the one question whether it was the duty of the officer in charge of The Arratoon Apcar to reverse as well as to stop. The excuse put forward at the trial for not reversing was that The Arratoon Apcar had a left-handed screw, and that its action would have "deadened" the effect of the port helm if the engines had been reversed. With some hesitation the learned judge accepted this excuse, and exonerated The Arratoon Apcar from all blame.

Their lordships are, however, compelled to take a different view. They are advised by their nautical assessors that before the green light of The Hebe appeared the third time there were sufficient indications to the officer in charge of The Arratoon Apcar (supposing him to have been a person of ordinary skill using reasonable care) to show that the two vessels were approaching so as to involve risk of collision. They are further advised that a prudent seamen in the position in which that officer was placed by the conduct of those on board The Hebe would have stopped, or at the least have slackened speed, until the course of the approaching vessel could be made out with something like certainty.

Under any circumstances their lordships would be slow to differ from their nautical assessors on a question of navigation. In the present case, thinking as they do that the risk of collision was not determined when The Arratoon Apcar ported the second time, they see no reason for not giving effect to the advice which they have received. They are therefore obliged to hold that The Arratoon Apcar was to blame for not slackening in good time before the third appearance of The Hebe's green light.

The error on the part of The Arratoon Apcar may seem venial compared with the misconduct of those on board The Hebe. But their lordships have no power to absolve a vessel which infringes the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea from the consequences prescribed by statute unless a plea of necessity is made out.

The view which their lordships have taken under skilled advice renders it unnecessary to pronounce an opinion on the conduct of the officer in charge of The Arratoon Apcar after The Hebe's green light appeared the third time. It was probably too late then to prevent a collision. Their lordships however think it right to say that they are not satisfied that the excuse for not reversing ought to have been accepted as sufficient, nor are they convinced that the officer in charge of The Arratoon Apcar, after he saw the danger, was justified in going to the wheel before giving orders to stop. Though the time lost was short, there was an appreciable delay in complying with the regulations.

In the result their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decree under appeal ought to be varied by pronouncing The Arratoon Apcar to blame as well as The Hebe, with the usual consequences, including a direction to assess the damages sustained by The Hebe, and by discharging the order as to costs.

There will be no costs of the appeal.

A mortgagee solicitor who acts in person as a solicitor in realizing his security cannot recover profit costs from the mortgagor, but only expenses out of pocket.

Sclater v. Cottam, 5 W. R. 744, affirmed.

Appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Linklater.

The appellants, Messrs. Lickorish & Bellord, solicitors, were mortgagees of certain railway shares deposited with them as security, by way of equitable mortgage, in consideration of a loan by them to the debtor Wallis, the present respondent. Having failed to realize their mortgage debt (for which they had obtained judgment) by writs of fieri facias and elegit, they filed their petition, and a receiving order was made against the debtor on the 3rd of October, 1889. Subsequently, upon the application of the debtor, the petition was reheard, and the registrar ordered that the receiving order should be made unless the debtor paid, within a certain time, the debt of the petitioners, the costs of the bankruptcy proceedings, and the costs as between mortgagor and mortgagee. Upon an appeal this order was confirmed, but a further extension of time given, and, finally, by consent, on the 20th of January, 1890, the registrar referred the question of costs to the taxing master, provided that any legal question be referred back to him. The debtor deposited sufficient to meet the debt and the probable costs, but upon taxation contended that the petitioners were only entitled as to the mortgage costs, for costs out of pocket, and not for profit costs. Upon reference to the registrar, he held that he was bound by the judgment of Kay, J., in In re Roberts, ante, p. 225, 43 Ch. D. 52, to hold that the petitioners were only entitled as mortgagees to their costs out of pocket, and that all items in "secured creditors' costs," except out-of-pocket expenses, be disallowed. Against this decision the petitioning creditors now appealed.

Lane, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the appellants.—Where the solicitor's costs of realizing a security are chargeable against the debtor there is no case showing that a mortgagor debtor escapes such liability because the mortgagee creditor has acted for himself. Professional costs have been allowed to a solicitor acting as party to the suit for himself: London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley, 32 W. R. 523, 781, 12 Q. B. D. 452, 13 Ibid. 872; The National Provincial Bank v. Games, 34 W. R. 600, 31 Ch. D. 582. Sclater v. Cottam, 5 W. R. 744, has not been considered as binding in chancery practice. In re Donaldson, 27 Ch. D. 544, 35 W. R. Dig. 61, and Price v. M'Beth, 12 W. R. 818, left the question open. In re Roberts is not a case between a mortgagee and mortgagor, and, if applicable, should be overruled.

Wallis, the respondent, in person, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R. — A long argument has been addressed to us, founded on the assumption that the one case of the London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley inferentially overrules previous decisions, especially that of Kindersley, V.C., in Sclater v. Cottam. Such an argument is a most dangerous one, and I decline to follow it unless it can be shown that the later decision necessarily implies the overruling of earlier decisions. Here the later decisions of the London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley and the National Provincial Bank of England v. Games do no such thing. We have a judgment of Kindersley, V.C.'s, given thirty years ago, which lays down that the rights between mortgagor and mortgagee depend upon contract, and when in ordinary form, without any express contract otherwise, the mortgagee is not allowed to charge the mortgagor for remuneration for his own services, if such were given in reference to matters such as are now before us. The statement of the court in Sclater v. Cottam is not confined to solicitors, but applies to any mortgagee, and to such work and labour as he might perform for himself and did so perform. For remuneration for such work he is not entitled to charge by the contract formed out of the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee. This decision, given so long ago, and never, practically, questioned, must be well known to the profession, especially to solicitors. Even if the services involved between mortgagors and mortgagees be not precisely the same now as then, it must be assumed after the lapse of so many years that subsequent contracts are made in view of and in accordance with such an established decision as to the practice. Even if I differed, I should not attempt, under such circumstances, to overrule such a well-established decision. But I do not feel at all disposed to differ from it. On the contrary, I think it one absolutely just; while to say that a man is entitled to charge for his own services when he has incurred no expense thereby seems to me unjust on the face of it. As to the other cases cited, one counsel says we must overrule them, and the other, that they can be distinguished from this case. I agree with the first counsel, but I decline to overrule the cases cited; and as to the two cases which are said to overrule the earlier decisions, the National Provincial Bank v. Games and the London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley, I consider that they do nothing of the sort; first, because they apply to cases of litigation where the solicitor has acted for himself, and merely rule that he is entitled to the same costs as if he had employed a solicitor, except as to certain items for which, from the fact of his being a solicitor, such as for instructions, he has incurred no expense; and, secondly, because the decisions in those cases do not affect at all cases of relationship between mortgagor and mortgagee such as we have before us. The proper construction of the ordinary contract between mortgagor and mortgagee is that laid down by Kindersley, V.C., in Sclater v. Cottam. This appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—The case turns on the relation between a mortgagor and mortgagee. Where no express contract is made in relation to the equity of redemption the mortgagor must pay the principal and interest, and the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred in reference to the mortgage debt, and the costs of suit; but here we have not to deal with any costs of suit in relation to the mortgage, but only with costs or expenses or charges for work undertaken by the mortgagee himself. There has been no case cited to us where a mortgagee has been allowed to recover remuneration for work and labour done as for a charge incurred or cost expended. And the courts have long held that there can be no remuneration allowed to the mortgagee for work done by himself. For instance, suppose a land surveyor to be a mortgagee, he could not charge for surveying work undertaken by himself, or, again, a mortgagee in possession might appoint a receiver charging a commission, but he could not claim for such commission if he himself acted as receiver. This principle was well established before 1858, and was properly acted upon, and not introduced by the Vice-Chancellor in Sclater v. Cottam; there has been no exception shown to the regular exercise of this rule, nor is it in any way affected by the cases dealing with costs of litigation conducted by solicitors in person.

LOPES, L.J.—The terms of redemption are the payment of principal, interest, and costs. What costs? Costs in the ordinary acceptance of the term are not for the services rendered or charges incurred by the mortgagee, but for the services of a solicitor. Here there was no solicitor employed by the mortgagee, he did the work himself. There can, therefore, have been no costs incurred in the ordinary meaning of that word. I think this case falls within the authority of Sclater v. Cottam and In re Roberts, and I may add that I consider the judgments in those cases to be just and wholesome decisions.

Appeal dismissed.

REILLY v. BOOTH. (a.)

Easement—Deed—Construction—Parcels—Conveyance of land, "together with exclusive use" of "gateway"—Corporeal hereditament, general easement for all purposes, or right of way only.

A piece of land at the back of a row of houses was granted in 1839, with two of the houses, to a purchaser in fee simple, "together with the exclusive use of" a covered gateway or passage, which formed a sort of tunnel leading from the land at the back through another house in the row into the street in front, and the description of the parcels included the following words:—"Which said piece of ground and premises are more particularly delineated and described by the portion on the plan or ground plot thereof drawn in the margin of these presents coloured pink." The passage was described by its measurements in length, width, and height, but it was not coloured at all on the plan, though it was suggested that that might have been because the parts of the building above and below the passage were not included in the grant, the house through which it passed not being so included. In 1882 that house was demised to R. In 1885 the piece of land at the back of the houses was demised to B., "together with the entrance-way and passage thereto belonging." B. not having confined himself to using the passage as a "way" of exit into and entrance from the street, but having used it as a room or shop for a variety of purposes, the original grantor and R. brought an action against B., claiming a declaration that he was not entitled to use the passage otherwise than as in exercise of a right of way, and an injunction to restrain him from doing so.

Held (affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.), that, even if the entire property in the passage did not pass by the conveyance of 1839, the grantee, and B. as claiming under him, were, at any rate, not restricted to using it merely as a way, but were entitled to use it, and the floor, walls, and ceiling of it, for any purposes not inconsistent with the rights of the adjoining owners or the public.

But, semble, the entire property in the passage did pass by the conveyance.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

Certain freehold messuages, afterwards numbered 271, 273, 277, 279, and 281, Oxford-street, together with some pieces of land with sheds, lying at the back of such messuages, and then used as stables and a stable-yard, formerly belonged in fee to the trustees of the will of George Pollen. There was an opening or tunnel through No. 277, forming a covered gateway for horses and carriages from Oxford-street to the said stables and stable-yard at the back. This gateway or passage was bounded above, below, and on each side by various parts of the messuage through which it passed, there being a vaulted shooting-gallery below the floor of the gateway. On the 10th of July, 1839, the messuages afterwards numbered 271 and 273, with the stables and stable-yard at the back, were conveyed to Samuel Wimbush in fee, under the following description:—"All that piece or parcel of ground, and all that messuage or tenement and other buildings erected and built thereon, situate, standing, and being on the south side of Oxford-street . . . containing in length from east to west, on the north side thereof, 30ft. 11in.; from the north to the south on the east side of the gateway, 41ft. 6in.; then returning from east to west across the said gateway, 12ft. 9in.; then returning from south to north on the west side of the said gateway, 8ft. 6in.; then continuing from east to west abutting on the back fronts of three newly-erected houses in Oxford-street, 32ft. 8in.; then returning from north to south, on the west side, 98ft.; then returning from west to east, on the south side, 79ft. 3in.; then returning from south to north, on the east side, 88ft. 11in.; then returning from east to west, 3ft; and, lastly, from south to north, abutting on premises in Oxford-street, 27ft. 9in." This description was followed by the words "together with the exclusive use of the said gateway into Oxford-street, being 10ft. 11in. in the clear on the north side, 11ft. 7in. on the south side, in depth 41ft. 6in., and height 15ft. . . . which said piece of ground and premises are more particularly delineated and described by the portion on the plan or ground plot thereof drawn in the margin of these presents coloured pink. Together with all and singular houses . . . walls, ways . . . yards, areas . . . easements, rights . . . and appurtenances whatsoever, to the said messuage or tenement, buildings, hereditaments, and premises . . . belonging or in anywise appertaining." The tunnel or gateway, though shown on the plan, was not in fact coloured on it.

The messuage, No. 277, was afterwards, by lease dated the 25th of March, 1882, demised to the plaintiff, R. W. Reilly, for a term of twenty-one years. In 1885 the hereditaments at the back or south side of the messuages were demised, by indenture of the 6th of October, 1885, to the defendant, William Booth, "together with the entrance way and passage thereto belonging," for a term of fifty-three and a quarter years from the 25th of December then last, less the last seven days of such term.

The said defendant took the premises for the purpose of holding meetings there of a religious body known as the Salvation Army. He put up match boarding along the roof of the gateway, and he put inscriptions and fixed notice boards on the walls of it. He also had a book-stall in it for the purpose of selling newspapers, books, and tracts, and he had fixed up at the front of the entrance abutting on Oxford-street a large transparency in such a way as to extend above the top of the entrance and lean against the front of the messuage No. 277, Oxford-street, to which it was fastened by a screw or screws.

This action was commenced on the 16th of May, 1888, by the present trustees of George Pollen's will and by Reilly against the said William Booth. The plaintiffs alleged that Booth was merely entitled to a right of way through the gateway, but that he was treating it as his absolute property, including the floor, walls, and roof, and that by his acts the risk of fire to No. 277 was increased, and the general character and appearance of the house prejudicially affected. They accordingly asked for a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to use the entrance otherwise than in exercise of a right of way, and claimed an injunction to restrain him from doing so. The defendant pleaded that he was entitled to the exclusive use, occupation, and ownership of the entrance or gateway during the continuance of his term, and not merely to a right of way through it.

Kekewich, J., held that the defendant was not restricted to using the entrance merely as in exercise of a right of way, and accordingly dismissed the action

The plaintiffs appealed.

S. Hall, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the appellants.—The question is whether under the words "the exclusive use of the gateway" the exclusive use of the space passed, or merely the exclusive use of the way. The context and circumstances indicate that the intention was merely to pass an exclusive right of way. The word "use" must be read as limited by the nature of the thing to be used, and therefore the grant of "the exclusive use of the gateway" is nothing more than the grant of a right of way and an undertaking not to allow anyone but the grantee to use it. It is an easement, not property: Heap v. Hartley, ante, p. 136, 42 Ch. D. 461; Hill v. Tupper, 11 W. R. 784, 2 H. & C. 121; Keppell v. Bailey, 2 My. & K. 517, 535, 536; Aspden v. Seddon, 24 W. R. 828, 1 Ex. D. 496. If this was intended to be conveyed as property it would have been coloured on the plan like the rest of the property conveyed. The dimensions given exclude the walls of the house. The defendant has interfered with the walls by screwing into them a large "transparency," and that is clearly unjustifiable.

They referred also to Rowbotham v. Wilson, 8 H. L. Cas. 348, 8 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4.

Warmington, Q.C., and Sargant, for the respondent.—First, if the words only amount to a covenant, it is a negative covenant, and a court of equity will restrain a person taking the land with notice from acting in breach of such a covenant. Secondly, on the true construction of the words, it amounted to a grant in fee of the particular space, just as there may be a grant of chambers in Lincoln's-inn in fee. The passage was not coloured in the plan like the rest of the property conveyed in fee, because the space above and below the passage was not intended to be conveyed. "The gateway," as it existed at the time of the grant, was a corporeal hereditament, and the grant of it was a grant of the hereditament itself: Willis v. Watney, 30 W. R. 424. Thirdly, assuming that it was not a grant of the freehold in the space, yet it was, at all events, a grant of a general easement—i.e., an easement for all purposes. The word "gateway" does not limit that which is granted, it is merely descriptive of the locus in quo: Allan v. Gomme, 11 Ad. & Ell. 759; Henning v. Burnet, 8 Ex. 187; Watts v. Kelson, 19 W. R. 338, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 166; Cook v. Gerrard, 1 Saun. 170; Rabbeth v. Squire, 7 W. R. 657, 4 De G. & J. 406; Mannox v. Greener, L. R. 14 Eq. 456, 21 W. R. Dig. 289; United Land Co. v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 23 W. R. 896, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 586; Newcomen v. Coulson, 25 W. R. 469, 5 Ch. D. 133. A grant of the profits of lands is a grant of the land itself: Thomas's Co. Litt., vol. 1, p. 200, 4b (g); "for what is the land but the profits thereof?" The words "together with" are not always used in conveyances to introduce mere appurtenances, but sometimes to introduce other parcels. The words "exclusive use" convey at least as much as "profits." A conveyance of the "exclusive use" of a meadow would pass the entire property in it. A single room can be reserved out of a house conveyed in fee: Perkins's Profitable Book, paragraph 641. [They also referred to Rex v. Inhabitants of Eatington, 4 T. R. 177, Co. Litt. 4b; Knight v. Pursell, 27 W. R. 817, 11 Ch. D. 412; Weston v. Arnold, 22 W. R. 284, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1084; Finch v. Great Western Railway Co., 28 W. R. 229, 5 Ex. D. 254; Gale on Easements, c. 3.] The fact that the length of the passage is specified is fatal to the right of way theory. In London Taverns Co. v. Worley, November 24th, 1888, before the Court of Appeal, the grant was of an exclusive "right" of gateway. The bookstall is a proper exercise of a right of "gateway." As to the construction of the grant, the position of the property at the time was this:—There was a small frontage to Oxford-street, and a large piece of land at the back. This is a grant for ever in fee of the use of a gateway. Such a grant of a house or orchard would surely pass the fee, and why not in the case of a gateway? The appellants' counsel are trying to make a word, which is a perfectly good description of the property, a measure of its use. They are seeking to introduce the words "as a means of passage into Oxford-street," or "as a gateway." It is for the grantor, who is seeking to limit the grant, to satisfy the court clearly that the grant has a limited construction. The effect of the grant (not limited) is to make the land at the back equivalent to frontage land. The grantee would have had an implied right of way without any express grant, which goes to show that the words were intended to give something more.

S. Hall, Q.C., in reply.—Assuming that the respondent is not the owner of the passage, the burden is on him to show the nature of the easements he is entitled to. The respondent has really only an easement of way. The use of a gateway is the use of it for the ordinary purposes of a gateway—that is, for passing through. The walls are not included in the measurements. The argument for the respondent was based on the erroneous assumption that the walls were included. The obvious meaning of the words is "the use of the way into Oxford-street." In order to grant what the respondent claims, the words should have been "together with all that space, or room, or chamber." At the time of the grant it was simply a rough paved road. Willis v. Watney, and the other cases cited on this point, are distinguishable.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an action about apparently a small matter, but the action may be of some importance, if the matter complained of is small, because if the defendant has not got the property in this passage or gateway, he may acquire it by the acts which are complained of by the plaintiffs. One can understand, therefore, how it is that such an action as this is brought. But, really, what we have got to consider is this, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to complain of acts done by the defendant beyond the grant under which he claims. I cannot say that this deed of conveyance of 1839 is a very careful bit of conveyancing, but, still, we must decide what is the result of it. The property of the original grantors consisted of a row of houses on the south side of Oxford-street, facing the street, and through one of the houses there was a passage or gateway. I think I had better use the word "passage," so as not to introduce the word "gateway," which has been so much discussed. There was a passage, going through the ground-floor of one of these houses, back into what was a large stable, built by Messrs. Wimbush. Then there was a conveyance in terms which have created very considerable difficulty. The difficulty which arises is as to what right Wimbush, and those who claim under him, had granted to them, in this passage or gateway, as it is called in the deed, going from Oxford-street, on the south side of Oxford-street, through the ground-floor of one of those houses into the stables which were undoubtedly granted to Wimbush. The conveyance to Wimbush was in fee, and was a conveyance of "all that piece or parcel of ground, and all that messuage or tenement and other buildings erected and built thereon, situate, standing, and being on the south side of Oxford-street." Then the length is given. I need not read that, except to point out that in describing the width of the parcels, which are clearly conveyed in fee to Wimbush, there is a reference to that part of them which goes across the gateway, and there it is recognized as "the gateway," as some physical thing there which is to be recognized, and which is important in describing the metes and bounds of the back portion of the property which has been conveyed, and which was undoubtedly conveyed in fee simple to Wimbush. After giving that description of the parcels, there is a reference, to the gateway I have mentioned, in these words, "together with the exclusive use of the said gateway"—(that gateway had been already referred to for the purpose of defining the length of the boundaries)—"into Oxford-street, being 10 ft. 11 in. in the clear on the north side, and 11 ft. 7 in. on the south side, in depth 41 ft. 6 in., and in height 15 ft. . . . which said piece of ground and premises are more particularly delineated and described by the portion on the plan or ground plot thereof in the margin of these presents coloured pink." The portion which is undoubtedly conveyed in fee simple is coloured pink on the plan, but the portion occupied by the gateway or passage from the stables of Wimbush into Oxford-street is not coloured pink at all. Then there are general words, "together with all and singular houses, outhouses, buildings, walls, ways," &c.

What interest is conveyed in that gateway to Wimbush by this deed? It is contended by the plaintiffs that there is a right to use that passage simply for the purpose of a way from the stables into Oxford-street, and from Oxford-street into the stables, not that anything was to restrict them to a passage to the stables so long only as they were used as stables, but they say there is only a right of way granted. As far as I can see, their argument depends on two things—that what is granted is the exclusive use of the said gateway "into Oxford-street," and that it is not introduced in the ordinary way of adding to parcels a part of which has been already enumerated, but that it is introduced by the words "together with," which usually introduce mere general words, easements, or appurtenances. In my opinion one cannot, by the mere reference to this passage as "the gateway," confine the user of it to the use for the purposes of a way. It is "the exclusive use." What is granted is not the use merely for the purpose of getting into Oxford-street, or from Oxford-street into the stables, but "the exclusive use of a gateway into Oxford-street." It is said the gateway is to be restricted to a use for the purposes of a way. In my opinion that is not so. One finds here a gateway to that which I have sometimes called a tunnel, but which I would rather call a passage through this house. It is defined as an existing thing, called by that name, and to give the exclusive use of an existing thing, though it may be called a gateway, does not, in my opinion, convey this restriction—that it is to be used only for the purpose of a way. It is not the use of the right of way through the gateway that is granted, but it is "the exclusive use of the said gateway." Then one finds, as I have read in the parcels, that the particular thing called "the gateway" is described by height, by length, and by width. In my opinion that is inconsistent with the term "gateway" being referred to, as a limit to the use to which that which was described was to be put. Although these words are not very apt, yet there is nothing in them which can enable us to restrict the exclusive use which is granted in fee to Wimbush. No one else had any right or interest in this for ever; the exclusive use is granted to him in fee, and the grantors retain no interest in that use of it at all. They only had a use in the walls, the ceiling, and the floor, because they had a shooting gallery underneath the floor and they had the rooms of a house above, and they had, on one side certainly, the house which was afterwards Reilly's. Therefore they had an interest in the floor, in the ceiling, and in the walls on the side. Of course they had a right with respect to the wall on the east side, but not any in respect of the house belonging to them, except a right to support for that portion of it which was built over that wall and supported by that wall. In my opinion it would be wrong to say that there is anything to restrict the user. What is given is the exclusive user of the gateway, which the grantee can use in any way and employ for any purpose not inconsistent with the rights of the neighbours or with the rights of the public. Therefore we must consider this as intended to be not only exclusive—that is, excluding others from sharing it—but a right to use this passage, which is called a gateway, for any purpose which the law will allow, and which does not interfere with the rights of the neighbours.

It is said that will be granting a new kind of easement not recognized by the law. There would be a difficulty, I think, in granting the right to use this passage by way of easement merely, without describing it in any way as a gateway or passage. But I do not at all think, even if this is a mere grant of easement, that it would be right to construe it as a covenant on the part of the grantor that this passage shall be restricted from being used for any lawful purpose to which it might be applicable by Wimbush. That being so, I should not myself be willing to assist, by way of injunction, the plaintiffs, when there was a covenant, of which they had notice, that the grantee Wimbush, through whom the defendant claims, should be at liberty to use that passage for any lawful purpose, or for any purpose for which it could be used without any interference with the rights of neighbours. But it may be (and I think this is probably the true construction of it) that the grant of an exclusive use for ever of this passage does convey the property in that passage. All we have to decide is whether anything is now being done of which the plaintiff can complain. We have not now to decide the question whether, if there is a grant of this portion of the house, it is a grant of that passage, just as there might be a grant of a set of chambers which would give a right to the chambers, with certain restrictions as to the use of the walls, the ceiling, and the floor. It is not necessary, and I think it is undesirable, when the question does not arise, to decide, when a person has a set of chambers conveyed to him, what are the rights as regards floors, walls, and ceiling, but clearly he cannot do anything to interfere with the rights of his neighbours, which still exist notwithstanding the grant to him of the particular portion of the house.

What we have to consider is this—whether, looking at this either as a grant for ever of a use for all purposes, of this portion of the building which is now occupied by Reilly, or looking upon it as a conveyance of the property, there is anything of which the plaintiffs can complain. My view is that it is a conveyance really of the property in that passage which is so described. It is said that on the plan this passage is not coloured. I think the reasonable answer, as regards that, has been given by Mr. Warmington, that this was not a conveyance of the property in that portion of the building so as to give the right to the soil down below, and so as to give the right to the air going upwards over that, because that was, as we know, dealt with in a contemporaneous deed. In the conveyance of the building now occupied by Reilly there were some rights given to him below and some rights given to him in the house over that passage, and so it would have been wrong to have coloured this like the rest of the plan, which would have indicated that there was an absolute conveyance of this piece of the building giving the right to the ground below and giving the right to everything above this passage. Therefore I think that is a reasonable explanation which has been given by Mr. Warmington.

That being my view of the true effect and construction of this deed, has anything been done of which the plaintiffs can reasonably complain? If anything had been done which would injure the walls, so as to prevent the walls supporting the building above; if anything had been done to the ceiling or roof, so as to prevent that supporting what was above, or if anything had been done to the floor, so as to cause injury to the shooting gallery which was below, the plaintiffs, in my view, would have had a right to complain. The dado and lights which have been put up or affixed are not shown to have been put up, affixed, or dealt with in such a way as to cause any interference with the support, or to cause anything else which the plaintiff Reilly, as the owner of the house on the side, above, and below, was entitled to complain of. The only thing, in my opinion, which the plaintiffs have a right to complain of—I mean by that to call upon the court to interfere in respect of—is this, that this transparency has been fixed up in part to the house of the plaintiffs—that is to say, this large transparency, which extends down over part of the gate which goes into this passage, is fixed by screws to that part of the house which clearly belongs to Reilly. In my opinion that is wrong. If Mr. Warmington had been here before I began my judgment, I should have asked him whether he was willing to undertake that those screws affixed to the house of Reilly should be removed, and the transparency brought down so as to cover only the passage, and not to cover any portion of the house belonging to the plaintiffs. The matter is a very trifling one, although I agree it was a wrong—that is to say, an excess by the defendant of any right which was granted to him. If that is done I do not think we ought to make any other order in favour of the plaintiffs. In my opinion the substantial question is whether the defendant is entitled only to a limited user of this passage so as to enable him to go out into Oxford-street and go in from Oxford-street. As to that I think the plaintiffs are wrong. That was the substantial question, but we ought to deal with it so as to prevent it being said that we allowed the defendant to do what was in excess of the rights which, in our opinion, were granted to him, and which he possesses under the conveyance contained in that deed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I have studied this deed of 1839 and the map annexed to it with all the care I could, and the conclusion at which I have arrived is that there are not sufficient grounds to authorize us judicially to limit the exclusive use of the gateway which is granted to those through whom the defendant claims. The words of the grant here are very different from the words of the grant which we had to construe not very long ago in a case (London Taverns Co. v. Worley) which arose in the City, which were "the exclusive 'right' of gateway." There is nothing here about any "right," as distinguished from "use." Now the first thing to ascertain is, what is meant by the word "gateway." "Gateway" is an ambiguous word. It may mean a right of passage. It may mean a place, and in this particular deed it appears to me that "gateway" is used to denote a place, a strip of land the dimensions of which are given. It is obviously so used, to my mind, in the first place where it occurs in the deed. When we have a grant of the exclusive use of a gateway leading into Oxford-street, and then the dimensions given, it appears to me that what is conveyed is the exclusive use of that strip of land the dimensions of which are there given, and which is denoted by the word "gateway." It is said that we ought to construe the use of the gateway into the use of a way, and that it is a mere easement. That, to my mind, is to limit, without sufficient warrant or justification, the words used in the grant. It was pressed upon us by Mr. Hall very ingeniously that if we construe this grant as the grant of the exclusive use for all purposes, it involves the ownership, and he says that is inconsistent with the manifest intention of the parties, as is to be gathered from the deed and the map. I thought there was a great deal in that at first, but the more I think of it the less I am disposed to attribute the weight to it which he desires. The grantor has granted the exclusive use of this gateway, and if, in order that the grantee may enjoy the exclusive use of the gateway, it is necessary for us to say that the grantee has got the ownership of the gateway, so be it. That will be the necessary legal consequence. I am not sure that is not so. I rather think it is. The inferences to be drawn from the map are explained in this way: it is quite obvious that the grantor, assuming he granted this gateway as a corporeal hereditament, was not granting it to the same extent that he was granting the yard at the back. He was granting the yard at the back in the ordinary way without limit up or down. He was not granting the gateway in the same way at all; he was not granting it up or down. He was reserving to himself that which was above it, and he was reserving to himself that which was below it. That is a sufficient reason for not colouring the gateway in the plan in the same way as the land which was at the back, and which was granted, was coloured.

That appears to me to remove what at first seemed a strong argument, that the gateway is not coloured in the plan. Now, if we look at the matter we must see what has been granted and what has been reserved. What has the grantor granted? He has granted the exclusive use of the gateway which I have mentioned. What has he reserved? In terms, nothing; but, by necessary implication, he has reserved a right of support for that part of the house which is over the gateway, and a right of support, so far as the floor goes, for that part of the house which is under the gateway. There is nothing said about it, but that follows as a necessary implication. It appears to me that these rights, which he necessarily has reserved, impose the only limit to that which is granted. That being so, I think the plaintiffs are asking us to put a limit which cannot be justified, and that the defendant is not exceeding his rights, except as regards the transparency. So far as I understand, that transparency is not in the gateway at all, it is in the wrong place, but we will hear what Mr. Warmington has to say about it.

LOPES, L.J.—In the year 1839 there was a conveyance to Wimbush, which conveyance we are called upon to construe, and it becomes material, to my mind, to consider in the first place what the state of the property was in 1839. There was this large yard, and there was this passage leading from Oxford-street into the yard, and from the yard into Oxford-street. Then in the deed of 1839 certain parcels are conveyed to Wimbush, which beyond all question he takes absolutely; and then follow these important words, "Together with the exclusive use of the said gateway into Oxford-street, being 10ft. 11in. in the clear on the north side, 11ft. 7in. on the south side, in depth 41ft. 6in., and in height 15ft.; be the said several dimensions little more or less." Now, what passed in respect of this gateway? It is said by Mr. Hall that a mere easement passed, an incorporeal hereditament, a right on the part of Wimbush to pass from Oxford-street into this yard, and from the yard into Oxford-street, and nothing more. It is said, on the other hand, by Mr. Warmington that a corporeal interest passed—in point of fact, that property or ownership passed. In my opinion, Mr. Warmington's contention is right. I think ownership passed. The exclusive use of "the said gateway" was given. The exclusive or unrestricted use of a piece of land, I take it, beyond all question passes the property or ownership in that land, and there is no easement known to the law which gives exclusive and unrestricted use of a piece of land. It is not an easement in such a case, it is property that passes. Again, a mere easement can be conveyed, or may be conveyed, by words other than these, and would pass under general words. But here we have the words to which I have called attention. A mere easement or right of way, as a general rule, I venture to think, is not set out by measurements in the way that what passes here is set out by measurements. But then it is said by Mr. Hall you have the word "gateway"; and he relies on the word "gateway" as meaning a right of way, and nothing more.

Now, in my opinion, Mr. Hall is not entitled to rely on the word "gateway" to that extent. I think the word "gateway" is a mere description of the thing—a mere mode of identifying the thing which has to pass, and it cannot in any way be construed as restrictive of the previous words "exclusive use." This case seems to me very much like the illustration I am about to give. A. is owner in fee simple of a certain set of chambers in the Temple, and he grants to an under-tenant the exclusive use of one of the rooms in that set of chambers. I take it the ownership in that room passes, and the person who takes, is entitled to use that room in every reasonable way. I take it he may use the floor of that room in a reasonable way, the walls of that room in a reasonable way, and the ceiling, if it were necessary to use it, in a reasonable way. The conclusion that I arrive at in this case is this, that there was conveyed to Wimbush the absolute ownership in the passage, subject to this, that he must use the passage reasonably—that he must not in any way interfere with the concurrent or correlative rights of his grantor—that he may use what I may call the floor of the passage or the ceiling or walls of the passage in every reasonable way—I need scarcely add not in any way creating a nuisance, or in any way infringing upon the rights of the grantor. For myself I entertained a very strong opinion, early in the case, that Mr. Warmington's contention was right, but there was one matter which caused me to pause and hesitate, and that was the plan. For some time I felt a difficulty in understanding why, whilst the other parcels passing by the deed of 1839 were coloured pink, this passage was not coloured pink, what passed being described in the deed by reference to a plan. But, to my mind, that has now been satisfactorily explained, and the explanation is this. With regard to that portion of the property which is coloured pink, everything above and below was being conveyed. With regard to this part of the property, the passage, nothing below and nothing above was conveyed. I take it that is the reason why we find this diversity in the colouring. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge below was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

The following form of undertaking by the defendant as to the transparency was proposed, and approved by the court, to preface the order:—"Defendant, by his counsel, undertaking to remove the screw, or other means by which the transparency in the pleadings mentioned is fastened to the facia of the plaintiffs' shop, and to reduce the height and size thereof so as to bring the same within the gateway referred to in the deed of the 10th of July, 1839."

MYERS v. CATTERSON. (a.)

Easement—Light—Implied grant—Railway company—Sale of surplus land—Obstruction—Injunction.

A railway company sold to the plaintiff a piece of their surplus land, with a house erected thereon, facing the railway, which at this place ran over a series of brick arches, through which there was some access of light to the lower windows of the house. The company retained in their hands lands adjoining the property sold, and the conveyance contained a recital that the company required all the land other than that sold to the plaintiff for the construction of their railway; but it contained no express grant of a right to light.

The defendant's predecessor in title subsequently acquired from the company the fee simple of the lands opposite the plaintiff's house, on which he erected buildings, and took a lease of the arches. Afterwards the defendant acquired the property, and blocked up the openings of the arches on the side nearest the plaintiff's house with hoardings.

Held, that the company, on selling the land, entered into an implied obligation not to do anything on the land retained by them which would interfere with the plaintiff's reasonable enjoyment of the land purchased by him, except what was necessary for the construction of their railway; and that, the hoarding erected by the defendant not being necessary for that purpose, an injunction ought to be granted as to it.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

In 1863 the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. sold to the plaintiff Myers a piece of their surplus lands, with a house which they had permitted him to erect thereon, situate in Newington-causeway, on the south-west side of their line of railway, which at this place ran over a series of brick arches at a distance of about eight feet from the plaintiff's house. Through two of these arches access of light was obtained to the lower windows of the house facing the railway. The railway company retained in their own hands the lands adjoining the property sold.

The conveyance from the railway company to the plaintiff recited that the company required all the land other than that sold to the plaintiff for the construction of their railway, but it contained no express grant of a right to light, nor any covenant or agreement as to light.

In 1872 Isaacs, the predecessor in title of the defendant, acquired from the railway company the fee simple of the land on the north-east side of the line opposite the plaintiff's house, and took from them a lease for 1,000 years of the arches. Since that date the latter had been used for storing machinery, by which the light to the plaintiff's windows had, to a certain extent, been obstructed.

In 1887 the defendant, who had purchased the property from Isaacs, erected buildings on the north-east side of the railway, a short distance from the two arches on the side nearest the plaintiff's house, the openings of which he blocked up with hoardings.

The plaintiff had, as he alleged, since 1863 enjoyed the access of light to his windows through the openings of these two arches.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to restrain the defendant from obstructing such light by the buildings or by the hoardings, and for damages.

The plaintiff having died in 1888, the action was continued by his representatives.

On the 10th of July, 1889, Kekewich, J., granted the injunction as to the hoardings and directed an inquiry as to damages.

The defendant appealed.

Neville, Q.C., and Russell Roberts, for the appellant.—No grant to the plaintiff of a right to light can be implied, as such a grant would be inconsistent with the recital in the conveyance. Further, the plaintiff is not entitled under the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, s. 3) by reason of the interruption of his enjoyment of the light in 1872.

COTTON, L.J.—All we have to decide is the question brought before us on this appeal, which is from a judgment of Kekewich, J., granting an injunction and requiring the removal of a hoarding put up by the defendant so as to obstruct the light coming through an arch under part of the line of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. [His lordship then stated the facts of the case, and continued :—] The first question we have to consider is this, Is there any right at all in the plaintiff, or, rather, is there, under the circumstances which I have stated, any obligation on the railway company not to obstruct the plaintiff's lights? If a person, who is the owner of two plots of lands, on one of which a house has been built sells the plot with the house on it, and retains the other, then, from the position in which he has placed himself towards the purchaser, there is the implied obligation or contract or covenant (call it which you will) on his part not to interfere with the lights of the house which he has sold; and if this railway company was a mere ordinary owner of land, that would be the obligation which, unless rebutted, would primâ facie result from the position in which the vendor has placed himself towards the purchaser. Here the vendors were a railway company, and the difference, as it is argued, is this, that a railway company will not be presumed to do anything which would interfere with the construction of their railway. And no doubt that is so. It is clear upon the face of the conveyance, and I think it appears from the evidence that there was a limitation on the implied contract entered into by the vendors (the railway company)—viz., that they were not to be restricted from doing what was necessary for the purposes of constructing their railway. That, in my opinion, is the true nature of the obligation here. But then it is argued that this really makes this obligation entirely dependent on the will of the railway company, and that that is quite inconsistent with and is repugnant to the grant of the house to the purchaser through whom the plaintiff claims. But that is not so.

I think the true view is that the limitation of the obligation contracted by the railway company is not entirely dependent on the will of the railway company. It is that they may do anything which is required for the construction of their railway; and the engineer will determine, subject to the directors, what is necessary for the construction of the railway. That, therefore, is not a matter left entirely to the will of the company, but certain definite purposes are pointed out, for which only the railway company are entitled to use the land retained so as to interfere with the obligation which is entered into by them as regards the light to the windows. What I hold therefore is, that in this case the railway company as owners, not only of the lands sold, but of the land adjoining, entered into an implied obligation not to do anything on the adjoining land to interfere with the plaintiff's reasonable enjoyment of the land sold, except that which was necessarily required for the construction of the railway. So the first question we have to consider is whether this hoarding which was complained of by the plaintiff was required for the construction of the railway. In my opinion it certainly was not. It is not that the railway company in making an alteration of their line have put up this hoarding, but the facts are that the company have granted to the defendant a lease or interest under which he is in occupation, and for the purpose of making that occupation profitable to himself —and therefore possibly to some extent so as to give the railway company a larger rent for the archway—he has put up the hoarding which is complained of. That is either for his own pecuniary benefit or for the benefit of the railway company, I do not care which—take it for the pecuniary benefit of the railway company. But it is not for the purposes of the construction of their line, for which only are they entitled to deviate or be relieved from the obligation as regards the house. The obligation is, not to interfere with the light except in doing what is required for the construction of the railway.

It is said that in the case of such an implied covenant the court will not interfere unless there is a substantial interference with the light of the plaintiff. With that I agree. It was argued also on behalf of the defendant that there could be no implied obligation in a case where, upon the evidence, the angle of light as it came to the house was less than forty-five degrees. In my opinion that is entirely wrong. The court will not interfere by injunction where it sees there is still a reasonable access of light of sufficient extent to the person complaining; but the obligation would be implied quite as much where there was no obstacle existing at the time opposite the house sold—no difficulty arising from anything there was on the land of the plaintiff or the adjoining land. Take for example a house on Salisbury Plain, without anything to interfere with the light which came from the horizon. Could it be said that the vendor of such a house, in retaining adjoining land, did not subject himself to the implied obligation not to do anything thereon which would interfere with the access of the light to the house which he has sold? It may be that, if he put up something which only diminished the light in an infinitesimal degree, it would not be held to be such an interference as to call for the interposition of the court; but that does not affect the question whether or not an obligation was entered into by the vendor.

In dealing with the question whether or not there has been such a breach of the obligation as to justify or require the interference of the court it must be borne in mind that the position of the house and windows is such that a very small diminution of the light to the access of which the plaintiff had a right would be prejudicial. The railway is close to the house, only eight feet off, and any interference with the light which came to it before the acts complained of would produce a serious effect.

The learned judge had before him a variety of witnesses who all say that since the act done by the defendant there has been a substantial alteration in the light. One of them said (and this was very much commented upon in argument), that he saw the light "streaming down through this archway." I do not think one ought to criticize that expression very closely, but I understand this to mean that there was a substantial amount of light coming through this archway. Opposed to that is certain expert evidence. Without intending any disrespect to these witnesses I agree with the learned judge that evidence as to facts and experience is much more to be relied upon than any scientific evidence as to what will be the consequence of a certain act, and when I find here that the judge, after seeing and hearing all the witnesses, relies upon the witnesses of experience in opposition to the expert witnesses, I cannot differ from the conclusion at which he has arrived.

Then there is one remaining point which was pressed upon us, that of acquiescence. But how has there been acquiescence? There has been no acquiescence in the thing complained of, because that has not been done until recently. There was, no doubt, a non-interference by the plaintiff with a temporary obstruction of a small amount of light caused by some machinery put up by Isaacs. But, to my mind, there has been no acquiescence in the putting up of the hoarding by the defendant. In my opinion this appeal fails, and, as the counsel for the respondents have properly waived the inquiry as to damages in respect of the buildings on the north-eastern side of the railway, the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the question of fact involved in the appeal, I shall really add nothing to what the Lord Justice has said, with this slight exception, that I do not consider that, in a case of this sort, we ought to review the decision of the judge below, who has seen the witnesses, just as if we had seen the witnesses ourselves. We are not in that position. I am further impressed, in the present instance, by this, that the judge below apparently founded his judgment mainly upon the evidence of one gentleman, Dr. Tanner, to which he seems to have attached much weight and importance, and if Dr. Tanner was a first-rate witness, and if his evidence was worthy of all the attention and respect which the judge gave it, it is impossible to say that his evidence does not justify the finding that the light here has been substantially or appreciably diminished by the hoarding. I think, therefore, the matter being one peculiarly within the cognisance of the judge, we cannot review his decision as to the fact, even if we differed from him. At the same time, it must not be at all supposed that I differ from the learned judge, and so far as I can judge from the paper evidence that is before me, I do not say that I should not have come to the same conclusion.

But as to the point of law, which is perhaps of more general importance, I will add one or two words. Here is a railway company which is possessed of a large piece of land, along a portion of which the railway is intended to be constructed. The company allow a purchaser to enter on the residue of the land, close to the place where the line will in the end be carried, to occupy it under an agreement, and to build a house upon it, which house they finally convey to him.

Now, what is the implied obligation that the company came under as regards the use of so much of the land as they retain for the purposes of their own railway? As in the case of all other implied covenants or implied obligations, in order to see what the measure of the obligation is we must look at the reason of the thing and at the surrounding circumstances in order to ascertain, if we can, what was the obvious intention of the parties, so as to give to the transaction between them that minimum of efficacy and value which, upon any view of the case, it must have been their common intention it should have.

Supposing this were the case, not of a railway company, but of an ordinary landowner who has two pieces of land, which either adjoin, or are so near to one another that the enjoyment of the one, perhaps for all purposes, at any rate for some purposes, depends upon the user to be made of the other portion of land. What is the obligation which the law assumes to arise between the parties as soon as the conveyance has been made and comes into effect? The owner of a piece of land which is not sold is selling a piece of adjoining land, the full enjoyment of which depends upon the use which he makes of that portion which is not sold. Surely it must be in the contemplation of the parties that, in the absence of any express agreement one way or the other, the vendor shall not so use that land which he retains, as to preclude any possible use of the building or lands which he sells, or to prevent that use of it for which he knows he is selling it to the purchaser. It would be contrary to common notions of justice and fair dealing if it were otherwise; and the truth is that the law in such a case, when the parties have entered into the relation of vendor and purchaser, assumes from the circumstances an obligation on the part of the seller not to do anything with his own land which would defeat the known mutual intention of both parties upon the sale. Now, apply that to a house. Suppose I have a large piece of land, on one part of which is standing a house, that house may be a mere congeries of bricks, never intended to be used as a house, but which may be pulled down and carted away so as to be sold as bricks. If I sell a house merely as bricks, of course the transaction would be different, but if I sell a house which is standing on part of my land as a house with windows in it, to be used as a house, and the windows in it to be used as windows, the least that the law implies from the necessary reason of the thing is that I am not, upon the remainder of my land which I keep back, immediately I have sold the house and its windows, to do something which prevents all use of the house as a house, and all use of the windows as windows.

The law imposes that obvious duty in the form of what it calls an implied obligation, or implied covenant or contract, on the part of the vendor, who is selling one portion of his property and retaining the other, under circumstances like this, that he will not, on the property which he retains, use all his rights as owner with respect to the property which he retains, but will only use such of his rights of ownership as can be used consistently with the convenient and reasonable enjoyment of the house he has sold as a house. That is the ordinary implication. But, as is clear, this implication depends upon what one gathers from observing the transaction, and trying to find in it a clue to the mutual intention of the parties, and as soon as you add facts which make it obvious that the intention of the parties was one way or the other, then you have facts which give a colour to the inference which the law draws, and which very often lessen the obligation which, in the absence of those facts, or that fact, would be supposed to have arisen. I keep a piece of land, and sell the house as a house. The obvious intention, in the absence of anything else, is that I intend it to be used as a house. But if, at the time I sell it, I make it clear to the person who is taking the house—or supposing the circumstances of the case make it clear to him—that, although I sell it to him as a house, I am intending, nevertheless, to use the remainder of my land, which I keep, in a way which may interfere in some degree with the full enjoyment of the house as a house—then you get a new fact or a new element introduced into the case, which shows that the intention of the parties was a limited one, and that it was not intended by the parties that the full use of the house as a house, or the full enjoyment of the lights and windows as windows was the essence of the transaction.

Now here it is said that, at the time that the railway company sold this house as a house, with its window lights to be used as lights, the purchaser had notice that the railway company intended to use the remainder of the land in a particular way which would necessarily interfere with the enjoyment of the light to the windows, and would, so to speak, modify the ordinary implication which the law would extract from the transaction.

Therefore it becomes necessary to look at what was the exact character of the conveyance, and at what the purchaser of the house was told at the time he made the purchase. It is clear that he was told that the railway company intended to construct a part of their line on a portion of the remainder. I neglect, for the purpose of this judgment, any consideration of what the exact terms would be about anything else except this part of the land which immediately fronts the windows of the plaintiff; but the purchaser was told, what it was most material for him with reference to his window lights to know, that the railway company, when they sold him the house and gave him the windows, required the remainder of the land for the construction of the railway. Now to what extent did that modify the obligation which the law would infer? I think it would modify it to this extent—that the vendor would no longer be bound to leave the window lights intact, but he would have a right to diminish the light to the windows and to interfere with the enjoyment of the land so granted so far as he required to do so for the purpose of constructing the line, but no further. And this would be the case unless you had some further fact or some further notice—something further to modify the intention of the parties to the transaction. Of course, the broad rule applies, that the person who gives a thing to be enjoyed intends that it is to be enjoyed, and has no right afterwards to do anything which defeats the enjoyment to which he has consented, and which is the creature of his own gift. The appellant's argument, therefore, breaks down because, although the purchaser clearly could not complain of the railway company interfering with his windows in the construction of their line; yet if the interference was one which went beyond the construction of the line, then the ordinary presumption of the law would apply.

It seems to me that the erection of this hoarding is certainly not for the purpose of the construction of the line, but goes beyond it. Our decision rests on the broad ground that the vendor cannot derogate from his own grant, but is bound to allow the premises which he has sold to be enjoyed so far as they reasonably can be enjoyed, limiting the enjoyment only by the kind of user of his own land which he must be taken to have desired to preserve. So much for the law of the case.

The appellant seems to me to fail, and the decision of the court below must be affirmed.

As to the building on the other side of the arch, I agree with what the Lord Justice has said.

Practice — Cross-examination of witnesses before an examiner — Order of cross-examination — Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 37, rr. 21, 22.

An application was made by a shareholder for the rectification of the register of a company. When the application came on for hearing, the shareholder applied to have the witnesses who had made affidavits on behalf of the company cross-examined upon their affidavits, and an order was made that the witnesses on both sides should attend for cross-examination before an examiner. On attending before the examiner, the question was raised whether the shareholder's witnesses or the company's witnesses ought to be cross-examined first.

Held, that, under the circumstances of the case, the shareholder's witnesses should be cross-examined first if the company desired to cross-examine them.

Motion.

This was a motion for directions to an examiner of the court as to what order ought to be pursued in the cross-examination of witnesses before him.

An application was made by A. Honrich, a shareholder of the above-mentioned company, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, for the rectification of the register of members of the company by having his name removed therefrom.

On the 20th of December, 1889, the application came on for hearing, and the applicant asked that the witnesses who had made affidavits on behalf of the company might be cross-examined upon their affidavits. The motion accordingly stood over, and an order was made that the witnesses on both sides should attend before an examiner for cross-examination if the opposite party should desire to cross-examine them.

An appointment for cross-examination was accordingly made by the examiner to whom the matter was assigned, for Monday, the 24th of February, 1890; and the parties, their counsel, solicitors, and witnesses attended on that day. What then took place appears from the report of the examiner, which was as follows:—"It was contended by Mr. Terrell (counsel for the applicant) that, being in the position of plaintiff, he was entitled to have his witnesses cross-examined, if Mr. Chester (counsel for the company) desired to cross-examine them, before cross-examining the witnesses of the company, and he tendered Messrs. Honrich, Ingrey, Reydellet, and Mayhew for cross-examination accordingly. Mr. Chester, on the other hand, contended that, the adjournment of the motion and the order to cross-examine having been obtained at the applicant's request, the company's witnesses should be cross-examined before the applicant's witnesses, and he tendered Messrs. Beeman, Lowles, and Ibbetson for cross-examination accordingly.

"Both parties regarded the matter as one of principle, and desired to have it decided by the court. Under the above circumstances I adjourned the examination for the purpose of the parties obtaining the decision of the court upon it. Both counsel used other arguments upon the point, but I have not thought it necessary to state them. None of the witnesses were sworn by me."

The present motion was accordingly made by A. Honrich to obtain the decision of the court upon the question as stated in the examiner's report.

The Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 37, provide, by rule 21:—"Evidence taken subsequently to the hearing or trial of any cause or matter shall be taken as nearly as may be in the same manner as evidence taken at, or with a view to, a trial."

And by rule 22:—"The practice with reference to the examination, cross-examination, and re-examination of witnesses at a trial shall extend and be applicable to evidence taken in any cause or matter at any stage."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and H. Terrell, for A. Honrich.—The applicant is entitled to have his witnesses cross-examined first if the company intend to cross-examine them. The practice with reference to the cross-examination of witnesses before the examiner is the same as before the court: Rules of Court, 1883, ord. 37, rr. 21, 22.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and J. Chester, for the company.—As the order for the cross-examination of witnesses was obtained at the applicant's request he should cross-examine the company's witnesses first.

North, J., stated the facts, read rules 21 and 22 (which are set out above) of order 37 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, and proceeded:—With respect to what took place before the examiner I read the statements contained in his report and pay no attention to anything else. [His lordship then read the report set out above, and continued:—] Counsel for the applicant contended that the proceedings before the examiner should be commenced by the cross-examination by the respondents' counsel of the applicant's witnesses, if they were to be cross-examined at all, while the respondents' counsel contended that, as the order for cross-examination had been obtained at the instance of the applicant, the respondents' witnesses ought to be cross-examined first. It was not put to the examiner that he should enter into any special arrangement for the convenience of the parties, and both parties wished to have the matter decided by the court. I think the order in which the witnesses should be cross-examined ought to be the same as if the proceedings had taken place in court. Suppose I had ordered the witnesses to be cross-examined before me in court instead of before an examiner, I should follow the usual course, and have the affidavits in chief on behalf of the applicant read first, and then the affidavits in chief on behalf of the respondents, or so much of the respondents' evidence as might be necessary for the understanding of the applicant's evidence in reply; and when the reading of the applicant's affidavits had been completed, then would be the time for cross-examining the applicant's witnesses. After that the respondents' case would be reached, and their affidavits in chief would be read more fully if the former cursory reading of them was not sufficient; and when the reading of the respondents' affidavits had been completed, then would be the time for cross-examining the respondents' witnesses. In this case the applicant's witnesses should be cross-examined first if they are to be cross-examined at all; but on their being tendered for cross-examination, counsel for the respondents declined to say whether he wished to cross-examine them or not. In that I think he was wrong. But in stating my opinion I do not wish to lay down any rule which would debar the exercise of his discretion by the examiner in any case in which a different order may be advisable. Davis v. Stephenson. (a.)

Licensing—Gaming—Permitting house to be used for the receipt of money deposited for purpose of betting—Money brought into house after receipt outside—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 17.

The appellant was the keeper of a licensed tavern, in close proximity to which were a piece of waste ground and a public footway. On the day of a race meeting a betting man was for some hours on the waste ground and the footway, receiving from persons who resorted thither packets containing money, which they deposited with him for the purpose of backing various horses. The packets were brought into the tavern at intervals by the appellant's daughter. This plan was adopted for the purpose of evading the provisions of the Betting Act, 1853, and with the connivance of the appellant.

Held, that the appellant was not liable to be convicted under section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872, of having suffered his house to be used in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853.

Case stated by the Recorder of Birmingham on an appeal from a conviction under section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

The case stated that Davis, the appellant, was the keeper of a licensed beerhouse called "The Justice Tavern," in Moor-street, Birmingham. There was a side-door to the tavern which opened into an entry, leading from Moor-street, by the side of the tavern, and terminating in a small piece of waste ground at the back of the tavern. There was also a back-yard door which opened into the entry. The piece of waste ground was on the other side open to a public footroad known as Nelson-passage. The back-yard door and the entry could be seen from the waste ground and from Nelson-passage. Neither the entry, the piece of waste ground, nor Nelson-passage was included in the licensed area, nor were they in the occupation of the appellant.

On the 20th of June, 1889, a man named Hicks was standing in Nelson-passage and upon the piece of waste ground from 12.30 to 2.35 p.m. In Nelson-passage a great number of persons, and on the piece of waste ground two persons, during that time came up to him, and each handed to him a closed packet containing money wrapped up in pieces of paper, upon which were written the names of horses running at Ascot races on that day, which were intended to be backed, the name of the backer, the amount deposited for the purpose of backing each horse, and the hour at which the race was to be run at Ascot. The persons who handed the said packets to Hicks were either the backers themselves or their authorized agents in that behalf. Such packets containing money were delivered by the said persons respectively, and were received by Hicks on an agreement that if the horse named therein won the race named, Hicks was to pay to the said backer the amount deposited in addition to the amount won, according to the odds current against such horse at starting.

While Hicks was in Nelson-passage or on the waste ground Miss Davis, who was the daughter of the appellant, and lived at home at the tavern, came to him three times at intervals and received from him a number of the said packets, which she brought into the tavern either by the back or the side door.

At 3 p.m. on the same day a search warrant was executed at the tavern. The appellant was found behind the bar, and Hicks was found on the licensed premises in the public bar among the ordinary customers. The appellant had in front of him a glass containing money, and also a paper containing a list of names known as a "paying-out sheet" (relating to other days than the 20th of June), and used in connection with betting on horse racing. A number of papers forming part of the packets which had been given to Hicks in Nelson-passage and on the waste ground were also found in an envelope in a drawer in the public bar near where the appellant was. The said packets, which had contained money as well as the said papers, had been opened and their contents brought to the knowledge of the appellant.

Hicks was apprehended and charged under the Betting Act, 1853, with using the waste ground and Nelson-passage for the purposes of betting, and was convicted by the stipendiary magistrate, and fined £20 and costs. The fine and costs were paid, and there was no appeal.

Davis was charged under section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872, with suffering his house to be used in contravention of the Betting Act. He also was convicted and fined by the stipendiary magistrate.

He appealed against that conviction to the court of quarter sessions.

The case stated that Hicks was a person using the house, and that Miss Davis acted in the aforesaid matters for and on behalf of Hicks; and they were the persons who were alleged to have used the house in contravention of the Betting Act.

The case further stated that Nelson-passage and the waste ground were resorted to, and the packets and the money were received there by Hicks, and conveyed thence by Miss Davis, as his agent and on his behalf, into the tavern, for the express purpose of endeavouring to evade the provisions of the Betting Act, and with the knowledge and connivance of the appellant, who was throughout aiding and abetting Hicks and Miss Davis, and who suffered his house to be used to receive the said packets, well knowing that the said packets were brought into his house on behalf of Hicks, and that they contained money which was received by Hicks as the consideration for an assurance to pay thereafter money on a contingency relating to horse racing. None of the persons from whom the said packets were received were proved to have been persons resorting to the licensed premises. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the Licensing Act, 1872, and the Betting Act, 1853, were not contravened unless the persons with whom the bets were made actually resorted to the house or other place alleged to have been kept or used, or unless the money received by or on behalf of the keeper or persons using such house or other place was actually received at such house or other place, and not merely carried there after having been originally received elsewhere. The recorder overruled these contentions, and dismissed the appeal.

By section 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872, "If any licensed person . . . opens, keeps, or uses, or suffers his house to be opened, kept, or used in contravention of the Act of the sixteenth and seventeeth years of the reign of her present Majesty, chapter one hundred and nineteen, intitnled 'an Act for the suppression of Betting-houses,' he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding, for the first offence, ten pounds, and not exceeding, for the second and any subsequent offence, twenty pounds." By section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by or acting for or on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management, or in any manner conducting the business thereof, betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of, or relating to, any horse race, or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise, or as or for the consideration for securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency as aforesaid." By section 3, "Any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room, or other place, or a person using the same, shall open, keep, or use the same for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned, or either of them; and any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, room, office, or other place, shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them; and any person having the care or management of, or in any manner assisting in conducting, the business of any house, office, room, or place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or either of them; shall on summary conviction thereof" be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds.

Hugo Young, for the appellant.—The house was not a recognised place for the purposes of betting. The betting took place and the money was received away from the house. The user of the house took place after the betting was all over.

Poland, Q.C. (Russell Griffiths with him), in support of the conviction.—The appellant suffered his house to be used as a betting office. The nearness of the passage and the waste ground must be taken into consideration. There was a continuing receipt of the money, which lasted till the packets were opened in the house. The facts are sufficiently found against the appellant to warrant the conviction.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I have come to the conclusion that this conviction must be set aside, though I have been reluctant to do so, as the result will be that it can be said there has been a deliberate attempt to evade the Act, scarcely disguised, and yet successful. It is clear that the case must fail unless it can be shown that Hicks received the money in Davis's house with Davis's knowledge and connivance; otherwise it cannot be said that Davis suffered his house to be used for the purpose of the money being so received. No doubt there was an arrangement between them that the money which Hicks received in the paper packets on the waste piece of land should be brought into Davis's house, and when the betting was over Hicks went into the house and opened the packets. But it is impossible to say that this was a receipt of the money by him in the house. The case does not come within the Act, and the conviction cannot be supported.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question is not whether the appellant has tried to evade the law, but whether he has succeeded in keeping himself outside the Act. The offence with which he is charged is that he suffered his house to be used for the purposes of betting. But the bets were made and the money was received, not in the house, but outside of it. Mr. Poland contended that there was a continuing receipt which was not completed till Hicks came into the house and opened the packets. But I am of opinion that there is no such thing as a continuing receipt, and that the appellant is not liable to be convicted on this charge.

Conviction quashed.

LAW GUARANTEE AND TRUST SOCIETY (LIMITED) AND HUNTER v. GOVERNOR AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Banker—Bank of England—Registration of holders of Consols—Joint tenants—Tenants in common—5 & 6 W. & M. c. 20, s. 19—National Debt Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 71), ss. 1, 22.

A transfer of stock into the joint names of a corporation and an individual creates a tenancy in common, and not a joint tenancy, and therefore, by virtue of sections 1 and 22 of the National Debt Act, 1870, the Bank of England is under no obligation to register such transfer.

Case tried before Mathew, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff Hunter was the surviving trustee of a trust estate of which a certain sum of Consols formed part. Hunter had appointed the Law Guarantee and Trust Society to be a trustee in the place of one Power, deceased, and by the deed of appointment agreed to transfer the said sum of Consols standing in the defendants' books in his own name into the joint names of himself and the plaintiff company.

The action was brought for a mandamus directing the defendants to register the transfer, which they refused to do, on the ground that, under 5 & 6 W. & M. c. 20, s. 19, and the National Debt Act, 1870, ss. 1, 22, they were not bound to register a corporation and an individual as joint owners of stock.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14.—MATHEW, J.—This was an action brought by the Law Guarantee and Trust Society (Limited) and John Hunter for a mandamus requiring the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to register a transfer of stock made to the co-plaintiffs jointly. The defendants refused to do so, on the ground that they were not bound to register a corporation and an individual as joint owners of stock.

It was admitted by the learned counsel on both sides that the practice of the Bank of England, as custodian for the Government of the records of the different funds which form the National Debt, has always been to register only absolute owners of stock, and in cases of joint ownership to treat the owners as joint tenants, and to deal with them as having the legal estate, to use old phraseology, in the property transferred to them of which they claim registration. This practice, it was said, probably had its origin in the difficulties attending the creation of limited and successive interests in personal property. The usual course was to interpose trustees, and the bank dealt with trustees as having the legal estate, and was thus exonerated from having any regard to the subordinate interests which the trustees were brought into existence to protect.

It was said that this course of business was recognized by the courts of law, and the case of Crossfield v. Such was referred to. That case certainly shows that the Bank of England is supposed to deal only with the legal estate, and that in a case where stock is registered in joint names the owners held the stock as joint tenants with the ordinary right of survivorship, and the bank may safely deal with the survivor as representing the whole interest in the stock. It was further said that in the National Debt Act of 1870, which now regulates the operations of the Bank with respect to holders of stock, there is no indication of any intention on the part of the Legislature that the defendants shall deal with any but the legal owners of the stock registered, while it expressly exonerates them from having regard to trusts of any kind.

Such being the practice and such the effect of the statute, it was submitted, on the part of the defendants, that the result was that the bank was not bound to register a transfer of stock to persons as tenants in common.

It was argued that the effect of such a transfer, if the bank could be called on to register it, would be to impose on the bank the obligation of ascertaining what the interests in the stock were—in other words, to enter upon such an investigation as it is expressly exonerated from making by the provision of the statute which relieves the bank from the necessity of following trusts. Tenants in common, it was said, do not necessarily have equal interests in the stock of which they are tenants in common, and upon registration the bank would have imposed on it the duty of ascertaining the share of each tenant in common, and at each devolution of the property a similar investigation might have to be held.

All this appeared to be in a great measure conceded by the counsel for the plaintiffs; but it was asked, What was the practical difficulty of the bank in the present case? Here was a transfer to this trust company and the co-plaintiff which purported to be a transfer to the two jointly. Why should the bank refuse to register such a transfer any more than one in which the transferees were individuals? The object of the transfer was plain, and any man of business would know what was intended—viz., that the individual should be empowered to act as trustee during his lifetime, and that on his death the whole interest should pass to the company. What difficulty, then, need there be? Why was this technical obstacle presented to what would seem to be a very convenient course of dealing with the stock?

The answer of the counsel for the defendants was, What you call a transfer to the company and the co-plaintiff does not operate to create a joint tenancy, because it is impossible to create a joint tenancy between a company and an individual. Therefore, what you ask the bank to do is to recognize a tenancy in common between owners of stock, and this the bank has never been required to do, and, for the reasons which have been given, ought not to be required to do.

To establish this position recourse was had to ancient law. It was pointed out by the learned counsel for the defendants that unquestionably in the case of real estate an assignment of property to an individual and a corporation would not create a joint tenancy, but a tenancy in common. From Coke upon Littleton, 190a, William's Saunders, vol. ii., pt. 2, p. 318, note 4, Blackstone's Commentaries, and the other ancient text writers which were cited, it no doubt appears that an attempt to create a joint tenancy in a corporation and an individual must fail, for two reasons. In the first place the grantees take in different capacities. The grant to the corporation is a grant to the corporation and its successors; the grant to an individual is a grant to the individual and his heirs; and those two estates cannot be blended in the manner necessary for the creation of a joint tenancy.

Further, there cannot be a right of survivorship between the grantees, and this right is an indispensable incident of a joint tenancy. The further proposition was to my mind satisfactorily made out, that these rules embrace the cases of personal chattels and chose in action. The case cited from Rolle's Abridgment appeared to be a direct authority on the point.

These propositions were not controverted by the learned counsel for the plaintiff. They merely sought to cast ridicule upon the conduct of the bank in adhering to rules which they referred to as "obsolete" and "old fashioned," and against which they invoked the robust common sense of modern times. "True," they said, "there may be these old rules; but the court ought to look to the substance of this transaction. The manifest intention here is to create a joint tenancy, and the court ought to give effect to that manifest intention." I by no means say that it would be beyond the resources of conveyancing to devise a form of assignment which would have this effect, but the plan adopted here is a simple transfer to the company and the co-plaintiff.

It is said that, as the transferees are in fact trustees, a transfer in this simple form is sufficient indication that they are intended to hold the stock as joint tenants.

But in the face of the statute, which expressly says that the bank is not to pay attention to the fact that holders of stock are trustees, I do not think that the bank is bound to have regard to the element of trusteeship at all, and I think that if the bank registered a transfer into the names of trustees under such circumstances it would be establishing a precedent, and that the next step might be to call upon it to register such transfers where the holders were beneficiaries and not merely trustees.

I have, therefore, to consider what the position of the bank would be, supposing a tenancy in common in stock to be created between this company and this individual. I am not satisfied that the bank would be safe without investigating what share each of the tenants in common had when this original transfer was registered; nor do I think that the bank would be safe when any subsequent devolution of the property took place without ascertaining how the shares went—a difficult investigation. In the case of a joint tenancy a death, as I have already pointed out, creates no difficulty. The bank is entitled to treat the survivor as absolute owner. I am asked now to say that the bank ought to depart from what is conceded to be its established practice in these matters—ought to go from old ways to new ways. I feel that the case is one which requires the utmost judicial caution. I have to bear in mind the enormous interests with which the bank has to deal, and the serious liabilities that may be incurred if there be any departure from the ordinary method of dealing with stock.

I do not think that Sir Horace Davey succeeded in pointing out the exact difficulty which might arise in case the bank permitted this transfer. But I have to deal, not with probabilities merely, but with possibilities in this case, and I cannot avoid the apprehension that if, for instance, an individual who was a tenant in common of stock under a transfer to a company and himself as trustees was minded to commit a breach of trust, the bank might be placed in a position of some difficulty. Suppose, for example, that an assignment were made by such a person of his share of the trust estate, I by no means say that it would be impossible to extricate the bank from the conflicting claims that might be made upon it in such a case. Probably the resources of the court would be found extensive enough, by interpleader or otherwise, ultimately to relieve the Bank of England from the necessity of taking part in the proceedings; but before that point was reached there might be troublesome and difficult investigation, and I do not see that the burden of such an investigation ought to be cast upon the Bank of England.

I therefore do not feel at liberty to grant this mandamus. At the same time, what is proposed to be done by the plaintiff in this case would seem to be highly convenient and a fair transaction, and I regret that there should be this technical difficulty in the way. While this technical difficulty exists the court must give effect to it. It can only be removed by the intervention of the Legislature. My judgment is, therefore, for the defendants, with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

MARSH v. ESTCOURT. (a.)

Election law—County elector—Occupation as householder or by virtue of service—Payment of rates—Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), ss. 7, 19—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 32—Representation of People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), ss. 2, 3—Registration Act, 1885, Form (D), No. 1, Division 1—County Electors Act, 1888 (51 Vict. c. 10), s. 2, sub-section 1.

Certain labourers resided in cottages situated on the farms of their employers; they were permitted, but not required, to live in the cottages, on condition that they were to give up possession when their employment ceased, and the rent was either calculated in their wages or was reduced in consequence of their employment. The rates for the cottages were paid by the farmers who employed them, but the names of the labourers appeared in the rate-book as occupiers. They claimed to be registered in Division 1 of the Registration Act, 1885, as parliamentary voters in respect of their occupation, and to be enrolled as burgesses.

Held, that the facts showed an occupation by the claimants as householders, and not by virtue of service; that it was not necessary for the claimants to actually pay or tender the rates in accordance with section 32 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882; that the claimants possessed a burgess qualification, and were therefore entitled to be registered as both parliamentary and county electors.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the Isle of Wight.

Charles Chiverton and fifty-seven other agricultural labourers claimed to be placed on Division 1 of the occupiers' list as parliamentary voters and county electors. Each of them occupied a cottage on a farm, but were not required to do so by the farmers who employed them. They were simply allowed to reside there under verbal agreements, by which they were to pay a reduced rent, or were to have the rent deducted from their wages, and were to give up possession as soon as their employment ceased.

All the claimants had occupied for the qualifying period, but none of them had personally paid any rates. The cottages were rated with the farms and the rates paid by the farmers; but the names of the labourers were inserted in the rate-book as occupiers of the cottages on the farms.

The revising barrister placed the claimants in Division 2 of the occupiers' list as parliamentary voters qualified in respect of occupation "by virtue of office, service, or employment" under section 3 of the Representation of the People Act, 1884. If he was wrong the names were to be transferred to Division 1.

R. S. Wright, for the appellant.—Smith v. Overseers of Seghill, 23 W. R. 745, L. R. 10 Q. B. 422, which was decided upon the authority of Hughes v. Overseers of Chatham, 5 Man. & G. 54, is an authority for showing that the claimants occupied their cottages, not as servants, but as householders. They are also clearly entitled to the burgess qualification for the election of county authorities under section 2, sub-section 1, of the County Electors Act, 1888.

William Graham, for the respondent.—Section 2, sub-section 1, of the County Electors Act, 1888, refers to section 9, sub-section 2, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which must be read with section 32 of the same Act. The effect of section 32 is to repeal former provisions, such as those contained in section 19 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, which makes it immaterial whether the occupier himself pays the rates or the owner, because section 32 makes it clearly incumbent upon the occupier either to pay or to tender the rate himself, and this the present claimants have not done. Besides this, the facts show that the claimants occupied their houses by virtue of their employment, because as soon as the employment ceased they were under the necessity of giving up their houses; and in M'Lean v. Pritchard, 36 W. R. 508, 20 Q. B. D. 285, it was held that the occupation franchise by virtue of service does not qualify for the municipal franchise.

R. S. Wright, in reply.—There is no ground for suggesting that it is necessary for the occupier to pay his rates himself. By section 3 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, owners are entitled to make agreements with the overseers to pay all the rates of certain properties and to receive 25 per cent. commission for so doing. By section 4 vestries are enabled to order owners to be rated instead of occupiers; and by section

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

7 the payment of rates by owners is made equivalent to payment by occupiers for the purpose of any qualification or franchise. By section 19 the overseers are directed in every case to enter the name of the occupier in the occupiers' column in the rate-book, and it is enacted that such occupier shall be deemed to be duly rated for any qualification and franchise as aforesaid. The only question of importance, therefore, is whether the rates have been paid, and not by whom. In Smith v. Overseers of Seghill it was decided that section 19 was of general application, and this was declared to be the law in section 14 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act, 1878, which was passed for the purpose of making the matter clear. The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, is merely a consolidation Act, and itself expressly applies the Act of 1868 in section 147, and the Act of 1878 in sections 44, 45, and 47. It cannot, therefore, have been intended to repeal section 19 of the Act of 1878, which, it is submitted, is entirely consistent with its provisions. The operation of section 32 is confined to cases in which the landlord is not rated or has not paid the rates, and in which, therefore, the tenant is properly allowed to pay or tender the rates himself in order that his name may appear on the rate-book.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. No doubt the court ought to be slow to hold that any portion of a statute is superfluous or has been introduced per incuriam. But I think that if it were necessary to come to this conclusion in this case the court would be well warranted in doing so. We cannot be blind to the fact that the uniform tendency of recent legislation has been to recognize the occupier of land as a person on whom the burden of taxation is sure to fall, in part at least, whether actually or in the shape of increased rent, and therefore to provide him with the means of having his name placed on the rate-book in order that it may in due course appear in the list of occupiers published by the overseers. Now the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, is a measure the main object of which is the consolidation of prior enactments relating to municipal corporations. It deals incidentally, but only incidentally, with the municipal franchise. It would be strange indeed in my opinion that a section of this measure, a section which repeats a provision contained in a previous Act, should have the effect of reviving personal payment of rates as a necessary qualification for the municipal franchise. Such personal payment is not necessary as regards the parliamentary franchise, and if this Act has the effect which has been contended for, then this Act must be supposed to repeal enactments, which it purports merely to consolidate with amendments, and thus, under the guise of an amendment not specified as such, to go back upon political history, and to deal with the franchise in a manner wholly contrary to the well-ascertained spirit of recent legislation. As the Act was introduced in order to simplify the existing law, it would be more natural to regard the 32nd section as hastily adopted in forgetfulness of the exact state of the existing law than to suppose that the Legislature really intended to revert to a limitation which it had deliberately abolished.

But the learned counsel for the appellant has removed the difficulty by pointing out that the section has still a sphere of operation. If the name of the tenant does not appear in the rate-book as occupier, the result to the tenant may in some cases be disfranchisement. This section comes to his rescue, and enables him, if his landlord is not rated or has not paid the rates, himself to pay or tender the amount due to the overseers, and so to entitle himself to have his name entered on the rate-book as occupier. The section is not therefore superfluous. It has a specific effect. An identical provision is to be found in the 30th section of the Reform Act of 1832. It might, indeed, be necessary to construe the same words in the subsequent Act differently, if subsequent legislation had shown an intention that they should be so construed; but here subsequent legislation has shown no such intention.

The other point admits of no doubt. In the cases referred to by the learned counsel for the respondent the occupation was admitted to be occupation by virtue of service. Here the labourers were not required to reside in the cottages, but were allowed to reside in them as a privilege. It would be an abuse of language to call residence under such conditions occupation by virtue of service.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., and MATHEW, J., concurred.

Probate—Administration—Grant to committee of lunatic—Security.

An administratrix became a lunatic, and was so found by inquisition. £11,150, part of the estate, had been paid into the Chancery Division, but an administrator was required to receive the remainder, £850, due on a mortgage. On the application of the committee for administration for the use and benefit of the lunatic, the court allowed the security to be given by the sureties to be limited to twice the amount of the balance outstanding, but required the bond given by the administrator to be for the full amount.

Motion for a grant of letters of administration of the estate and effects of Annie Morris, deceased, to the committee of her daughter, a lunatic so found, for her use and benefit, and that the usual sureties to the administration bond might be dispensed with.

Annie Morris died in March, 1869, intestate, and in April of the same year letters of administration to her estate were taken out by her daughter. In November, 1872, the daughter became insane, and was so found by inquisition, and Mr. Banner was appointed committee of her estate. The value of the estate was £12,000, of which £11,150 had been paid into the Chancery Division. The remaining £850 consisted of a mortgage about to be paid off, and the grant of administration was required in order to give a proper discharge.

Middleton, in support of the motion.—The committee has given security to the Chancery Division for the amount paid in there.

BUTT, J., allowed the security to be given by the sureties to be limited to £1,700, twice the amount of the balance outstanding, but required the administrator to give a bond for the whole amount.

WHITAKER v. KERSHAW. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Security for costs—Married woman—Separate estate restrained from anticipation—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 15.

The fact that an appellant is a married woman having only separate estate subject to a restraint on anticipation, is a special circumstance which will induce the Court of Appeal to require such appellant to give security for the costs of the appeal.

Original application.

This was an application by the respondent to an appeal, that the appellant, a married woman, might be ordered to give security for the costs of the appeal. The appellant was a defendant in an action in which the present applicant was plaintiff, and at the trial, judgment had been entered against the defendant with a direction that execution thereon be limited to separate property of the defendant not subject to a restraint on anticipation, as in the form prescribed in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120.

The defendant's solicitors had given the plaintiff notice that the defendant had no separate estate except what she was restrained from anticipating. The defendant had given notice of appeal from the judgment of the court below.

Upfohn, for the plaintiff, submitted that the defendant, under the circumstances, should be required to give security for the costs of the appeal.

Edward Ford, for the defendant, the appellant.—There is no evidence of the appellant's inability to pay costs; the plaintiff has not shown that the defendant is unable to pay the costs. There might be ample means to pay the costs out of arrears of income. The fact that the defendant is unwilling to pay the costs is not a sufficient ground for requiring security to be given. Weldon v. Maples, 36 W. R. 154, 20 Q. B. D. 331, is distinguishable, as there the appellant in her affidavit declared her intention of not paying any costs if unsuccessful, and the case was treated by the court as being a threatened abuse by the appellant of the process of the court.

COTTON, L.J.—I think that the appellant ought to be required to give security for costs. It is not correct to say that the rule of the court is that security for costs will never be ordered unless it be shown that the appellant is unable to pay. The question we have to consider in this case is whether there is any property of the appellant's against which the respondent, if successful, can enforce the payment of his costs. The appellant is a married woman who only has separate estate subject to a restraint on anticipation. The Married Women's Property Act enables her to sue without a next friend, but as she has no property against which the respondent, if successful, can enforce payment of his costs, that fact constitutes a special circumstance, and the appellant must give security for the costs of her appeal.

LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ., concurred.

Security to the amount of £30 ordered to be given.

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Assignment of debtor's property for benefit of creditors generally—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (a) (b).

On the 22nd of November the debtor, at the instance of his creditors, gave by letter an authority to an auctioneer whom he had instructed to sell certain furniture and effects, which constituted practically the whole of his property, to pay the proceeds of sale into a bank to the joint account of certain persons, who were to hold it for the benefit of his creditors.

Held (reversing the decision of the Divisional Court, ante, p. 368), that this was not an act of bankruptcy within section 4, sub-section 1 (a), since the conveyance or assignment there mentioned must be a formal conveyance or assignment by deed, and did not include any dealing with the property by agreement or declaration of trust.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court in Bankruptcy (Cave and A. L. Smith, JJ.), reported ante, p. 368.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below, and it is sufficient here to state that in 1886 the bankrupt had consulted Messrs. May, Sykes, & Batten as to a settlement with his creditors, and had authorized them to sell certain property for him. This having come to the ears of his creditors, Mr. Jones, who acted for them, informed Messrs. May that, unless the proceeds of sale were retained for the benefit of the creditors, he should take proceedings in bankruptcy. Thereupon, on November 22, 1886, the bankrupt wrote to Mr. Redway, an auctioneer, whom he had directed to sell his furniture and effects, a letter in the following terms:—"Sir, I hereby authorize you to retain the proceeds of my furniture and effects, and to pay the same into the Wilts and Dorset Bank at Swindon, in the names of Messrs. May, Sykes, & Batten and yourself." The same day Messrs. May wrote to Mr. Jones stating that it had been arranged that all moneys received from the sale should be retained for the benefit of the creditors, and should be paid into the Wilts and Dorset Bank in the names of the firm and Mr. Redway.

On December 4, 1886, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt, the act of bankruptcy on which it was founded being stated to have been committed on December 3, but the county court judge held that the letter of November 22 constituted an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and therefore he only allowed the solicitors costs up to that date. Messrs. May appealed, but the Divisional Court upheld the decision of the county court judge. Messrs. May, Sykes, & Batten appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 25.—The following judgments were delivered:—

Lord Esher, M.R.—The point in this case arises on the application by the trustee of a bankrupt against a firm of solicitors to recover back a sum of money which they had received in payment of costs from the bankrupt before his bankruptcy on the ground that at the time they received the money the bankrupt had, to their knowledge, committed an act of bankruptcy. The case of the trustee, therefore, depends on that being made out. If the bankrupt had committed an act of bankruptcy there can be no question that the solicitors knew of it, since the act on which the trustee relies was done by the bankrupt with their knowledge, if not by their advice. It is immaterial whether or not the bankrupt did, after the payment, commit an act of bankruptcy, the only question now is, whether the transaction which took place on November 22 amounts to an act of bankruptcy or not. The suggestion of the trustee is, that it was an act of bankruptcy under sub-section 1 (a) of section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, in that it was an assignment of the debtor's property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors. That transaction was, no doubt, fully known to the solicitors who were acting for the debtor. At that time the debtor had not put the whole of his property into the hands of the auctioneer, but he came to an agreement that certain persons should take and sell his property, and that the proceeds of sale should be paid into a bank for distribution among his creditors. This action on his part was forced upon him by the threats of his creditors. There is no doubt that he agreed that what amounted substantially to his whole property, should be sold by the direction of other people, and that the proceeds of sale should be held for distribution among his creditors. Does such an agreement amount to an act of bankruptcy? Taking it to be an agreement to realize all his property and to divide the proceeds among all his creditors, I do not think that it can be contended that it was done with intent to defeat or delay the creditors or that it is fraudulent on that ground. But does it fall within the sub-section? Is it a conveyance or assignment of the debtor's property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally? I think that the words of the sub-section must be construed according to the known acceptance of the terms used in it in bankruptcy law before the Act was passed. A conveyance is a well known term applicable to real property, and I think the meaning of an assignment is equally well settled. Where a man has executed a deed by which he transfers his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors, that is such an assignment as the section contemplates. I do not think that any dealing with the property of a debtor by means of a declaration of trust, or an agreement, or by anything short of an absolute assignment by deed, is an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of sub-section 1 (a). The reason why the sub-section was put in seems to me to be this. By the old law an assignment by a man of all his property was evidence of a fraud on the bankruptcy laws, and the question as to the intention of the debtor had to be left to the jury. Now, in order to avoid any such inquiry, which was generally futile if the assignment was substantially of all the property of the debtor, the mere fact of such an assignment is made at once, without any inquiry into the debtor's intentions, an act of bankruptcy. The assignment must be of all, or substantially all, the debtor's property in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy. I do not think that an assignment of part would be within the sub-section.

This agreement, therefore, does not, in my opinion, amount to an act of bankruptcy, and therefore I think that the trustee has failed to make out his title to this money. I am unable, therefore, to agree with the decision of the Divisional Court, and I think that this appeal must be allowed.

Fry, L.J.—The question whether what was done by the debtor on the 22nd of November amounted to an act of bankruptcy depends on the construction of section 4, sub-section 1 (a) (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. It was first said that the transaction was fraudulent. The question of fraud is, as has been often said, a question of fact in each case. So far from this transaction being intended to defeat or delay creditors, it was carried through at the instigation of the creditors, and for their benefit. Therefore, as a fact, there was no fraud in the transaction. Then comes the question, Was it an assignment for the benefit of creditors? Sub-section 1 (a) deals only with a conveyance or assignment of property to trustees, while sub-section 1 (b) speaks of a conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer, thus showing that the Legislature had in view the fact that there were many other methods beside conveyance or assignment by which property would be transferred. There are many such modes of transfer. The debtor might declare himself to be a trustee for his creditors, he might make use of an agreement, of delivery, or of payment, to effect the same object, but none of those methods would be an assignment as contemplated by the section. It is plain, therefore, that, while property may be dealt with in many modes, the Legislature only intended to make a conveyance or assignment of it an act of bankruptcy. The assignment must also be of substantially the whole property of the debtor. An assignment of part is not sufficient. Sub-section 1 (a) speaks only of the debtor's "property," sub-section 1 (b) speaks of his "property or any part thereof." Therefore, if sub-section 1 (a) had been intended to apply to an assignment of part of the debtor's property it would have been so expressed. Therefore a formal conveyance or assignment of the whole, or substantially the whole, of a debtor's property for the benefit of creditors is made an act of bankruptcy, without the necessity of any fraudulent intention on his part, but it was not intended that any other methods of dealing with property should be an act of bankruptcy unless they were fraudulent. This transaction was not a formal assignment, and was not fraudulent; therefore, it is not an act of bankruptcy, and the trustee cannot succeed.

Lopes, L.J.—I agree. I do not think this transaction was an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of section 4, sub-section 1 (a) or (b). I think sub-section 1 (a) meant to refer only to all, or substantially all, the bankrupt's property, and the words conveyance or assignment there used are words of art meaning instruments under seal which actually transfer the legal or equitable interest in the property. Sub-section 1 (b) relates only to acts which are fraudulent, being for the purpose of delaying or defeating the creditors, and this transaction is manifestly not within it. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

HOPKINS v. SMETHWICK LOCAL BOARD. (a.)

Local government — Local board — Building without approval of board — Demolition — Notice — Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 158.

A local board cannot, under section 158 of the Public Health Act, 1875, pull down buildings erected without their approval until it has given the building owner notice of its intention to pull them down.

Cooper v. Wandsworth Local Board, 11 W. R. 646, 14 C. B. N. S. 180, and Masters v. Pontypool Local Government Board, 9 Ch. D. 677, 27 W. R. Dig. 121, approved.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Denman and Wills, JJ.).

The action was brought for trespass on the part of the local board in pulling down certain buildings erected by the plaintiff.

In October, 1888, the plaintiff being desirous of erecting some houses on land owned by him within the district, deposited plans with the local board in obedience to the bye-laws made by them. These plans were rejected by the board, and the plaintiff substituted others which were also disapproved.

On December 19 the plaintiff, without any authority from the defendants, commenced to build. The defendants at once gave him notice that the houses were contrary to the Public Health Act and to their bye-laws, because the plans for them had not been approved, and required him to remove the buildings within forty-eight hours. No notice was taken of this, and the board then took out two summonses against the plaintiff under which he was fined by the justices for obstructing the highway by his scaffolding and for building without the plans having been approved by the board.

On January 11 a resolution was passed by the board to pull down the buildings, and on January 12, without any notice being given to the plaintiff, the surveyor to the board came with some other men on to the premises and pulled down the buildings. Pollock, B., at the trial, entered judgment for the defendants, but the Divisional Court set this aside and entered judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that, according to Cooper v. Wandsworth Local Board, 11 W. R. 646, 14 C. B. N. S. 180, the defendants ought to have given the plaintiff notice of the resolution of January 11 before acting upon it.

The defendants appealed.

By section 158 of the Public Health Act, 1875, where a notice, plan, or description of any work is required by any bye-law made by an urban authority to be laid before that authority, the urban authority shall within one month after the same has been delivered or sent to their surveyor or clerk signify in writing their approval or disapproval of the intended work to the person proposing to execute the same, and if the work is commenced after such notice of disapproval or before the expiration of such month without such approval, and is in any respect not in conformity with any bye-law of the urban authority, the urban authority may cause so much of the work as has been executed to be pulled down or removed.

By the bye-laws made by the local board:—

"22. Every person who shall intend to erect any new works or buildings shall give a fortnight's notice to the local board of such intention by writing delivered to the local surveyor or left at his office, and shall at the same time leave or cause to be left at the said office detail plans and sections of every floor of such intended new building drawn to a scale of not less than 1in. to every 8ft., showing the position, form, and dimensions of the several parts of such building, and of the water-closets, privies, &c., and all other appurtenances. Such plans and sections shall, if required, be accompanied by a description of the materials of which the building is proposed to be constructed, and of the intended mode of drainage and means of water supply. A block plan shall be left at the same time drawn to a scale of not less than 1in. to every 44ft., showing the position of the buildings and appurtenances of the properties immediately adjoining, the width and level of the street, the level of the lowest floor of the intended building, and of the yard or ground belonging thereto. The plan shall show also the proposed lines of house drainage and their size, depth, and inclination."

"33. The local board shall by their order approve or disapprove proposed new works or buildings within the times severally specified herein for the deposit of notices thereof. But if the owner or person intending to construct any new street or erect any new buildings fail to give the notice, herein required, or proceed to the execution of any of the works before the expiration of such notice without the approval of the local board, or if any owner or person shall construct, or cause to be constructed, any works or do any act, or omit to do any act, or comply with any requirements of the local board, or shall make any alteration in any works after they have been completed, whether in new or existing buildings, contrary to the provisions herein contained, he shall be liable for each offence to a penalty not exceeding £5, and he shall pay a further sum not exceeding 40s. for each and every day which such works shall continue or remain contrary to the said provisions; and the local board may, if they shall think fit, cause such works to be removed, altered, pulled down, or otherwise dealt with as the case may require, and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be repaid by the offender, and be recoverable from him in a summary manner as provided by the Public Health Act, 1848."

Alfred Young and Shakespeare, for the appellants.—The cases of Cooper v. Wandsworth Local Board and Masters v. Pontypool Local Government Board, 9 Ch. D. 677, 27 W. R. Dig. 121, are distinguishable, as there no communication passed between the plaintiff and defendants before the houses were pulled down. In this case the plaintiff knew that he was defying the local board, and had had notice requiring him to remove the buildings, which he had disregarded.

Jelf, Q.C., and Vachell, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the power which the local board assumed to exercise is one affecting property in a highly penal manner. To enter upon a man's premises and pull down buildings erected by him are acts of such a character that it behoves those who claim the authority to exercise such a power to show that that they have taken care to follow every necessary step in the strictest manner possible. The cases of Cooper v. Wandsworth Local Board and Masters v. Pontypool Local Board are authorities to show that, when a local board have the power, after and in consequence of the misconduct of a building owner, to enter upon his land and demolish his buildings, there is a necessary implication by the fundamental principles of justice that they must give him notice that they intend to do so, in order that he may have an opportunity of showing cause against their resolution. In the very fair argument that has been addressed to us on behalf of the appellants we were not asked to overrule those cases. We could not have done so, for, in my opinion, the principle there laid down was entirely right, and must be affirmed. Nor can they be distinguished from the present case. They seem to me exactly to apply, and, therefore, I think that we must say that the defendants, having failed to give the plaintiff notice of the resolution of the 11th of January, committed a trespass in demolishing his buildings, for which they must be held liable.

FRY, L.J.—I entirely agree. The principle of Cooper v. Wandsworth Local Board seems to me to be founded on fundamental principles of justice, and it exactly applies to the present case. It is unnecessary now to discuss the nature of the notice that must be given, since in this case it is admitted that no notice was given; but I think that some opportunity must be given to the building owner to show cause against a resolution for the demolition of his buildings.

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion the case is clearly governed by the decisions in Cooper v. Wandsworth Local Board and Masters v. Pontypool Local Board, with which I entirely agree.

Landlord and tenant — Assignment — Under-lessees— Payment of chief rent by one—Common liability— Contribution.

C. demised to M. a piece of land for 999 years, at a yearly rent of £11 7s. 8d. M. assigned by way of mortgage a part, at an apportioned rent, to A., the predecessor in title of the plaintiff, for the residue of the term, and also assigned by underlease another part, at an apportioned rent, to W., the predecessor in title of the defendants, for the residue of the term, less ten days. The defendants subsequently bought this apportioned rent from M. The plaintiff paid, under threat of distress, the whole chief rent to C., M. being insolvent, and sought to recover from the defendants a proportionate part of the rent.

Held, that no right to contribution existed, for there was no common demand to which the parties were liable, there being no one entitled to sue the defendants for their proportion of the rent.

Special case stated by consent, pursuant to order 34.

By an indenture of lease, dated the 27th of May, 1878, and made between Maria Ann Hyde Clarke, of the one part, and William John Bonnell Minor of the other part, M. A. H. Clarke demised unto Minor a plot of land at Hyde, containing 1,366 square yards, for a term of 999 years from the 29th of September, 1878, at a yearly rent of £11 7s. 8d.

By an indenture of mortgage, dated the 8th of April, 1879, and made between Minor of the one part and Reginald Samuel Adams of the other part, Minor assigned unto Adams a plot of land, containing 466 square yards (being part of the land demised by the said lease), for the residue then unexpired of the said term of 999 years, subject to the payment of the yearly rent of £3 17s. 8d., as an apportioned part of the said yearly rent of £11 7s. 8d., and to the covenants contained in the said lease, so far as the same affected the premises assigned, and subject to a proviso for redemption on payment of the sum of £500 and interest. Minor also covenanted with Adams that he, his executors, administrators, and assigns, would pay the yearly rent of £11 7s. 8d. and keep him, his executors, administrators, and assigns, indemnified from all loss arising by reason of its non-payment.

By an indenture of underlease, dated the 21st of May, 1879, Minor, in consideration of a premium of £20, demised unto Ann Whittaker a plot of land, containing 759 square yards (being other part of the land demised by the lease), for the residue of the term of 999 years, save the last ten days thereof, subject to the yearly rent of £6 6s. 6d., and covenanted with Ann Whittaker that he, his executors, administrators, and assigns, would pay the entire yearly rent of £11 7s. 8d. reserved by the lease, and keep her, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, indemnified in respect thereof.

By an indenture of the 28th of September, 1880, Minor, in consideration of the sum of £118, assigned and released unto Ann Whittaker, her executors, administrators, and assigns, the said yearly rent of £6 6s. 6d. reserved by the underlease of the 21st of May, 1879.

Minor filed a petition for the liquidation of his affairs on the 8th of February, 1878, and a composition of 2s. in the pound was accepted; and on the 17th of February, 1882, Adams entered into possession of the mortgaged premises.

The residue of the land comprised in the lease of the 27th of May, 1878, was assigned to one Brooks. This land, with some buildings erected thereon, was sufficient to satisfy a part only of the full annual rent, and the land demised to Ann Whittaker remained, and still is, entirely unbuilt upon. The land and buildings belonging to the plaintiff, who was assignee thereof from Adams by virtue of an indenture of the 2nd of August, 1887, were the only property capable of being distrained upon for the full annual rent.

The plaintiff continued in possession from the date of the assignment from Adams, and paid, under threat of distress, the whole of the chief rent of £11s. 7s. 8d., to M. A. H. Clarke.

Ann Whittaker died on the 19th of May, 1888, and the defendants were the trustees and executors of her will, and were in possession of the premises comprised in the underlease to her.

The questions submitted for the opinion of the court were:—

1. Whether the defendants, as trustees and executors of the will of Ann Whittaker, were liable to contribute any, and what, proportion of the rent reserved in the lease of the 27th of May, 1878, in respect of the portion of the plot which was demised by the underlease of the 21st of May, 1879.

2. Whether the defendants were liable, as such trustees and executors, to repay to the plaintiff any, and what, part of the sum of £28 9s. 2d., which had been paid by him under the lease of the 27th of May, 1878?

Levett (Romer, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled, on equitable grounds, to a contribution for what he has done in paying the rent for the benefit of all parties: Story's Equity Jurisprudence, s. 493. The principle of contribution exists as between underlessees: Webber v. Smith, 2 Vernon, 103. The plaintiff has paid the rent to preserve the defendant's property. This action resembles the old writ of contribution: Fitzherbert, De Nat. Brev., 9th ed., p. 162. In this case there can be no difficulty about the apportionment.

Maclean, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the defendants.—The underlessee paying the entire rent has no right against another underlessee: Hunter v. Hunt,

(a.) Reported by W. H. QUARRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

4 C. B. 300. A tenant in common has no right of action against his co-tenant for contribution for money expended in repairs: Leigh v. Dickeson, 33 W. R. 538, 15 Q. B. D. 60. No one can sue the defendants for their proportion, so there can be no right of contribution. The plaintiff must be taken to have known the liability to which his property was subject; he has only Minor to look to.

Levett, in reply.—The plaintiff is entitled as paying to save the defendants' estate; they could be ejected if he did not pay.

Chitty, J.—The plaintiff claims contribution from the defendants in respect of the payment that he, the plaintiff, has made for the rent under a lease for a term of 999 years granted in 1878. The plaintiff claims under the lessee. Adams took a mortgage from the lessee of part of the property, his security being framed in this way:—He became the assign of part of the land comprised in the lease for the whole term granted by the lease, so that, in law, he was an assign of that part of the land demised, and, consequently, Adams remained liable to the landlord for the rent that was reserved upon the lease. Adams has assigned over to the plaintiff, who stands in his place. Adams, for his protection, took the covenant from his mortgagor for the payment of the entire rent of the lease, and also a covenant for indemnity. The defendants have a title to another part of the land comprised in the same lease, their title being derived out of the lessee's interest.

The defendants, or their immediate predecessors, took an underlease; but the underlease was drawn in a different form. Instead of taking an assignment for the whole of the term granted by the original lease in the part of the land with which the defendant's predecessor was dealing, they took an underlease, and so escaped all liability for payment of the original rent; and they also, by way of precaution, took from the original lessee a covenant to pay the rent and to indemnify them against the rent. Now Minor, the original lessee, has got into difficulties and cannot pay the rent. I do not think it is material, but, on the statements of this case, it does not appear that he is discharged from payment of the rent. He remains liable, and he remains liable apparently on those covenants which I have mentioned—the covenant to pay the rent and the covenant to indemnify. But he cannot pay, and under those circumstances the landlord has distrained for the rent; and, finding he could obtain his distress best upon that part of the land which is in the plaintiff's holding, he has distrained, or threatened to distrain, which is the same thing, on the plaintiff. The plaintiff, in order to avoid the distress, has paid the entire rent reserved by the lease of 1878, and that is the payment in respect of which he demands the contribution.

Now, he does not demand contribution from a person who is liable to a common demand, because the defendants are not only not liable for the rent, but nobody can sue the defendants in respect of this supposed liability, unless it be the plaintiff; whereas, in a common demand on which two persons are liable, if one pays, then there is a right of contribution on the part of the one who makes the payment against the one who does not. But there is no authority for the proposition that has been now advanced. Co-sureties are liable to the principal demand either in the whole or in part; and, as between the co-sureties, there is not only the common law right of contribution, but there is the equitable right of contribution.

The next remarkable part of this case is, that the kind of question must, in fact, have arisen time after time during the centuries that this class of law has been known—a first demise, a sub-demise, and a sub-demise again to the second, third, fourth, fifth, or even tenth degree. If I were to assent to this principle I should have to pursue, not the first, as it were, in the series of under-lessees, but I should have to go down to the end of them. The thing is absurd.

The position of the plaintiff is unquestionably unfortunate. He has in this case got a person who stands on the same level as he himself does in respect of the demand—that is to say, the rent; but unfortunately that person cannot pay. He would have a right of contribution, and something much more, because he would have a right under the special covenants against Minor, and he need not, as against him, resort to any such device as this. But he has lost that, and he cannot get contribution from the defendants. I can find no authority to justify the plaintiff's contention; and I think I should be erring if I said there was any principle which let in this demand. The result is, that the plaintiff's case fails.

Colley v. Hart. (a.)

Patent—Action to restrain threats of legal proceedings against party infringing—Action by patentee for infringement—"Due diligence"—Discontinuance of action—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 32.

An action for infringement of a patent was commenced with due diligence, and subsequently discontinued before trial.

Held, that no right of action accrued, under section 32 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, to the party sued in the discontinued infringement action.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by Walter William Colley, a manufacturer of toilet papers, against the defendant, Morris Hart, who carried on a similar business under the style of the Patent Toilet Requisite Co., claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from issuing circulars, letters, or advertisements containing threats of proceedings against any person dealing in articles manufactured by the plaintiff in infringement, as the defendant alleged, of the defendant's patent rights.

Hart was the owner of a patent for perforated toilet rolls, and on the 15th of September, 1888, he issued a circular to the trade to the following effect:—"It has come to my knowledge that W. W. Colley, late in my employ, is offering to the trade perforated toilet rolls, which is an infringement of my patent, 1885, No. 106. I further learn that W. W. Colley is not only offering this paper in breach of my patent rights, but also that he is infringing my trade-mark, a copy of which is enclosed, and which is duly registered in pursuance of the Act. This is well known to Mr. Colley, he having been in my employ until April, 1888. His proceedings are therefore a distinct breach of my rights under both patent and trade-mark, and I think it right to inform you that I intend to commence proceedings forthwith against every person whom I find in any way dealing in any perforated toilet paper manufactured in breach of my patent rights under the above patent or under my trade-mark."

(a.) Reported by Francis T. Duka, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thereupon Colley, on the 22nd of September, 1888, issued the writ in this action, in which he claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from issuing the above circular, or any circulars, letters, or advertisements containing threats against purchasers of the articles manufactured by Colley, a declaration that the defendant's alleged trade-mark rights were null and void, and damages.

Notice of motion for injunction before the vacation judge was given on the 3rd of October, and it was ultimately ordered to stand over until the 2nd of November, when North, J., granted an interlocutory injunction. Hart thereupon on the 6th of December commenced two actions against Colley, one to restrain infringement of his patents, the other to restrain infringement of his trade-mark. The statement of claim in the threats action was delivered on the 8th of February, 1889. The statement of claim in the patent action was delivered on the 13th of May, 1889, and the defence in that action on the 27th of May. On the 6th of November Hart discovered, by means of inspection obtained in the threats action, that Colley's manufactures did not infringe his patent, and he accordingly served notice of discontinuance of the patent action, and paid the costs. The threats action (Colley v. Hart) and the trade-marks action (Hart v. Colley) now came on for trial. The latter is reported ante, p. 440.

NORTH, J. [His lordship read the circular letter of the 15th of September, 1886, set out above, and continued:—].—I have at present no evidence that this was published maliciously, and hence there is no right of action in respect of it, unless it is given by the 32nd section of the Patent Act, but I think that section would have given a right of action but for the proviso in it. Now the proviso to section 32 is:—"That this section shall not apply if the person making such threats with due diligence commences and prosecutes an action for infringement of his patent." The action instituted on the 6th of December, 1888, by Hart against Colley clearly was an action for infringement, and, if commenced and prosecuted with due diligence, prevents any right of action under section 32. It is suggested in this case that this action for infringement was not such an action. The first question is whether it was commenced with due diligence. It is said that the issue of the writ on the 6th of December was not commencing with due diligence, and Herrburger v. Squire is cited, in support of that view, but before dealing with that case I am of opinion that no precise period can be fixed within which an action must be commenced. The circumstances must decide in each case. In Herrburger v. Squire there were threats in 1885 not of any importance, but on the 21st of October, 1886, a threat was published to the trade, and Charles, J., says (p. 594, 5 Rep. Pat. Cas.):—"At the time he issued that circular he must have become aware, I suppose, that the plaintiffs, amongst other persons, were selling the damper with the arrangement of the arm attached to the body of the damper, but he took no step. He states that he intends to take legal proceedings, but he took none, and a whole year passed away." Now Charles, J., in his judgment, acts on the fact that the party had known of the state of things existing for a year—that there had been threats issued for a year, in which no proceedings were taken. Then another advertisement was issued, and he goes on to say:—"What did the defendant do? All September passed, and nothing was done. All October passed, and nothing was done by the defendant. But something was done by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs, on the 12th of October, issued their writ under section 32. Even then the defendant did nothing, and it was not until the 14th of November that he instituted two actions against two persons who had purchased the plaintiffs' check-action with this armed damper, and then, in due time, in December, he counter-claimed." Then the judge asks whether that is due diligence, and he says, "I cannot say so." Then he proceeds: "He intended to do it in 1886, but he does absolutely nothing. I must assume that he must have known that sales were going on of these armed dampers in England; otherwise I do not see why he should have issued the circular of October 21, 1886. He does nothing for nearly a twelvemonth. At the end of the twelve months, in September, 1887, he returns to the charge, and he gives another notice in the Music Trades Journal that he intends to commence an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice against anyone infringing, but he does nothing, and it is not until more than a month after the plaintiffs have commenced their action under section 32 that he does institute two actions against two other persons for the infringement of his patent. I cannot think that that is due diligence, and therefore I do not think that he has brought himself within the proviso." His lordship further added: "He has not, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, in my opinion, with due diligence commenced and prosecuted an action for infringement of his patent." Of course, the facts in this case differ from the facts in the one just cited, but I cannot find any principle in it which will assist me in the present case, for the judge relied on the fact that for fourteen months infringement had being going on to the knowledge of the party who took no proceedings. Here it is totally different.

I find great difficulty in fixing the time within which an action must be brought to be commenced with due diligence. For instance, a man may get a good and valuable patent in 1885, which is certain to be infringed. In 1886 he finds A. infringing, warns him by letter which, according to the cases, would be a threat. A. receives it, and submits unconditionally, and therefore no proceedings are taken. In 1887 the patentee finds B. infringing, and he is about to take proceedings against him, but B. dies insolvent before action. In 1888 he finds C. infringing, and C. submits. In 1889 D. infringes, and the patentee writes a warning letter to him. D. commences at once an action for threats, and the patentee immediately issues his writ for infringement. D. says you are too late, these threats having been going on for three years; for no less than three years you have known that that there were infringers, and you have brought no action." In such a case I cannot doubt for a moment that the action commenced against D. would be commenced in due time. This shows how impossible it is to attempt to fix any definite time within which such an action must be brought.

Now, the only case that I know of (except Herrburger v. Squire) in which anything is laid down upon the question of time is Challender v. Royle. Of course, the learned judges do not lay down any rule applicable to all cases, and I refer to their remarks by way of illustration. Cotton, L.J., says: "Was the action commenced with due diligence? Mr. Bousfield contended that the action must be commenced with due diligence from the time when the defendant first knew that the plaintiff was doing what the defendant alleges to be an infringement. I cannot agree with that view. In my opinion, an action must be held to be commenced with due diligence if commenced within a reasonable time after the threats have been made, for the threats are the only matter complained of. Now, assuming the threats to have been made in March, the action against the Manchester Plumbing Co. was, in my opinion, commenced with due diligence after the time when the defendant first issued those threats; for I think that the interval between March and June is not an unreasonable time for a man to take to consider whether he should bring an action in respect of a supposed infringement of his patent." That is to say, three months is a reasonable time to take. Now, I do not apply that as deciding this case, but I give it as an illustration to show what Cotton, L.J., thought, under the circumstances, would be a reasonable time within which an action might be brought. If that were a test to be applied to the present case, I find this, that threats having been uttered on the 15th of September, the action was commenced on the 6th of December—that is, within three months; it is within the time Cotton, L.J., thought a reasonable time.

Again it is evident, and remarks have been made about it by judges from time to time, what the inconvenience is of having patent litigation doubled by having not only an action for infringement, but also another action for threats, before another judge perhaps in a different division. In this case, therefore, there was an action for threats, instituted on the 22nd of September, 1888, by Colley against Hart. An action for infringement may be brought within a reasonable time with due diligence. As a primâ facie rule applicable to most cases, I do not think it can be said that a man is guilty of undue delay if he waits for the purpose of seeing whether he cannot combine the two subjects of action in one action—in other words, if he waits a reasonable time to have a statement of claim delivered and bring his counter-action by way of a counter-claim. In this case an interlocutory order was made in the threats action on the 2nd of November. In my opinion the defendant was justified in refraining for some time in order to see whether he could bring his claim for infringement in that action instead of commencing a new one; or, in other words, he was justified in waiting for some time, at any rate, to see what the statement of claim was, to have that delivered, and to raise his answer as to infringement by counter-claim. I find here, although the action was commenced on the 22nd of September, 1888, it was not until the 8th of February, 1889, that the statement of claim by Mr. Colley was delivered. That was two months after the commencement of Mr. Hart's action. I cannot see, therefore, that there was any delay on the part of Hart in waiting for a time to see whether he could not defend by counter-claim. When I find that the statement of claim in the threats action was not itself delivered until two months after Hart had actually brought his action for infringement, I come to the conclusion that there was not want of due diligence in commencing this action. Then the proviso requires that an action is not only to be commenced with due diligence, but it is to be prosecuted with due diligence. As regards the prosecution, I must draw a line between what did and what did not happen before the date of the discontinuance, the 7th of November, 1889. Now during that time the action was going on. Is there anything to show that it was not being prosecuted with due diligence. The proceedings do take considerable time no doubt, but I find that Mr. Hart's statement of claim is delivered on the 13th of May, 1889, a long time after the issue of the writ. The defence was not put in till the 27th of May.

From then certain proceedings followed, which I do not find, down to the time of discontinuance, were in any way wanting in due diligence. It is, however, suggested that there was not due diligence in prosecuting the action from that time onward, because it was discontinued.

The action was not prosecuted after the 7th of November, because Mr. Hart discontinued it and paid the costs. Now was that discontinuance a want of due prosecution? Mr. Aston says that the proviso in section 32 means prosecuting an action down to a successful result. In the first place, the section does not say so, and I should find great difficulty in understanding it if it did. It is suggested that the section should read that he must, with due diligence, commence and prosecute and recover judgment in an action for infringement; but I do not find any words of that sort in the section. I do not believe that that was the intention, and I think it might produce a very unjust result if those words had been there.

Moreover, a failure to proceed in the action for infringement would not at all necessarily be a fair test as to whether he was justified in his threat or not. The patent might be perfectly good, and the action fail. His case might break down through infirmity of his witnesses. Or there might be serious questions whether what was done was really an infringement or not. Successive courts might hold it was, and the House of Lords, in the end, say it was not. It would be strange if the original right to utter threats is to be tested by such an action.

There are numerous cases in which a failure to succeed in an action would be a very unfair test as to whether he was justified, in an action for infringement, in making threats founded upon the fact of his having a good title. Therefore, not only do I not see my way to add such words to the section as to read it "with due diligence commence and prosecute and recover judgment in an action," but I can see that if I were to attempt to add such words to the section I might be doing something which would be a great injustice.

I hold, accordingly, that it is not essential for an action to come within the proviso that it should necessarily be prosecuted up to judgment, and, therefore, that a man may have commenced, and with due diligence prosecuted, an action within the proviso, although judgment is against him in it, and, being within the proviso, prevents there being any right of action existing under the earlier part of section 32. And notwithstanding the fact that, in the action for infringement, it had been found that the plaintiff was wrong, because there was no infringement, so that he failed in the action, in my opinion that would not the less be an action within the proviso, and prevent a cause of action for threats arising under section 32. He is exactly in the same position, by discontinuing a hopeless action before trial, as he would have been in if he had prosecuted it to trial and had then failed. As failure at the trial would not have prevented the action being one within the proviso, so, in my opinion, the discontinuance before trial does not put him in a worse position than if he had carried it to trial.

Action dismissed.

MADAME TUSSAUD & SONS (LIMITED) v. TUSSAUD. (a.)

Trade name — Company — Registration—Injunction—Name calculated to deceive—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 20.

The plaintiff company carried on an old-established business of waxwork exhibitors. The defendant, Louis Joseph Kenny Tussaud, had lately formed a company under the name of Louis Tussaud (Limited), to carry on a similar business within a short distance of the plaintiffs' exhibition. Apart from the proposed adoption of the name Louis Tussaud (Limited), there was no evidence of intention on the part of the defendant or the intended new company to deceive the public, and the prospectus of the new company stated that they had no connection with the plaintiffs. The defendant had never carried on any similar business on his own account. His only interest in the new company was that he was a large shareholder, and held a salaried post as manager and wax modeller.

Held, that the name of the new company so closely resembled that of the old company as to be calculated to deceive, and that an injunction must be granted to restrain the defendant from registering a company under that name.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from registering a new company under the name of Louis Tussaud (Limited), or any other name so nearly resembling the name of the plaintiff company as to be calculated or likely to deceive the public into the belief that the new company was the same as the plaintiff company, and from issuing advertisements, circulars, or prospectuses representing that a company was to be incorporated under the name of Louis Tussaud (Limited) or any such other name as aforesaid, and from carrying on or commencing any business similar to the business of the plaintiff company under the name of Louis Tussaud (Limited) or any such other name as aforesaid.

The plaintiffs carried on the business of waxwork modellers and exhibitors, originally founded by Madame Tussaud in 1802. The business had been carried on by members of the Tussaud family until a few years ago, when it was sold to a Mr. Poyser, by whom it was subsequently transferred to the plaintiffs. There was not at the present time any member of the Tussaud family engaged in it.

The defendant, Louis Joseph Kenny Tussaud, was the son of one of the former proprietors of the exhibition, from whom he had learned the art of modelling in wax, but he had never carried on any business of the kind on his own account. He had recently arranged for the formation of a company, to be called Louis Tussaud (Limited), to carry on the business of waxwork exhibitors on a site to be acquired in Shaftesbury-avenue. The name of the defendant, given as Louis Tussaud, appeared on the front sheet of the prospectus as general manager. The defendant was also one of the signatories of the memorandum of association. Three contracts were entered into on the formation of the company. Two of them were dated the 6th of March, 1890, and were made between one Harry Smith and the defendant, and provided for the purchase by the defendant of the proposed site of the new exhibition and the erection of the buildings. The third contract was dated the 8th of March, 1890, and was made between the defendant and a trustee for the proposed new company, and it was thereby agreed that the company should purchase the benefit of the previous agreements for £7,500, of which £5,000 was to be paid in cash and £2,500 in fully paid-up £1 shares, to be issued to the defendant or his nominees. It was further agreed that the defendant should be the manager and wax modeller of the company for seven years at a salary of £200 per annum, and should also receive five per cent. of the profits, and that he should not model in wax for any other company.

It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiffs' exhibition, though usually known as Madame Tussaud's, was also very frequently spoken of as Tussaud's only.

It also appeared that, except so far as the adoption of the name "Louis Tussaud (Limited)" might imply an intention to mislead the public, neither the defendant nor any of the directors of the new company had done anything to mislead the public; and, indeed, the prospectus of the new company stated that it was "formed for the purpose of introducing to the West End of London a new exhibition, similar in many respects to, but having no connection with, the one so long and successfully carried on in Baker-street and Marylebone-road."

The plaintiffs now moved for an interim injunction.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and Wace, for the plaintiffs.—The business proposed to be carried on by the new company is exactly similar to that carried on by the plaintiff company, and the name of the new company so closely resembles that of the plaintiff company as to be calculated to deceive. The plaintiff company are, therefore, entitled to an injunction both under section 20 of the Companies Act, 1862, and also under the general principles acted upon by the court in such cases.

They cited Hendriks v. Montagu, 30 W. R. 168, 17 Ch. D. 638; Hoby v. Grosvenor Library Co. (Limited), 28 W. R. 386; Turton v. Turton, ante, p. 22, 42 Ch. D. 128.

Hastings, Q.C., A. à B. Terrell, and H. P. Wilkinson, for the defendant.—The case falls within Turton v. Turton and not within Hendriks v. Montagu. Hendriks v. Montagu only applied where the business was to be carried on under a fancy name. Here the defendant proposes to make use of his own name. He might have carried on the business himself under that name, and he might have carried it on in partnership with others under that name, and it would make no difference that instead of doing so he formed a company to carry it on.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., in reply.

Stirling, J., stated the facts, and continued:—It appears, from the contracts entered into on the formation of the company, that the interest of the defendant in the company is twofold—(1) he is to be the recipient of 2,500 fully paid-up shares, and (2) he is to act as manager and modeller of the company, being, in that respect, the paid servant of the company, whose orders he is bound to obey. Up to the present time, so far as appears, he has not carried on any exhibition business upon his own account, or any business in connection with the plaintiffs' exhibition, except that of modeller. It cannot be doubted, as it seems to me, that the name of "Tussaud" is well known and of high reputation in connection with waxworks, and that, if another exhibition of a similar nature to the plaintiffs' were to be established in London under the defendant's name, the one would, in the ordinary course of human affairs, be likely to be confounded with the other, and visitors from the country who had heard of the plaintiffs' establishment would be likely to be misled into going to the other. If persons not bearing the name of Tussaud, and deriving no title from anyone bearing that name, were to seek to establish, under the name of Louis Tussaud, a company such as is promoted by the defendant, I think that the natural result of their carrying on business under that name would be to mislead people who were desirous of visiting the plaintiffs' exhibition into going to theirs, and that the persons so doing ought, on the principles laid down in Hendriks v. Montagu, to be restrained by an injunction similar to that granted in that case.

The question which I have to decide is whether the defendant, bearing, as he does, the name of Tussaud, is equally liable to be so restrained.

The principles on which the court acts are laid down in Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896, 904, where Turner, L.J., says:—"No man can have any right to represent his goods as the goods of another person, but in applications of this kind it must be made out that the defendant is selling his own goods as the goods of another. Where a person is selling goods under a particular name, and another person not having that name is using it, it may be presumed that he so uses it to represent the goods sold by himself as the goods of the person whose name he uses; but where the defendant sells goods under his own name, it does not follow that the defendant is selling his goods as the goods of the plaintiff. It is a question of evidence in each case whether there is a false representation or not." That statement of the law was acted on and approved of by the Court of Appeal in Turton v. Turton.

It follows from the decisions in those cases that the defendant is at perfect liberty to open on his own account and carry on in his own name an exhibition of waxworks. Further, he may take partners into his business, and carry it on under the name of Louis Tussaud & Co. Having commenced business on his own account, I apprehend that he might sell it, with the benefit of the goodwill, to third parties, and that these third parties might, if they thought fit, continue to carry on the business under the same name. They, again, might transfer the business and goodwill to a joint-stock company; and, though I do not express a final opinion to that effect, I am not prepared to say that that company might not be registered under the same name as had previously been used in connection with the business. On the other hand, I conceive it to be clear that the defendant could not, either for valuable consideration or otherwise, confer on another person the right to use the name of Tussaud in connection with a business which the defendant had never carried on and in which the defendant had no interest whatever.

Then comes the question, Can he confer this right on a person or company towards which he stands simply in the position of a paid servant? He can, no doubt, confer the right of saying that the business is under his management, but can he go to A. B. and say to him:—"I will become your servant as manager and modeller for seven years, and you shall carry on the business, which is not to be mine but yours, in my name"? Does it make any difference that, instead of going to a private individual, he invites the public to become proprietors of a business upon like terms? On this question there is some authority. In Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co., 28 W. R. 966, 14 Ch. D. 748, a person named Thorley manufactured cattle food according to a recipe which he had obtained, and sold it under the name of "Thorley's Food for Cattle." Upon his death the plaintiff succeeded to his business, and continued it, and shortly afterwards the defendant company was registered as a limited company. The articles provided that the directors were to enter into an arrangement with a brother of the plaintiff's predecessor in title, who had become acquainted with the secret of the manufacture, for the purchase of that secret and for his employment in the business of the company. The decision was not given on this simple state of facts, but James, L.J., observes on it as follows:—"The name of the company is, to my mind, a fiction. The meaning which the name of 'J. W. Thorley & Co. (Limited)' would convey to any person's mind, is that there had been a partnership of J. W. Thorley & Co., a real partnership, which had been carrying on business in the manufacture of this food for cattle, and that for some reason or other, such as we have seen constantly in our experience in this court, the partnership had been minded to convert itself into a limited company for the more convenient transaction of its business. But here J. W. Thorley was not a partner. J. W. Thorley was employed as an agent, as the manager, and J. W. Thorley's only connection with the company, quâ company, is that he had a first share in this company. To my mind that is the same thing as if somebody were to get up a brewery at Burton, finding somebody of the name of Bass, or somebody who would take the name of Bass (for there is no law to prevent a man from assuming any name he likes), and then get a company registered under the name of 'J. Bass & Co. (Limited)' or 'W. Bass & Co. (Limited),' and advertise Bass & Co.'s Pale Ale. I really can see no distinction between 'Bass & Co.'s Pale Ale,' as advertised by such a company, and 'Thorley's Food for Cattle,' advertised by the company now before us, which has procured a person of the name of Thorley to be connected with their company."

It seems to me that here, in like manner, the name of the company represents that which is not true in fact. There never has been any business carried on by Louis Tussaud under the name of Tussaud, of which he he has been the proprietor, and I think that, in accordance with the first of the two propositions laid down by Turner, L.J., it ought to be presumed, primâ facie, that the object of the defendant and the proposed company is to induce the world to believe that the business intended to be carried on is that of the plaintiffs, or a branch of it. It is said that the prospectus plainly states on the face of it that the new exhibition has no connection with the plaintiffs. That is true, and the statement would be a complete answer to a person who complained that he had been misled into taking shares in the new company on the faith that it was connected with the plaintiffs, but is it an answer to the plaintiffs' complaint, that the natural result of their intended acts will be to induce the public at large to suppose that their business is that of the plaintiffs? If the defendant had written to a Mr. Brown saying: "The business you propose to carry on will have no connection with that in the Marylebone-road," and Mr. Brown had replied, "Of course not," none the less would the defendant be liable to be restrained. I think, therefore, an injunction ought to be granted in similar terms to that in Hendriks v. Montagu—that is to say, to restrain the defendant until trial or further order from registering under the Companies Act any company to be incorporated under the name of "Louis Tussaud (Limited)," or any other name likely to mislead or deceive the public into the belief that the new company is the same as the plaintiff company, and to further restrain him in the terms of the present application.

towage services upon certain vessels of the company, and for an order that they might be paid their claims in full, and the costs of the application, out of the proceeds of sale of such vessels.

It was admitted that the services were in the nature of ordinary towage services rendered by the applicants in towing the vessels from time to time into and out of the harbour of Great Yarmouth, and the only question argued was whether or not such services were the subject of maritime lien so as to entitle the applicants to prove for their claims in full, as asked by the summons.

J. Gorell Barnes, Q.C., and L. E. Pyke, for the applicants.—Towage services give rise to a maritime lien. The case of The Isabella, 3 Hagg. Adm. 427, decided previously to the Act of 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65), must be taken as recognizing a maritime lien to arise out of towage services. In The Constancia, 10 Jur. 845, decided in 1846, claims for towage were allowed to rank along with wages and pilotage in priority to previous bottomry bonds; and in The St. Lawrence, 5 P. D. 250, 29 W. R. Dig. 199, the existence of a maritime lien for towage was admitted in argument. There are, no doubt dicta—but only dicta—to the contrary in the case of The Heinrich Bjorn, 33 W. R. 719, 34 W. R. Dig. 179, 10 P. D. 44, 11 App. Cas. 270. It is undisputed that a maritime lien has always existed for salvage, and towage is closely akin to salvage. The Court of Admiralty has often entertained claims for towage in actions of salvage: The Isabella; The Princess Alice, 3 W. Rob. 138. The object of the Act of 1840 was to extend the locality of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty within the body of a county, and the Act dealt simply with jurisdiction, and not with maritime lien, though it extended the area of the lien by extending that of the jurisdiction. Because there is no maritime lien for necessaries, it does not follow that there is none for towage, which is of recent origin: The Wataga, 5 W. R. 155, Swabey, 165.

They referred also to The General Palmer, 2 Hagg. Adm. 176, as to the existence of a lien for pilotage.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and D. L. Alexander, for the official liquidator.—There is no authority in favour of the existence of the alleged lien, and principle is against it. There is a broad distinction between towage and salvage: The Princess Alice. Towage services arise out of contract, and in general out of a contract made on land. Previously to the Act of 1840 the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in the case of a contract made on land or in the body of a county: Greenway and Baker's case, Godbolt, 275; General Iron Screw Collier Co. v. Schurmanns, 8 W. R. 732, 1 J. & H. 180; 15 Ric. 2, c. 3; 4 Co. Inst., p. 134; 1 Com. Dig., 5th ed., pp. 497, 504. Where there is no jurisdiction there can be no maritime lien. Therefore there could have been no maritime lien for towage before the Act of 1840; The Isabella was a case of salvage, and the Trinity Masters looked into the matter and thought that the services were in the nature of towage, and a sum was awarded as for towage. If the case had not been launched as one of salvage the claim could not have been entertained, The Strathnaver, 1 App. Cas. 58, 24 W. R. Dig. 281. The Act of 1840 did not create a maritime lien in a case where none existed before: The Sara, 35 W. R. 826, 12 P. D. 158; The Alexander Larsen, 1 W. Rob. 288; The Ocean, 2 W. Rob. 368, 9 Jur. 381. The cases of The Constancia and The St. Lawrence were decided at a time when it was supposed that the Act of 1840 did create a maritime lien. It is clear that the Court of Admiralty can exercise jurisdiction in rem although there is no maritime lien: The Two Ellens, 20 W. R. 592, L. R. 4 P. C. 161, 166; The Sara. The observations of the judges in The Heinrich Bjorn are not mere dicta, but form an essential part of the ratio decidendi.

Pyke replied.

KAY, J.—This is simply a question whether there is any authority for the proposition that there exists a maritime lien for services rendered to a ship, not in the nature of salvage, but in simply towing the ship. Of course, if it were towing for the purpose of salvage of the ship, nobody would hesitate to say that it must come within the principle applicable to salvage. But here it is admitted that there has been no service of that kind, but merely towage for the purpose of accelerating the speed of the ship either leaving or returning to the port.

Now, the authority bearing upon the subject is as follows:—In the case of The Heinrich Bjorn, Lord Bramwell discusses the meaning of section 6 of the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, which enacts "that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for service rendered to, or damage received by, any ship or sea-going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas at the time when the services were rendered, or damage received, or necessaries furnished, in respect of which such claim is made." That case was one in which necessaries were supplied, and the argument seems to have been that, because the Act I have just mentioned gave the High Court of Admiralty jurisdiction with respect to necessaries, therefore necessaries became the subject of maritime lien. Lord Bramwell, in answering that argument, said: "Jurisdiction is by the section given in the cases of 'towage,' and it cannot be pretended that there was any maritime lien as to that when it occurs on the high seas. It was, indeed, said it was a sort of salvage, but it certainly is not. And the Admiralty Court, I take it, would have, under the statute, jurisdiction in a case of towage where the ship had been let, and the owner was not liable." Then later on he said, "Jurisdiction as to towage was not created by the statute. It existed before with no maritime lien." Now that case came first before Sir James Hannen, 32 W. R. 279, 8 P. D. 151, and went afterwards to the Court of Appeal, by whom his decision was reversed. The judgment in the Court of Appeal (constituted of Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ.), was delivered by Fry, L.J., but in the part which I am about to read it was the judgment of them all, because, as has been pointed out, the Lord Justice (33 W. R., at p. 720) begins by saying: "This judgment is that of the Master of the Rolls, Bowen, L.J., and myself; but I should state that in that portion of it which decides that the agreement which I shall presently read is not a bottomry bond the Master of the Rolls concurs with difficulty, but he unhesitatingly agrees with the remainder of the judgment." Now, these are the words used by the whole court (p. 721), still commenting on the same 6th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65: "It has been suggested that the way in which necessaries are associated with salvage and damage implies an intention to give in respect of necessaries the same lien as existed in respect of salvage, but the argument is not satisfactory, especially when it is observed that necessaries are more closely associated with towage, which gave no lien, than with salvage or damage." Therefore I have the considered opinion of Lord Esher and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., confirmed by Lord Bramwell in the House of Lords, that towage on the high seas does not give a maritime lien. Now, it has been argued, and I agree with the argument, that this statement of the law is not altogether extra-judicial, because it was a link in the chain of reasoning on which judgments were founded. The argument was this: "The statute does not give a maritime lien for necessaries in respect of which there was admittedly no maritime lien before the statute. It is said that it does give such a lien, because the word 'necessaries' is coupled with the word 'salvage,' but it is also coupled with the word 'towage,' in respect of which there is likewise no maritime lien." I quite agree that it is a legitimate argument that this was an essential part of the ratio decidendi, and, therefore, these observations are rather more than extra-judicial dicta.

Then what authority is there on the other side? No case has been cited in which the neat point has been argued and decided whether towage did give a maritime lien either on the high seas before the Act, or within the body of a county since the Act; but three cases have been cited in which towage has no doubt been treated as if it gave a maritime lien. They are The Isabella, The Constancia, and The St. Lawrence; but in not one of those cases was the point argued. Towage was treated as though there was a maritime lien in respect of it when coupled with other things, as to which, in some of the cases, there was undoubtedly a maritime lien. That may have been because it was not worth while to insist upon the distinction, or (except in the case of The Isabella) that the towage in question was towage in the nature of salvage. In the case of The Isabella it certainly was found that the towage was not in the nature of salvage. But there, again, I cannot find that there was any distinct argument or decision on the point that towage differed from necessaries supplied to a ship on account of its being the subject of a maritime lien. Accordingly I am bound to say that the weight of authority is against this application, and that it must be refused, with costs.

Ex parte INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY. (a.)

Solicitor—Striking off roll—Right to make the application—Applicant not a client of the solicitor's—Incriminating answers given in examination in bankruptcy—Admissibility—Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65), ss. 13, 15—Rules, Part I., r. 1; Part VI., r. 3; Form V. in schedule—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 17.

An application under the Solicitors Act, 1888, s. 13, to strike the name of a solicitor off the rolls may be made by a person who has not employed the solicitor in a professional capacity. On the hearing of the application, answers given by the solicitor in the course of his public examination in bankruptcy may be used in evidence against him.

This was the argument upon a preliminary report of the committee of the Incorporated Law Society which was presented to the court for the purpose of obtaining a decision upon certain objections which had been taken on behalf of the solicitor, to the proceedings at the first hearing before the committee.

The solicitor was a bankrupt, and the application to strike him off the roll of solicitors was made by the official receiver at the instance of the Board of Trade. No person who had been a client of the solicitor's joined in the application. The charges of misconduct made by the applicant were based upon answers which the solicitor had given in the course of his public examination in bankruptcy as to dealings by him with moneys of clients. It was proposed to adduce in evidence the notes of the public examination to prove the alleged misconduct. On the hearing before the committee it was objected by counsel on behalf of the solicitor, (a) that the Board of Trade, by whose direction the official receiver made the application, is not charged with the duty of punishing solicitors, nor has the Board authority to direct the official receiver to take proceedings with that object; (b) that the duties of the official receiver, as regards the investigation of the debtor's conduct, are defined by section 69 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and do not include the making of an application to strike the debtor, if a solicitor, off the roll; and (c) that, as the debtor is bound to answer all such questions as the court may put or allow to be put to him in his public examination, his admissions cannot be used against him in a proceeding of a criminal nature not expressly authorized by the Act. The committee desired to have the opinion of the court upon these points before hearing the case. The following are the rules made under the Solicitors Act, 1888, which affect the case:—Part I., r. 1.—"An application to the committee to strike a solicitor off the roll of solicitors, or to require a solicitor to answer allegations contained in an affidavit, must be in writing under the hand of the applicant, and be sent to the registrar together with an affidavit by the applicant stating the matters of fact on which he relies in support of his application."

Form V. in the schedule to the rules, "Form of affidavit by applicant," paragraph 1.—"C. D. of ——— solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England has been employed by me in a professional capacity for the last ten years (or as the case may be)."

Part VI., r. 3.—"The forms in the schedule to these rules shall be used in all cases as far as practicable and shall be valid; but a deviation from those forms shall not by reason only of such deviation render any application, affidavit, or other document or proceedings invalid."

Hollams, for the Incorporated Law Society.

Winch, Q.C. (Stock with him), for the solicitor.—The official receiver has no locus standi in this matter; he is attempting to get the solicitor struck off the rolls on the ground of his misconduct towards another person. But the applicant must be the injured client. The official receiver cannot make the affidavit according to the form in the schedule to the rules; he cannot say, The solicitor "has been employed by me in a professional capacity." This form was made designedly; it was not intended that a mere stranger should be entitled to make the application: In re Cheslyn Hall, 4 W. R. 686. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Is it not competent for any person to inform the court that one of its officers has been convicted of felony?] Yes; but where the charge is misconduct not amounting to felony, only the person aggrieved can complain. These charges are founded on admissions made upon compulsion during the solicitor's examination in bankruptcy. These admissions cannot be used for any purpose outside the Bankruptcy Act or the Debtors Act.

They cited R. v. Scott, 4 W. R. 777; Ex parte Cossens, Buck 531.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The Act does not make any alteration as to the person who may apply; the words in section 13 are, "at the instance of the solicitor himself or any other person." Under the old practice before the Act a person not a client might apply. Frequently the society applied on the affidavit of its secretary: In re Blake, 3 E. & E. 34, 8 W. R. C. L.

Dig. 6; In re Garbett, 18 C. B. 403, 5 W. R. C. L. Dig. 142. The form given in the schedule to the Act cannot take away rights which existed before, and are not affected by, the Act itself, and the forms are only to be followed "as far as practicable": Part VI., r. 3. The question of the admissibility of the answers given in the public examination is settled by section 17 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The bankrupt's answers "may thereafter be used in evidence against him." That means in any proceeedings.

Winch, Q.C., replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case a solicitor became bankrupt, and in the course of his public examination made certain statements which were evidence against him of scandalous conduct, which, in the opinion of the official receiver would, if established, be ground for striking him off the roll of solicitors. The official receiver applied to the committee of the Incorporated Law Society in respect of the matter, and the committee, acting under the Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65), proceeded to hear the case. Two objections to their doing so were raised on behalf of the solicitor. The first objection was that since the Act of 1888 the official receiver has no locus standi in the matter, as he does not stand in the relation of client to the solicitor, and no one, it is said, but a client can apply under the Act of 1888. I will deal with this objection first.

The Act of 1888 introduced a new practice in these cases. It constituted a committee of the Incorporated Law Society a kind of grand jury to inquire into the charge which had been preferred against the solicitor, and the court then treats the report of the committee as if it were a report of a master under the old practice.

Now the Act says (section 13), "An application to strike the name of a solicitor off the roll of solicitors, whether at the instance of the solicitor himself or of any other person, or an application to require a solicitor to answer allegations contained in an affidavit, shall be made to, and shall be heard by, the committee in accordance with rules to be made under the authority of this Act: provided that any person who, but for this Act, would have been entitled to apply to the court to strike a solicitor off the roll of solicitors, or to apply to require a solicitor to answer allegations contained in an affidavit, shall be entitled so to apply, although the committee is of opinion that there is no primâ facie case of misconduct against the solicitor."

It is said that no one but a client can apply under this section. The early cases which were cited show that, according to the old practice, no such limitation existed. Any person might come before the court and affect it with notice of misconduct of one of its officers, and so set it in motion. That was undoubtedly the case originally; and that rule is not affected by the case of In re Cheslyn Hall, decided in 1856 by Stuart, V.C. There one of three co-trustees had grossly misconducted himself, and an application was made against him in his character of solicitor by his co-trustees. Objection was taken that the co-trustees were not his clients, and the Vice-Chancellor said that, if the persons who appeared to complain had no right to do so, the court would be bound to act accordingly. But it does not appear that that was a case in which a solicitor-trustee was acting as solicitor to the trust; the Vice-Chancellor only says: "The persons who complain are the co-trustees of Mr. Hall, and it can therefore hardly be said that they are unconcerned in the matter." That case, shows, therefore that persons other than clients could set the court in motion against the solicitor. That was the rule up to 1888. The Act of that year does not by section 13 limit the power to make applications; it speaks of an application at the instance of the solicitor himself or of any other person. Therefore the objection is not supported by the Act of Parliament. But an argument was based upon the rules made under section 15 of this Act. Part I., rule 1, was referred to, but in this case the application was made in the prescribed form. The application has to be accompanied by an affidavit, a form of which is given in the schedule to the rules. The form says: "C. D. of ——— solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England has been employed by me in a professional capacity." The argument is that, although up to the year 1888 any person could make this application, and although the Act of 1888 says it may be made by a solicitor or by "any other person," yet because in the skeleton form of the affidavit given in the schedule the words used are applicable to an affidavit by a client only, these words have cut down the power to make the application to clients only. If the rules did this I should undoubtedly hold them to be ultrâ vires. But they do not. By rule 3 of Part VI. the forms in the schedule are to be used "in all cases as far as practicable" and a deviation from them "shall not by reason only of such deviation render any application, affidavit, or other document or proceedings invalid." I think, therefore, that there is no ground for the first objection.

The second objection is that this gentleman has been obliged in his examination to make statements incriminating himself; that he ought not to have been asked to make these statements; and that when he had made them they ought not to have been used against him. It is, of course, familiar to all of us that answers which incriminate a person can in many cases be compelled to be given. In certain instances the effect of this is modified by provisions that answers compelled to be given in this way shall not be used against the persons giving them. But in Ex parte Cossens Lord Eldon draws a distinction between questions directed to ascertain other matters, and questions put with the direct purpose of finding out whether the witness has committed an offence. He says, in fact, that you must not ask a witness point blank—have you committed a crime? But what underlies the whole of his argument is that the answers can be used against the man. Therefore the great authority of Lord Eldon is invoked in vain in the present case.

In Reg v. Scott answers given in bankruptcy proceedings, which directly incriminated a man, were used in evidence against him at his trial on a criminal charge; he was convicted, and the conviction was upheld. But in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 17, this very point is settled by Act of Parliament. Sub-section (8) says, "the debtor shall be examined upon oath, and it shall be his duty to answer all such questions as the court may put, or allow to be put, to him. Such notes of the examination as the court thinks proper shall be taken down in writing, and shall be read over to, and signed by, the debtor, and may thereafter be used in evidence against him." It was argued that the questions should be confined to matters immediately affecting the bankruptcy, but the Act says, section 17, sub-section (1), that the debtor is to be examined as to his "conduct, dealings, and property." Conduct there means his general conduct. It may well be that a man of good character may be dealt with in one way, and a man of bad character in another. It was intended, and rightly, that a man's general conduct should be inquired into in the course of his public examination. For these reasons I think the objections fail, and the case must go back to the committee for further hearing.

Building society—Insolvency—Notice of withdrawal after insolvency—Rights of withdrawing members as to interest—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 32, sub-section 4.

By the rules of certain building societies it was provided that "On and after the expiration of the first twelve months, any member may withdraw the subscription money which he may have contributed, with such an amount of interest as may be determined by the committee, such member to give notice of his intention to withdraw in writing to the secretary, and, should more than one member give notice to withdraw at one time, the members so giving notice shall be paid in rotation according to the priority of notice, provided always that the said society shall not be required or obliged to make such payment as aforesaid until they have sufficient funds in hand for that purpose, and also to meet the then existing legal liabilities of the society."

Notices of withdrawal having been given by certain subscribing and investing members after the insolvency of the society had become known, but before the winding up order had been made,

Held, that they were not entitled to be paid the amount of their subscriptions in priority to other shareholders in the winding up.

Held, also, that, in the absence of a determination by the committee under the above rule, no interest accrued in respect of the amount due to a withdrawing member.

Appeals from the orders of the county court judge at Sunderland made in the winding up of the 32nd and 36th Universal Building Societies.

The facts were as follows:—Upon the death of the secretary of both the societies, it appeared from the report of a firm of accountants in whose hands the books were placed that they were insolvent. This report was, in accordance with resolutions passed at a meeting of the 32nd society on the 16th of February, 1887, and at a meeting of the 36th society on the 17th of February, 1887, sent to each shareholder. After these dates no new members were admitted by either society, no money was borrowed, or advanced to any member on mortgage, nor was any withdrawing member repaid. As regards the 32nd society, however, a small sum appears to have been received in subscriptions, and about £47 paid by way of interest to paid-up shareholders. King and Cordner, subscription shareholders in the 36th society, gave notice of withdrawal on the 21st of February, 1887, and the 6th of May, 1887, respectively. Oliver, a holder of paid-up shares in the 32nd society, gave notice of withdrawal at the end of six months from the 8th of October, 1886. Wilkinson, a holder of paid-up shares in the 36th society, gave notice of withdrawal at the end of six months from the 6th of October, 1885.

The winding-up order was made on the 2nd of July, 1887.

The learned county court judge decided that the 36th society was declared to be insolvent on the 17th of February, 1887, and the 32nd society on the 3rd of May, 1887, and that therefore King and Cordner were, but Oliver was not, entitled to priority in the winding up. He further decided that Wilkinson, whose notice of withdrawal had matured before the society to which he belonged was known to be insolvent, was entitled to interest from the 6th of April, 1886 (the date on which his notice matured), until payment.

In King's and Cordner's cases the shareholders appealed and in Oliver's and Wilkinson's cases the liquidators appealed.

R. 649, 4 App. Cas. 615, it was decided by the House of Lords that a shareholder was too late who brought an action to repudiate his shares before the winding up but after the insolvency. The principle decided in that case was applied in Carrick v. North British Building Society, 22 Scottish Law Reporter, 833, to notices of withdrawal given after a declaration of insolvency. The declaration of insolvency was in the present case made on the 17th of February, 1887, and the notices are therefore inoperative.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31—The judgment of the COURT was delivered by MATHEW, J.—These were appeals from orders made by the county court judge of Sunderland, and raised the question whether the appellants King and Cordner, and the respondent Oliver, were entitled to rank as creditors of the societies in the winding-up proceedings, or whether they were still members.

They contended that they had withdrawn from membership in accordance with the rules of the societies before the winding-up order had been made, and had thus become creditors. The liquidators, on the other hand, contended that, before the notices to withdraw from membership had been given or had become effective, the insolvency of the societies had become notorious, and, therefore, that the notices were inoperative.

The learned county court judge decided in favour of the liquidators in the cases of King and Cordner, and against the liquidator in the case of Oliver.

The order to wind up was made on July 2, 1887. In the first case the appellant King had given notice of withdrawal on February 21, 1887, and the appellant Cordner on May 6, 1887. In the second case the respondent Oliver had given notice on October 8, 1886, of withdrawal at the end of six months.

The contention on their part was that until the winding-up order had been actually made they were entitled to withdraw, and so to constitute themselves creditors of the societies.

The liquidator insisted that the societies were known to be insolvent on February 17, 1887, and that the right which members would otherwise have had of quitting the societies was then at an end.

It appeared from the evidence that ten benefit building societies constituted in the usual way had been established in Sunderland, and that the management of them all had fallen into the hands of a person named Wayman. They were formed on what is called the terminating principle, and consisted of two classes of members, depositors and borrowers, or "advanced members."

Unfortunately for the members of the societies under Wayman's control, there had been gross mismanagement, and after Wayman's death, in August, 1886, it was discovered that a great part of the moneys of all the societies was not forthcoming. In the early part of 1887 a firm of accountants was employed to investigate the affairs of the different societies, and reports were prepared which showed that each of them was insolvent. These reports, with balance-sheets, were submitted to and practically adopted by an aggregate meeting of members of the societies on February 14, 1887. In pursuance of resolutions passed at the meeting, an effort was made to reconstruct the societies, and delegates were appointed to meet and consider what should be done. A scheme of reconstruction by amalgamating all into one was put forward by the delegates, but was found to be impracticable, and resolutions were finally come to that each of the societies should be wound up under the supervision of the court.

In support of the contention that at the date of the order King, Cordner, and Oliver were no longer members, they relied upon the rule as to withdrawal, which was in the following terms:—[his lordship here read the rule as set out above]. We are of opinion that this rule was not intended to apply where the society was no longer able to carry on its business, and where it had become notorious that the society could not meet its liabilities. It would be altogether unreasonable to suppose that it was intended, in the event of insolvency, to permit one set of members to escape from liability at the expense of the others. There would seem to be no adequate consideration or motive for such an arrangement. The rule seems to us not to contemplate any such contingency as a suspension of its business, and therefore only to provide for a withdrawal from the society while it was, or was believed to be, still solvent. There was sufficient evidence to show that before the times at which two of the notices were given and the third became effective, the members, and all others who were interested, knew that the societies were no longer in a condition to carry out the objects for which they had been formed, or to fulfil their undertakings with their members. That the societies could not go on is shown from the scheme of reconstruction laid before the members, which practically involved the liquidation of the affairs of each of the societies. In this state of things the right to withdraw, it appears to us, no longer exists.

The case of Brownlie v. Russell, referred to by counsel for the appellants, is only material for the reasons given for the view that the right to withdraw does not survive a winding-up order. As appears from the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, a winding-up order takes away the right, because it necessarily put a close to the whole concern, terminates at the date the accounts of each shareholder, and cuts off all chance of profit which, if the thing had gone on, both classes of members might have had. But all these consequences were as clear and inevitable in the cases of these societies when the report of the accountant was published in February, 1887, as if a winding-up order had then been actually made.

The case of Walton v. Edge was relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants as an authority for the proposition that members who gave effective notice before the date of the winding-up order were entitled to priority in payment to those members who had not given notice. But the question in that case was as to the rights of members "who gave notice, not only before the winding up, but when there was no information that any winding up was going to take place, and when nothing special was alleged to affect them with notice that the society was not to continue as a going concern."

The view we take is in accordance with the valuable judgment of Lord Shand in the case of Carrick v. North British Building Society. It is not the order to wind up, but the state of things which, to the knowledge of all concerned, renders liquidation inevitable, that, in such a case as this, puts an end to the right to withdraw.

An effort was made on behalf of the persons seeking to withdraw to make out that, after the condition of the societies had been ascertained and made public by the reports of the accountants, the societies were still kept going. Reliance was placed upon the fact that some payments were afterwards made and received by the societies' officers. But the fact that the business of the societies was not wholly suspended is explained by the efforts which were being made to effect re-construction, which turned out to be impracticable.

We, for these reasons, hold that the appellants King and Cordner, and the respondent Oliver, are not entitled to priority, and that they must rank in the winding-up with the other members of the societies. We dismiss the appeals in the cases of King and Cordner and reverse the judgment of the court below in the case of Oliver.

In the third (Wilkinson's) case the liquidators appealed against the judgment of the learned judge, who held that members who had given effective notices of withdrawal before the insolvency was disclosed, but had not received the amounts due to them, were entitled to interest until payment. It was not contended that at common law or under the statute of William IV. interest would be payable, but it was said that there was a course of dealing between the societies and their withdrawing members which was evidence of a contract to pay interest. After a further investigation of the facts, made at our request by the learned county court judge, a full statement of the evidence has been made to us by his honour. We are of opinion that any claim for interest could only arise under the terms of rule 40, and that apart from that rule there is no evidence of any contract express or implied to pay interest to members who had given notice to withdraw. That payments were made without the knowledge in the first instance of the committee is explained from the irregular way in which the business of the societies was conducted by Wayman. That such payments were ratified up to a certain date, when they were ordered by the committee to be suspended, is no proof that a liability under any contract existed or was admitted to exist. Any inference of an implied contract is repelled by the express provision in rule 40, that the interest, if any, should be such a sum as the committee might determine, and it was found by the judge that no determination within the meaning of the rule had been come to by the committee. The appeal in this case must therefore be allowed.

DE LOSSY v. DE LOSSY. (a.)

Divorce—Practice—Order for permanent alimony—Non-compliance—Application for attachment.

The court will not grant an attachment for disobedience of an order for permanent alimony, by non-payment.

Motion on behalf of the petitioner for a writ of attachment against the respondent on the ground of contempt in his not having paid five several sums of £50 arrears of maintenance.

On February 15, 1883, the petitioner obtained a decree nisi for a dissolution of her marriage with the respondent, and on the same date an order for payment to her by the respondent of permanent alimony of £200 payable quarterly in advance for the term of their joint lives.

The decree nisi was made absolute on the 13th day of November, 1883, and alimony was paid under the order till October, 1888, after which date the respondent had refused to continue such payment.

Inderwick, Q.C., in support of the motion, was stopped by the court from going into the merits by the preliminary objection that this was not the proper procedure to enforce a final order.

Deane, for the respondent—I ask that this motion may be dismissed with costs. Since the Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict c. 62), imprisonment for debt has been abolished (section 4) with certain exceptions contained in that section. The present case is not within these exceptions.

BUTT, J.—Where there is a final judgment of this or any other court for payment of money the proper course to take to enforce such judgment is by debtor's summons or its equivalent. No instance has been given me in answer to my question whether an attachment has ever issued for non-compliance with a final judgment for payment of money. I must dismiss the motion with costs.

Motion dismissed, with costs.

Railway and Canal Commission.

WINSFORD LOCAL BOARD v. CHESHIRE LINES COMMITTEE. (b.)

Railway company—Railway and Canal Commission—Jurisdiction—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), ss. 1, 2, 3—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), ss. 1, 8.

This court has power, under sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, to make an order requiring a railway company to resume passenger traffic on a part of its line on which passenger traffic had been discontinued.

This was an application by the Winsford Local Board for an order requiring the Cheshire Lines Committee to resume passenger traffic on their lines between Guddington and Over, pursuant to sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854. It appeared that this part of the defendants' lines had been used for some time for both passenger and goods traffic, but that, since November, 1888, passenger traffic had been discontinued upon it.

The defendants took a preliminary objection that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order applied for.

Littler, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, for the defendants.—The court has no jurisdiction to make this order. Section 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, imposes on railway companies the obligation of "affording all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic," and by section 1 this term includes "passengers and their luggage." These sections are relied on by the plaintiffs, but their effect is discussed in South-Eastern Railway Co. v. Railway Commissioners and the Corporation of Hastings, 28 W. R. 464, 5 Q. B. D. 217. In that case Cockburn, C.J., had no doubt the order granted in that case was in excess of the jurisdiction. On appeal, however, the court held (6 Q. B. D. 586, 29 W. R. Dig. 108) that there was jurisdiction to make part of the order; but the judges in the Court of Appeal expressly say that the jurisdiction must be regarded as limited in the strictest way to cases which fall within the exact letter of the clause: Dickson v. Great Northern Railway Co., 35 W. R. 202, 18 Q. B. D. 176, may be relied on by the plaintiffs, but had the Legislature intended that railway companies should no longer have a discretion as to how it will carry on its business, some provision to that effect would have been inserted in the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888.

They further cited Attorney-General v. Great Western Railway Co., 25 W. R. 330, 4 Ch. D. 735; Lancaster and Carlisle Railway Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 4 W. R. 220, 2 K. & J. 293; and Hare v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 30 L. J. Ch. 817, 10 W. R. Ch. Dig. 60; per Wood, V.C.

Balfour Brown, Q.C., and Darlington, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

WILLS, J.—I have come to the conclusion that the court has jurisdiction to entertain this application. I have followed with the closest attention every part of the careful and elaborate argument which has been addressed to us by the learned counsel for the defendant company, and I do not doubt that they have laid before us every consideration which could at all influence our minds in forming an opinion. We have, as it seems to me, to consider in the first place the language of the statute, in the second place the effect of the decisions.

The material words of section 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, are—"every railway company, canal company, and railway and canal company shall according to their respective powers afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic upon and from the several railways and canals belonging to or worked by such companies respectively." By the interpretation clause the word traffic is to include "passengers and their luggage." If there had been no decision upon these words of section 2, I scarcely think that the question need have presented any great difficulty. Taken by themselves they could scarcely be read otherwise than as imposing on a railway company the obligation of affording, according to its powers, all reasonable facilities for dealing with—an expression which I use as an abbreviation of the longer phraseology of the Act—passenger traffic over the whole extent of its system. I see nothing to limit its application to selected parts of the system.

But it is necessary to consider with great care what limitations, if any, have been imposed upon the meaning of this clause by decisions. In my own case this precaution is especially necessary, for I must own that primâ facie I was inclined to accede to the view which was put forward with so much ability by the defendants' counsel. It is, I think, essential to bear in mind that prior to the passing of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, the theory had always been that a railway was in the nature of a highway which the public had a right to use on payment of tolls, and that a railway company had an absolute discretion as to whether they would or would not become carriers, and as to what, if they became carriers, they would carry. This is the ground of the decisions of Wood, V.C., which have been cited, and much of the earlier law on the subject is founded upon the same conception. If this state of things still existed, I have little doubt that the defendants would be right in their contention. But there is the authority of the Court of Appeal for holding, on the other hand, that the Act of 1854 made a most material difference in the legal position of railway companies. Notwithstanding all the criticism which has been expended upon Dickson v. Great Northern Railway Co., I cannot doubt that the Court of Appeal in that case meant to lay down the broad proposition which I propose to apply in this case. The view which, as I understand, was there taken of the position of a railway company before and after the Act, was that before the Act a railway company, not being a common carrier, and therefore not being a common carrier of dogs, was not bound to carry those animals at all, and, therefore, if it did carry them, could do so upon any terms it chose to lay down, but that since the passing of the Act a railway company, at all events if it undertook the carriage of these animals, came under the 2nd section, and could only do this, subject to the obligation to afford "reasonable facilities" for this kind of traffic over the whole extent of its system. I purposely limit my observation to the case in which the carriage of the particular class of traffic has been undertaken. The path of decision in matters of railway traffic is so thorny, and the consequences of unnecessary deviation may be so far-reaching, that I think it more than usually desirable not to take one step outside the path that must be trodden in the particular case under consideration. But it is clear to my mind that if in that case the question before the Court of Appeal had related, not to animal, but to passenger traffic, and it had appeared that the company carried passengers, the decision would have been that it was bound under the 2nd section to afford "reasonable facilities" for passenger traffic, and that over the whole extent of its system.

This is, in my opinion, the plain effect of the judgments in Dickson v. Great Northern Railway Co. It has, however, been suggested that, though this may be their plain effect, it cannot be their true meaning, because the present Master of the Rolls, who was one of the judges who decided the case, was, with Lord Selborne, a member of the court which decided South-Eastern Railway Co. v. Railway Commissioners and the Corporation of Hastings, and Lord Selborne, in his judgment in that case, had spoken of the position of railway companies under the section in a manner alleged in argument to be impossible to reconcile with the judgments in Dickson v. Great Northern Railway Co. if they have the effect which I have attributed to them. If I thought this, I should undoubtedly pause and take time to consider whether the two cases can or cannot be reconciled.

But I cannot see a trace of any conflict between either the decisions or the observations made in the two cases. The short passage alluded to in Lord Selborne's judgment in the earlier case is to the following effect: "A company may carry, or not, upon its own line as it thinks fit, and if it does so may undertake that business, under various conditions and limitations. But if and so far as it does undertake so to carry either passenger or goods traffic, it comes, in my opinion, under the obligation to afford for that traffic the facilities required by the 2nd section of the Act." There is, in my opinion, nothing, either in this language or in the rest of Lord Selborne's judgment, which in any way indicates that he meant that a railway company can now undertake to carry passengers on any one part of its line, without becoming bound to carry them on its whole line. His plain meaning appears to me to be that if a railway company undertakes to carry passengers at all upon its line, it comes under the obligation to provide "reasonable facilities" for dealing with passenger traffic over its whole line. Certainly, it would be a startling proposition that, consistently with the law of the land, the London and North-Western Railway Co. could discontinue passenger traffic between London and Birmingham, or that a railway company which carries passengers to Manchester could stop all its passenger trains two miles outside Manchester in order to damage the traffic of another company. Mr. Russell did not attempt to shirk the conclusion—inevitable, as it seems to me, if his argument be sound—that such things might be done, and would be subject to no review.

The argument ab inconvenienti admits, I think, of the short but sufficient answer that credit must be given to the court for a desire—and for the intellectual competence—to make reasonable orders. If we are satisfied upon the hearing that the order which has been applied for would be unreasonable, we shall not make it. I find no difficulty in imagining a case in which no court would say that it was reasonable to compel a railway company to do that which is asked for by the present application. I am, however, clearly of opinion that under section 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, it is no longer competent for a railway company which has undertaken a particular description of traffic, to deny the jurisdiction of the court to take into consideration the legality of its conduct in respect of that kind of traffic upon some particular branch of its line. Our judgment must, therefore, be in favour of the applicants.

Sir F. Peel.—I am of the same opinion. If the court has not jurisdiction under the 2nd section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, to entertain this application the result will be that any railway company will be able to make this section practically a nullity. It will be competent to the railway company to afford limited facilities for a particular traffic for a time, and then, when the section is appealed to, to decline to give any facilities at all by discontinuing the traffic altogether. In such a case the court would have no jurisdiction to compel the company to resume the discontinued traffic under its special Act or the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, which would be incorporated with it.

It has never been doubted that section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, took away the power which railway companies previously had of limiting their liability for negligence by general or special conditions. I think it equally clear that the effect of section 2 is to deprive railway companies which have commenced a particular traffic, of the power which they previously had of continuing or discontinuing it at their own discretion on this or that branch of their lines. The case of Dickson v. Great Northern Railway Co. is, in my opinion, conclusive in favour of the applicants.

FINCK v. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway company—Lands—Limits of deviation—Lands outside limits, reasonably required for purpose of construction of line within limits—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), ss. 13, 15—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), ss. 85, 92.

A railway company authorized by its special Act to take such of the lands shown on and described in the deposited plans and books of reference as might be required for the purposes mentioned in the special Act has power to take lands outside the limits of deviation if such lands are reasonably required for the purpose of constructing the line of railway within the limits of deviation, provided such lands are properly shown and described in the deposited plans and books of reference.

Wrigley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 4 Giff. 352, 9 Jur. N. S. 710, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 92, explained.

Dowling v. Pontypool, &c., Railway Co., L. R. 18 Eq. 714, 23 W. R. Dig. 203, approved.

The deposited plans and books of reference showed two tenements (marked thereon as Nos. 122 and 123), which consisted of two houses, with their respective curtilages. One of the two houses and part of the other house, as well as parts of the curtilages of both houses, were within the limits of deviation, and the remaining parts of the two tenements were outside those limits. The tenant of the house partly within and partly without the limits of deviation required the company to take the whole of his tenement, but the lessor refused to sell the whole of the two tenements to the company.

Held, that, under such circumstances, it became reasonably necessary for the company to take the whole of the two tenements numbered 122 and 123, and that, as the whole of these two tenements were shown and described in the deposited plans and books of reference, the company were entitled to take the whole.

Pulling v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 12 W. R. 969, 3 De G. J. & S. 661, distinguished.

Decision of Kay, J. (37 W. R. 375), affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of Kay, J. (reported 37 W. R. 375).

The action was brought by a landowner against a railway company, and the plaintiff claimed the restoration of a piece of land alleged to have been wrongfully taken by the company; a declaration that two notices to treat given by the company were invalid; and damages in respect of an alleged obstruction to a right of way claimed by the plaintiff.

Section 5 of the special Act, "The South-Western Railway (Various Powers) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. clxxxix.)," which incorporated the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, and the Lands Clauses Acts, 1845, 1860, and 1869, enacted that "the company may make the railway, deviations, improvements and widening of railways, and other works described" in sections 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the Act, "with all proper bridges, viaducts . . . and all other incidental works and conveniences connected with those railways and works, and all incidental works and conveniences, and may take and use such of the lands shown on the deposited plans and described in the deposited books of reference as may be required for those purposes."

The land in question in the action consisted of two houses with their curtilages (marked 122 and 123 on the deposited plans), which were held by tenants under leases from the plaintiff. One of these two houses, and part of the other house, as well as parts of the curtilages of both houses, were within the limits of deviation as delineated by a dotted line on the deposited plan. The rest of the two tenements or plots were outside the limits of deviation, but the whole of the two tenements or plots were described and specified in the books of reference and in the deposited plans.

On the 31st of May, 1885, the company gave notice to take such parts of the two tenements as were within the limits of deviation. The plaintiff thereupon gave notice to the company that he would not sell more than he was obliged to sell to the company under their compulsory powers, but the tenants, on the other hand, required the company to take the whole of the two tenements under section 92 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. On the 26th of January, 1886, the company issued a second notice to treat, which comprised the rest of the two tenements—i.e., those parts of the tenements which were outside the limits of deviation. Subsequently the company, under section 85 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and purporting to act under the powers of the above special Act, took possession of the whole of the two tenements, pulled down the two houses, and built a viaduct carrying the new line of rails, which viaduct at one point (referred to as the small triangular piece of land) went beyond the limits of deviation, but only did so to the extent of two feet ten inches at most.

At the trial before Kay, J., the plaintiff contended that, under no circumstances was the company authorized or justified in taking those parts of the tenements which were outside the limits of deviation, and the company contended that, if the medium filum viæ of the widening were to be placed on the dotted line marked on the plan, then that the lands taken would be within the limits of deviation.

Kay, J., held that though the company were wrong in their contention that in the case of widening a railway the medium filum viæ might be placed on the dotted line, yet that the plaintiff's action failed, as the taking of the lands outside the limits of deviation was rendered necessary for other reasons, and the plaintiff had, in fact, sustained no special damage thereby.

The plaintiff appealed.

Marten, Q.C., D. L. Alexander, and Montague Lush, for the appellant.—If the company exceeded their statutory powers in taking land which belonged to the plaintiff, it is not necessary he should show special damage. The company, in taking lands outside the limit of deviation, exceeded their statutory powers.

They referred to Little v. Newport, Abergavenny, and Hereford Railway Co., 1 W.R. 81, 12 C.B. 752; Attorney-General v. Tewkesbury and Malvern Railway Co., 1 De G. J. & Sm. 428, 11 W. R. Ch. Dig. 92; and section 13 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845.

Beale, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondent company.—It is well settled that a railway company may take lands lying outside the limits of deviation if required for the purposes of their works: Doe d. Payne v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Co., 6 M. & W. 320, provided such lands be marked on the plans and described in the book of reference: Doe d. Armitstead v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 16 Q. B. 526. Lands required for accommodation are lands required for the purposes of the railway: Dowling v. Pontypool, &c., Railway Co., L. R. 18 Eq. 714, 23 W. R. Dig. 203; Wilkinson v. Hull, &c., Railway and Dock Co., 30 W. R. 617, 20 Ch. D. 323. It was reasonably necessary for the purposes of the company's works that the company should take the whole of the tenements numbered 122 and 123, as the tenant of one of the houses required the company to take the whole house. Section 13 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, is amended by section 4 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 92).

Marten, Q.C., in reply.—The company in making the viaduct carrying their railway to extend beyond the limits of deviation, as they have done in the case of the triangular bit of land, have clearly exceeded their powers. Watkins v. Great Northern Railway Co., 16 Q. B. 961, is distinguishable, as there the company were acting within their powers. The plaintiff is entitled to compensation for the "injurious affecting" thereby of the plaintiff's adjoining land: Cowper-Essex v. Acton Local Board, ante, p. 209, 14 App. Cas. 153. Where the company are acting beyond their powers it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show special damage. As regards the pulling down of the whole house, the buying out of the tenant does not affect the rights of the reversioner: Pulling v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., 12 W. R. 969, 3 De G. J. & Sm. 661; and such pulling down is an "injurious affecting" of other lands. There is no evidence that it was reasonably necessary to pull down the whole house in order to construct the line within the limits of deviation, and even if it were so, that does not give the company the right to the soil on which the whole house stood.

COTTON, L.J.—This case is a complaint by a landowner against the railway company, that in proceeding under the special Act which gave them power to widen their railway they have exceeded their powers in various ways, and he claims to have re-conveyed to him some land which he says they took without any authority. I think the first point to be considered is this: whether the two notices to treat were, as he contends, illegal and inoperative. That contention is very much based on this, that the railway company have no right to take any land beyond the limits of deviation, and that they could not therefore take what they have taken. That really was the main point, and he carried it so far as to say that they could not even take the land which was included in the first notice, which was a notice to take the parts of the houses nearest to the railway, and that, a fortiori, they could not take the land which was comprised in the second notice. Now, I think that the railway company did not proceed exactly as they ought to have done, because, in my opinion, instead of giving the two notices, they ought to have given the notice once for all, including the whole of the property comprised in the two notices; but as they have now given notice, comprising the land contained in those two notices, I think we ought not to grant relief in this action on that ground. Why do I say they ought not to have given, or were not entitled to give, the two notices, but a notice once for all for the land comprised in those two notices? For this reason: I do not enter into the question of what the limits of deviation may be as regards the extension, but even if the railway company had confined their works within the limits of deviation, in my opinion they were entitled to give notice to treat for the whole of the land comprised in those two notices, and I think they ought to have given it in one notice.

I think there is a good deal of difficulty as to the powers of the company to extend their works beyond the limits of deviation in a case like this; but there is no question that they may take lands beyond the limits of deviation if they are required for the purpose of constructing the works which they are authorized to make by the Act of Parliament, and, therefore, in my opinion, their power to take land is not limited to land within the limits of deviation; it is limited to land which is described in the books of reference and in the Parliamentary plans.

Now, what was done here? Here were two houses: 122 and 123 marked in the plan affixed to the notices. They are entitled to take the whole of those plots if described in the book of reference and in the Parliamentary plans for the purposes of work which they are authorized to construct. Then, that being so, are 122 and 123 described in the book of reference and in the Parliamentary plan?

[His lordship then considered the book of reference and Parliamentary plans and said that, in his opinion, they comprised the whole of the plots in question.]

Then how have the railway company shown that this property is reasonably necessary for the purpose of constructing the railway? It is not necessary, in the sense that without it the railway could not have been constructed, that is not the meaning of it; but whatever is required reasonably, for the purpose of enabling a railway company to construct their railway, in my opinion, is, within the meaning of section 5 of the special Act, land which they require for the purpose of constructing their railway. This first notice would have cut in halves part of one of these houses, and, if the landlord and tenant had both been willing to enter into an arrangement to let the railway company pull down the whole, and then take back part of the land, I think the railway might have been reasonably made under those circumstances on the other part. But we find this: that the tenant said no, you shall not do that; you must pull down the house and take the whole, I will not have the house cut in halves, and have only half a house. The landlord says, I object to that, I will not sell an inch more ground than you can compulsorily take. That being the case, I think the railway company ought to have given a notice at once that they required to take the whole, because then it became reasonably necessary for the purpose of constructing their railway to take the whole, when the tenant refused to enable them to take one part only, and because the landlord and tenant could not agree together as to what they would sell to the railway company. Not that the termor, as a rule, can bind by a notice under the 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Act the freeholder, but that in the present case, in consequence of the course which the parties took, it became reasonably necessary, for the purpose of constructing the railway, to take the whole of that which was comprised in both the notices. I do not doubt that what is said by Turner, L.J., in the case of Pulling v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., as a general rule, is right, but here it is, not because the landlord is bound by the option of his tenant, but because at the option of the tenant it became reasonably necessary to take the whole, and it being reasonably necessary to take the whole, in my opinion the railway company were entitled to give notice to take, and to take the whole. I think it is reasonably clear that in consequence of the landlord's objection they tried to see whether they could take only the actual portion which was comprised in the first notice. They were quite entitled to take the whole comprised in both notices,—if they had given one notice, as they ought to have done, at first, they could have taken the whole. Then, in consequence of the claim made, which was established to be correct, as to the right of way to the stable, it became necessary, to enable the way to be made which they have made, to take another portion of that land which was comprised in the second notice, and I do not doubt that where, in consequence of its being necessary to make a substituted road, the railway company must take land which they would not otherwise have taken, they are entitled to do so. That is land required for the purpose of constructing their works—that is for doing something which the construction of their works renders necessary.

Then one comes to this point. The railway company were entitled to take all the land which they covered by their viaduct, though part of it is beyond the limits of deviation; and I will assume that there was a departure from the power given them by the Act of Parliament in making their viaduct, but then as Kay, J., said, how is the plaintiff injured by that? Unless he has suffered some special injury by their doing so, he individually cannot ask the court to interfere. The Attorney-General might, on the ground of its affecting the public, apply to the court, but that is not this case; it is not suggested here that there is any injury to the public, and the Attorney-General could not reasonably be put in motion; I therefore agree with Kay, J., in holding that, there being no special injury to the plaintiff in consequence of this departure from the authority given to the company by Parliament, the plaintiff cannot ask the court to interfere.

[His lordship then considered a complaint by the plaintiff as to a small triangular piece of land, beyond the limits of deviation, over which the defendants had carried their viaduct. With respect to this he said that he did not think the plaintiff had received any appreciable damage, and continued:—]

Then there is only one other point, and that is the substituted road. Has the plaintiff shown there is any substantial inconvenience by the substituted way? It is very true that till the action was brought, that substituted way was not given to him by the railway company, but it was given to him long before the trial of the action, and it was open still for the plaintiff to bring forward evidence to show how inconvenient (if it was so) this substituted way was. He has not done that. Kay, J., seems to have considered the case very fully, and was satisfied that the substituted way was equally convenient as that which had been taken away from the plaintiff, and I cannot differ from that. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal altogether fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is a case of some nicety, and presents various features which are very seldom met with. I think the key of the whole thing is to be found in the erroneous view adopted by the plaintiff; and that erroneous view is this, that under no circumstances could the railway company justify taking land which was beyond the limits of deviation. That is at the root of the whole of this litigation; and that appears to me to be a mistake. The limit of deviation has reference to the line of rails, and if there are pieces of land outside the limit of deviation, but properly referred to in the book of reference and deposited plans, and if those pieces of land are bonâ fide wanted for the purpose of making the line within the limit of deviation, there is no authority I know of to show that such pieces of land cannot be properly taken by the railway company. There was a doubt thrown upon that by the case of Wrigley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 4 Giff. 352, 9 Jur. N. S. 710, which came before Stuart, V.C., and which was referred to and examined with his usual care by Hall, V.C., in Dowling v. Pontypool, Cwerlson, and Newport Railway Co. To understand the case of Wrigley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., one must look at the report in the 9th Jurist. In the report in 4 Giffard the judgment of Stuart, V.C., runs in this way (p. 360):—"It is evident that no part of the field which is now in dispute, as described on the deposited plans of reference, constituted one close. If so, the company had no power to take the land comprised in their notice." On turning to the Jurist it is intelligible enough. "It is evident that no part of the field except that within the line of deviation was described in the deposited plans." That makes it plain and intelligible. With this explanation which Hall, V.C., had before him in Dowling v. Pontypool, &c., Railway Co., the doubt raised by the report in Wrigley's case appears to me to disappear. Dowling's case is a clear authority, if authority is wanted, that if there are lands properly described in the books of reference and deposited plans which, though outside the limits of deviation, are bonâ fide wanted for the purpose of making the line within the limits of deviation, the company may take them; that is common sense, and in accordance with the Act.

Now I pass on to consider the rest of the case. It follows from that, that if the whole of the plots which are referred to as 122 and 123 were bonâ fide wanted for the purpose of making the line within the limits of deviation, they could be properly taken under those notices; and I am satisfied on the evidence that, under the very peculiar circumstances of this case—by which I mean that half the house was absolutely wanted, and that the other half must be pulled down or supported at an extravagant expense, which is utterly unreasonable—it is true in point of fact that in this case the whole of those plots were bonâ fide wanted for the purpose of making the line legitimately within the limits of deviation—and it appears to me to carry the point in substance as regards those plots; and, looking back, it appears to me it is to be regretted that the company did not give one notice to take the whole, and then this controversy would never have been dreamt of. Owing to reasons I am imperfectly acquainted with, they first gave notice to take half, and then to take the whole. I look upon that as nothing; the substance of the thing is: were they entitled to give notice to treat for this? I think they were; and whatever the plaintiff is entitled to under those notices under the compensation clauses he will get, if he has not got it already. [His lordship then referred to the complaint as to the small triangular piece of land, and said that, assuming that there was a cause of action against the company for throwing an arch of their viaduct over that piece of land, it was clearly only a case for nominal damages, and that the court would not grant an inquiry for such a trivial matter. He then considered the question of the substituted right of way, and continued:—] It is competent to the railway company to take land for the purpose of making a substituted way. That has been decided in years gone by; and it appears to me, as a matter of convenience, all that can be said is that the present way is in some places narrower than it was before; but if it is sufficiently wide for the purpose for which it exists—that is to say, to let a horse go to and from the stable, that is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's right. There is no absolute right to seven feet all the way along; and when you look at the section of the Act of Parliament (s. 53 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845), it amounts to this: it is drawn in such a way that there is a certain latitude allowed in giving the substituted way. It is to be "as convenient as" the former, or as nearly so "as may be." The learned judge has found as a fact that this is a sufficiently convenient way, and I see no reason to differ from him on that ground. It might have been straighter or more convenient, but still it is a reasonable way, and as good as the company can give under the circumstances.

It appears to me, therefore, that upon the whole case, the appeal ought to be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—If the company had given a notice for what is contained in both notices in the first instance, an entire notice, I mean, for the whole contained in the two notices, in my opinion we should never have heard anything of this case. It could not have been then said that any land was taken without Parliamentary authority. If some is outside the limits of deviation, it appears to me it is reasonably necessary for the purpose of the line, and of the line authorized by Parliament, and it is, moreover, properly described in the book of reference and in the Parliamentary plans.

Now, that being so, I do not feel inclined to assist the plaintiff because of a mistake on the part of the company in not giving a notice which comprised the whole of this land in the first instance, and I am the more unwilling to assist him because I feel that he is not substantially damaged. With regard to the bridge over the road, all I have to say about that is, that if any injury is caused to the plaintiff it is too insignificant to be entertained. With regard to the substituted way, I agree with what has been said by Kay, J. I think that, having regard to the purposes for which that way is required, it is sufficiently convenient and commodious, and I am very much struck by this, that the occupier was not called at the trial, nor was anybody else called, to say that it was not sufficient for the purposes for which it was required. Mr. Marten said that the reason of that was, that the way was given after action brought, that photographs were produced, and that there was no necessity of giving any such evidence. I cannot help thinking myself that if this road had been in any way insufficient or not sufficiently convenient, that the occupier or some other person to speak to the fact would have been called.

This is a very peculiar case, and it is peculiar in this way. It appears to me that both the plaintiff and defendants have mistaken their rights. The plaintiff took a wrong view when he contended that no land, in any circumstances, could be taken beyond the limits of deviation; the defendants, on the other hand, took a wrong view when they contended that the medium filum of the widening was to be placed on the dotted line. I quite agree with what has been said by the other members of the court, and I think that this appeal should be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Railway company—Dock company—Scheme of arrangement—Scheme opposed—Rights of unsecured creditors—Railway Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), ss. 6, 7, 17, 18.

A dock company, which was also a railway company within the Railway Companies Act, 1867, being unable to meet its engagements with its creditors, a scheme of arrangement was prepared by its directors under section 6 of that Act. The scheme contained provisions for funding the interest accruing during a suspense period on the mortgages, charges, and debenture stock of the company; for preventing debts secured by mortgages or charges, the interest on which should be duly paid or funded, being called in before the expiration of a period of ten years; empowering the company to liquidate the debts of unsecured creditors incurred before a specified date, by the issue to them of deferred debenture stock charged on the undertaking of the company; and providing that one-half of any surplus proceeds of realizations of specific mortgages and charges, and of the proceeds of certain other realizations, should be applied in the purchase or redemption of the deferred debenture stock; and various other provisions, framed with the view of enabling the company eventually to discharge all its liabilities.

The confirmation of the scheme being opposed by certain persons in the position of large unsecured creditors of the company,

Held (affirming the decision of Chitty, J.), that the scheme, though it might indirectly affect them, did not infringe or take away any legal right of the unsecured creditors, or in any way exceed the powers given by the Act, but was an honest and reasonable scheme, affording a reasonable prospect of enabling the creditors to be paid, and intended to do, and apparently doing, the best that could be done for all the parties concerned, secured and unsecured creditors and shareholders alike; and that, accordingly, it ought to be confirmed.

The directors ought to exercise the power, given by the scheme, of offering deferred debenture stock to the unsecured creditors, without favour or partiality, as between such creditors.

Appeal from Chitty, J.

The East and West India Dock Co., which, having been authorized to make a railway, had been held by the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 849, 38 Ch. D. 576) to be also a railway company within the Railway Companies Act, 1867, being unable to meet their engagements with their creditors, prepared a scheme of arrangement with creditors under the provisions of section 6 of that Act.

This scheme, as amended, in substance provided, that the interest accruing on all mortgages, charges, and debenture stock of the company from December 31, 1887, to June 30, 1889, should be funded (clause 1); that mortgages or charges the interest on which should be duly paid or funded, should not be called in for a period of ten years (clauses 3 and 4); that half of any surplus proceeds of the realizations of specific mortgages and charges, and of the gross proceeds of certain other realizations, should be applied in the purchase or redemption of deferred debenture stock (clauses 4 and 5); and that the company should have power to liquidate the debts of unsecured creditors incurred prior to March 5, 1888, by the issue to them of deferred debenture stock charged on the undertaking of the company (clause 7).

Messrs. Kirk & Randall, contractors; Messrs. Lucas & Aird, contractors; and the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Co., all of whom were in the position of large unsecured outside creditors, opposed the scheme of arrangement, which came before Chitty, J., on petition for confirmation by the court.

Chitty, J., gave judgment confirming the scheme.

Of the opposing creditors, Messrs. Kirk & Randall alone appealed.

Moulton, Q.C., Byrne, Q.C., and Farwell, for the appellants.—This is not a scheme that ought to be confirmed against our opposition, inasmuch as it affects our rights without our consent. The company is empowered to borrow on mortgage to the extent of £320,000, and that has been done. No interest has been paid since the receiver was appointed. A scheme under this Act is not binding on outside creditors; In re Cambrian Railways Co.'s Scheme, 16 W. R. 346, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 278. Where, as here, the rights of outside creditors are affected by the scheme, their assent to it in writing is necessary: In re Bristol and North Somerset Railway Co., 16 W. R. 1112, L. R. 6 Eq. 448. The court will not confirm a scheme of arrangement where the opposition to it by outside creditors is reasonable: In re Somerset and Dorset Railway Co., 18 W. R. 332. The outside creditors, being persons in whose favour there are no charges, are the only creditors whose interests require to be looked after by the court, but the judge below seems to have looked at the case from the point of view of every class of creditors except the outside creditors. This scheme sweeps in everything. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to In re Hull, Barnsley, &c., Co., 37 W. R. 145, 40 Ch. D. 119.] At present the outside creditors stand on an equal footing with the rest, but under this scheme we are not likely to be treated as favoured creditors by having debenture stock offered to us, the dock company being very hostile to us. [They also referred to In re East and West Junction Railway Co., L. R. 8 Eq. 87, 17 W. R. Ch. Dig. 147. LINDLEY, L.J., referred to In re Letterkenny Railway Co., Ir. Rep. 4, Eq. 538, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 95.]

Latham, Q.C., Pollard, and Howard Wright, for the respondents.—Everything which benefits the company must directly or indirectly benefit the outside creditors. The scheme really takes away nothing that could otherwise have benefited these creditors. [LINDLEY, L.J.—But they say that though the scheme itself does not withdraw anything, you will do so under it.] The scheme prevents the whole class of judgment creditors coming in before the appellants. It is settled law that outside creditors can get no express direct benefit under a scheme. Section 4 shows the position and rights of outside creditors. It has been held under that section that only one receiver can be appointed, and that no priority is gained: In re Mersey Railway Co., 36 W. R. 372, 37 Ch. D. 610. The result is, therefore, that as long as there is a receivership order in force there is no priority amongst successive judgment creditors. In re Bristol and North Somerset Railway Co. is a clear decision that outside creditors are not bound without their own consent. Great care was exercised, in preparing the scheme, not to affect the rights of outside creditors, there being no power to do so. The "free assets" are the proceeds or surplus proceeds of the sale of the warehouses.

They also referred to In re Somerset and Dorset Railway Co.; In re East and West Junction Railway Co.; Stevens v. Mid-Hants Railway Co., 21 W. R. 858, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1064; In re Hull, Barnsley, &c., Railway Co.; and to sections 7, 10, 17, and 23 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867.

Byrne, Q.C., in reply.—The scheme cannot be altered without the consent of all the persons who originally approved of it. Section 17 only authorizes the court to confirm a scheme, but does not empower them to amend it. [COTTON, L.J.—We cannot amend.] The argument mainly relied on against us is that outside creditors are not affected, whether the scheme is confirmed or not. Upon the Act of Parliament, if the scheme purports to interfere with the rights of outside creditors, it must be rejected. Upon the cases, if the scheme purports to bind outside creditors, it must be assented to by them: In re Bristol and North Somerset Railway Co. In re Somerset and Dorset Railway Co. is a direct authority in our favour, and fully bears out our contention. The court must be satisfied that the rights of outside creditors are not interfered with.

Bowen v. The Brecon, &c., Railway Co., 15 W. R. 482, L. R. 3 Eq. 541, and In re The Potteries, &c., Railway Co., 18 W. R. 87, 155, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 67, were also referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 12.—COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal against an order of Chitty, J., confirming a scheme proposed by the East and West India Dock Co. That company is a company which is authorized to make a railway, so as to bring it within the provisions of the Railway Companies Act of 1867; but I need hardly say that the principal part of its undertaking is its dock, and its work connected with that. There has been a scheme proposed under this Act which is necessarily prefaced by a declaration under the seal of the company, and by an affidavit, that the company is unable to pay its creditors. The scheme is opposed by the contractors, who were originally employed by the dock company to construct their new docks down at Tilbury. The contractors at present are in this position, that they are primâ facie creditors of the dock company, but are not in the position of having got any judgment as against the company, or having got any lien or charge on any property of the company.

What are the objections which are raised to this scheme? It is said (and that is the first point to be considered) that this scheme does that which, under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, a scheme has no power to do—that is to say, it is well established that a scheme under the Act cannot bind (I use that word first of all) outside creditors. By outside creditors I mean those classes of creditors who do not come within the provisions of the Act as regards this scheme, so as to make their consent to it necessary, though a certain consent by a majority of them is necessary in order to enable this scheme to be confirmed by the court. They are simply creditors.

Several cases have been referred to in the argument, but I shall only refer to two of them at present. The first case, In re Cambrian Railway Co.'s Scheme, came before Lord Cairns when Lord Justice. As I pointed out, that case does not directly bear on the question we have to consider, although it does lay down usefully the principles which have to be considered on the question which is now before us—the confirmation of the scheme—because that was an application under an earlier section of the Act—that is to say, section 7—which says that, after the filing of the scheme, it shall be lawful for the court to stay any action; and the question there was whether the court would, having regard to the scheme, stay the action. What Lord Cairns said was that the scheme there proposed to do, that which it could not do so as to bind the creditors; and he also said that it was not a scheme in face of which he would stay the action of a creditor, the creditor not being in any way bound by the provisions of that scheme. That scheme was this: It proposed to take away a right of the creditor—that is to say, to put him in a different position as regards his rights from that which he would have occupied before the scheme. Lord Cairns says: "Without professing to lay down any rule which is to meet every case, I cannot think it would be right that the court should suspend the proceedings of any unpaid landowner, or, indeed, of any outside creditor, unless it saw that a scheme was proposed in good faith which, if it reached maturity, would afford a reasonable prospect of providing for the payment of the claims of creditors, and thus compensate them for a temporary suspension of their remedies." That throws light and is a guide, I think, as to what we should look to when we come to decide this part of the case, as to whether the scheme does purport in any way to lay down that which would deprive a creditor of his rights. Then there was the case of In re the Bristol and North Somerset Railway Co., which came before Giffard, L.J. He very much referred to the case before Lord Cairns, but there there were provisions which directly purported to alter the position of the creditors—that is to say, compelling them to give up their position as creditors and to take another and different position as persons who had taken, I think, in that case, debentures.

What is said in the present case is this: that this scheme—I will not read it, because it has been so much discussed, and is well known by all parties—provides a suspense period during which the creditors to whom money was owing for principal, and who could be bound, were not to pursue their remedies, and then it provided that what have been called the "free assets" should be dealt with in a particular way, partly to provide for this funded interest, and then half of it was to provide for the debentures which part of the scheme provided should be issued to creditors, not compelling in any way creditors to take the debenture stock, but enabling the company to issue this additional debenture stock to creditors.

Well, does that deprive creditors of any right within the sense that the scheme is not to bind creditors? In my opinion it does not. It is very true it takes away from the creditors this money, in this sense, that the money so to be held by this scheme, which is a bargain binding on the company and on the persons who are named—the present debenture-holders—is not to be held by the company as their free assets. That is true. They are bound by the contract contained in this scheme to appropriate this partly in favour of the creditors whose rights are suspended for a time, and who are entitled to the benefit of this provision, and partly for these debentures, which are to be created under the scheme. But, in my opinion, that is not to deprive a creditor of any right. These outside creditors have no lien or charge at all upon any money. They are simply in the position of creditors of a company. Creditors of an individual, unless they have a mortgage or charge, cannot say that he deprives them of any right or interest which they have if he squanders his money. People may do that, and do that foolishly, but if the creditor has got anything in the nature of a lien or charge upon it, then, of course, that cannot be dealt with by a man who foolishly squanders his money. Here all that the scheme does is this—it enables (if confirmed by the court) the company and all the debenture-holders, if there is a sufficient majority to bind the whole, to enter into this bargain. But the company, if it was minded, might with any individual creditors whose actions might be suspended by the scheme, if it is confirmed, enter into a bargain to give them a charge, if they have not got it, on these surplus assets. As far as one sees there will be a considerable amount of assets, but I do not enter into that, because, to my mind, it does not come into the question which we have now to consider. But there are surplus assets. If those were not dealt with in this way, and if the company did not by a bargain (without any scheme) with any individual creditor agree to give a charge to that creditor on those assets, then if the opponents here established their right as creditors they would be enabled by ordinary process of law, whatever might be available, to get payment out of that. And, no doubt (and I think as to that Mr. Byrne was right), in consequence of this scheme these free assets do become bound, as between the company and the debenture-holders for whom the provision is made, to be applied, not as assets free from any obligation on the part of the company, but, as between the company and those who are bound by the scheme under this bargain and contract, these assets do become bound to be applied in the way provided by the scheme. But although that may affect the creditors—and one has to consider hereafter whether, on the whole, the scheme, having regard to all its provisions, is a fair one, and provides a reasonable prospect for payment of the creditors—yet, in my opinion, it does not deprive the creditors of any right which they have, taking "right" in this sense—anything which they have a right to enforce by legal process in consequence of any charge or lien or mortgage, which they have on any assets of the company. So that, in my opinion, the objection that this scheme is going beyond the powers given by the Act of Parliament cannot prevail. It is almost a necessity that there should be in a scheme like this, some dealing with the property of the company which was previously free—some property of the company to be attached or dealt with by the company as may be thought fit. It is almost a necessity that there should be some provision providing how that is to be dealt with, so as to take away that property from being subject to the ordinary power of the company, and to deal with it and appropriate it as may be thought right. But that cannot be done as against any legal interest or legal right, in the nature of a mortgage or lien, which there may be in a creditor. In my opinion the objection taken to the scheme, that it goes beyond the powers authorized by the Act, cannot prevail.

But then we have to consider something beyond that. What one has to consider is this, whether this is a scheme which, as against dissentient parties, the court ought to sanction and confirm. Let us see what, under the Act, we are required to do. The court is to hear directors and creditors and others, and if the court is satisfied that all the necessary assents have been given—which there is no question has been done here—and that no sufficient objection to the scheme has been established, it may confirm the scheme. That is what the court has to do. Of course, if it goes beyond the power given by the Act, the scheme is ultra vires, and the court never will sanction it, and there is an end of the matter. I think I ought to deal here with one objection that was raised on this point. It was said the creditors are not bound here, and there I think that Mr. Latham went too far, because I differ from him as regards what would be the effect of the scheme upon the free assets. He said:—"If that were so, if creditors might be interfered with in this way, why, in many of these cases, has the court refused to sanction a scheme? It did that which it had no power to do under such schemes." I think there are two objections. The court ought never to sanction and confirm a scheme which, though it purports to be made under an Act of Parliament, is in excess of the powers given by the Act of Parliament. It would be very wrong for it to do so. There is also this difficulty, which I shall have to refer to again:—If there is expressed in the scheme something which the court finds not only that it cannot sanction, but which there is no means of enforcing, it may be said that then those classes of creditors, and classes of shareholders, whose assent is required, are deceived; that they thought this scheme did contain a binding clause which now the court says there is no power at all to create, and that it is not binding in any way. Therefore, the scheme must be considered as not containing terms which the Act of Parliament does not enable to be put in there.

But then we come to the question whether there is any sufficient objection to the scheme. I have read a passage from Lord Cairns's judgment in the Cambrian Railways case, which I will not repeat, for the purpose of showing what we are to consider. I would also refer here to a passage in the judgment of James, L.J., in East and West Junction Railway Co.'s case. He says:—"If I thought that the scheme deprived any creditor of any reasonable prospect of being paid, I should have had much more hesitation in confirming it, but I cannot help seeing that, unless some scheme is resorted to, there is nothing for the company and nothing whatever for the outside creditors." Now, I will not go so far as that last part, but what one has to look and see is whether, having regard to what the scheme does, it does not afford a reasonable prospect of providing for the payment of creditors. I think it ought, because all these schemes are schemes for arrangement between companies and their creditors.

That is really the principal object of them. If the company say "we cannot pay our creditors," then a scheme must be prepared, and it will be binding as between the company and its shareholders and debenture-holders, but the object is to provide payment by using the scheme as a means of enabling the company to pay their creditors. Of course, the court considers also what is reasonable and what is for the benefit and interest, not only of the outside creditors, but those, for instance, who are interested in the company as debenture-holders and as shareholders—that is to say, in the company and the works of the company. Here there are now a very large number of creditors who have an actual right at present as against the company for payment, and there are large claims of £160,000 or £180,000, I think, in arrear before the beginning of the year for interest; there are large claims for capital due. I think at present—I do not refer to the details—there is £300,000, and there will be about as much more before we get to the middle of the year. Well, these are very large claims indeed against the company by persons about whose claims there is no dispute whatever. What does this scheme do as regards them? Practically, for a period of ten years, it suspends the actions of those persons who are in the undoubted position of creditors entitled to immediate payment. We know, too, that the company, in consequence of legislation and in consequence of the action taken to unite together the docks, which were previously in opposition and ruining one another, is going on better, and, as far as one can learn, there is every prospect of considerable increase in the profits which this company is likely to make. If that is so, is not that an enormous benefit? It is true that, in order to enable it to do that, the free assets are dealt with, but dealt with in a way which, as far as I can see (and that was the view of Chitty, J.), is a reasonable way of providing for the better success and future prosperity of this company. That, of course, is a way of providing the means of paying its creditors. It does not give these outside creditors any direct charge on the property, but it does, as far as one can see, afford a reasonable prospect, and a reasonable mode (there may be others, but this is the one that has been selected) of providing for payment of the creditors. There is also this in the scheme, that it does provide for debenture stock to be given to the creditors, and then there is a provision to enable part of the present surplus assets to be applied in payment of that debenture stock. Upon that it was said: "There is no provision requiring the directors to give this debenture stock to all creditors who are willing to take it, and there is no provision made as to directing them to apply in any particular way the proceeds of that portion of the free assets to pay the particular creditors." Well, it was proposed on behalf of the company that they should give an undertaking to offer this debenture stock either to the particular creditors who are opposing this scheme or to all the creditors who are willing to take it, and that they should give an undertaking as regards applying the money in their hands for the purpose of redeeming that stock. But it was objected to that, and, I think, rightly objected, that it would not be proper for us to require that undertaking now to be given, because it would probably be looked upon as, and it probably would be making it, a condition of the scheme; and, therefore, I think that we cannot either ask the dock company to give that undertaking or take that undertaking when offered by them.

But I must express my opinion that the court trusts to those who are directors of the company to act in what they consider the proper and reasonable way in dealing with the powers here given them; and, in my opinion, it would not be a proper exercise of the powers given them if they used those powers capriciously or arbitrarily in favour of creditors whom they favoured, and against creditors with whom they had some quarrel or whom they disliked. As soon as this question is settled as to what the rights of the company are, the feeling of any grudge, or any feeling of that kind, should be at an end. People may fight very hard, but, when the matter is settled, they should see that the time for that is past. In my opinion (and I have no hesitation in saying it), the directors, or those who govern or manage this company with reference to this scheme, ought to exercise the powers thus given to them in a way which will prevent anyone saying that they have acted arbitrarily or because they had any particular feeling for or against particular creditors. Therefore, I think, so as not to have it suggested that we are imposing any new term or making an alteration in the scheme—which we cannot do—it will be better not to receive that undertaking, though offered; but I express my opinion now, so that there may be no doubt as to the way in which I think these powers ought to be exercised.

Then there is another matter to which I must refer. Two receivers and managers have been appointed. One of them was a receiver and manager appointed, I think, at the instance of a creditor, who was bound by the scheme, and that was a mere interim order for interim management. Of course if this scheme is confirmed, and the creditor who obtained that receivership is bound by the scheme, there will be an end of it, and that, I think, disposes of that point. But, as regards the other order—an order made under an earlier section of this Act (the 4th section)—in my opinion, the scheme in no way gets rid of that receivership order. Of course, as regards any creditor who is bound by the scheme, so far as the scheme interferes with any rights which he would otherwise have under that receivership order, he cannot insist upon them. But, as regards an outside creditor, and as regards anyone who is not bound by the scheme, or as against whom there is no objection, in consequence of the scheme, to his enforcing such rights as he has under the receivership order made under section 4, it still remains. And here those who were judgment creditors at the time that order was made—I will not say anything more than that—and persons who have rights under that order, will retain them, notwithstanding the scheme, and that I think Chitty, J., expressed in his judgment. That that is so I have no doubt; and, therefore, no objection on that ground can be taken to what has been done. The receivership order remains in force for those who are entitled to the benefit of it; but, of course, so far as the scheme binds those who would otherwise be entitled to the benefit of the order, they cannot insist upon it.

As regards those in the position of mere outside creditors, that receivership order still remains, and there will be a right in favour of judgment creditors who are entitled to the benefit of that order; but when all those judgment creditors are paid, then, under the powers given by section 4 of the Act, the court may, if it thinks right, discharge the receiver and put an end to the proceedings under that receivership order.

In my opinion the judgment of Chitty, J., was right, and the appeal fails.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In order to deal with this case it is necessary to consider a little the theory of schemes under the Railway Companies Act of 1867. The provisions of that Act come into force in the case of railway companies who are in difficulties. The first condition of the application of the Act is, that they shall not be able to pay their creditors. It is no part of the scheme to wind up the company in the sense in which a joint-stock company is wound up under the winding-up Acts. The theory rather is that the company is to be kept going, and schemes are to be prepared for the purpose of enabling the company to pay their way and pay off their creditors by means of a going concern. The whole theory of the scheme is clearly based upon that principle. Those who have prepared it see the difficulties, and very serious difficulties indeed they are. They cannot go on without arranging in some way with their creditors and gaining time. If they were wound up to-morrow, whether there would be twenty shillings in the pound for their creditors I do not know. Docks are not very saleable things unless there is a purchaser in the market, and one need not speculate on that. The scheme is based upon the principle that it is for the benefit of everybody—creditors, secured and unsecured, and shareholders and everybody else—that the company shall be kept going, and that opportunities shall be made of paying off creditors by degrees.

Now the first thing, having got that general view into one's head, is to see what is the nature of the provisions of the Act. We are dealing with a scheme which has been assented to by the necessary majorities of those creditors whose assents are required by the Act of Parliament; but the scheme is objected to by unsecured creditors—gentlemen who are creditors for a very large amount. Unsecured creditors are not required by the Act to assent to the scheme, nor can any minority, however small, be bound by a majority, however large, of the same class of creditors as themselves. No majority of unsecured creditors can bind a single dissentient. More than that, although the unsecured creditors are not required to assent, they are entitled to be heard in opposition to the scheme, which involves that their objections to it must be fairly and properly considered by the tribunal before whom the scheme comes for approval. Therefore, although these gentlemen are not required to assent, their dissent, and the grounds of their dissent, require to be considered.

Now, it has been said, and said with truth, that dissentient unsecured creditors are not bound by the scheme; they are not bound by assents. They are not bound to take the benefits, if any, which are offered to them by the scheme. They are left to their legal remedies if they do not choose to come in under it. But although it is perfectly true that they are not bound by the scheme in any such sense as that, it would be a great mistake to suppose that the scheme is a matter of perfect indifference to them, and that it in no way, directly or indirectly, affects their rights. The effect of the scheme is declared by section 18 of the Act to be this: "A scheme when confirmed shall be enrolled, and thenceforth the same shall be binding and effectual to all intents, and the provisions thereof shall, against and in favour of the company, and all parties assenting thereto or bound thereby"—that is, not the unsecured creditors—"have the like effect as if it had been enacted by Act of Parliament."

Now, what I wish to call attention to is this, that the scheme, if confirmed, is valid, and binds the company. That which binds the company binds the unsecured creditors of the company in this sense, that any disposition by the company of this property which binds the company will affect the unsecured creditors. Any trust validly created by the scheme and binding the company will affect unsecured creditors. Unsecured creditors having no lien or charge on the assets of the company, they have no greater right against the property or assets of the company than the company itself has. Whatever affects me affects my unsecured creditors. So far as my property is concerned, if I give it away, so much the worse for them; they cannot follow it; they can only come against me. If I create valid trusts which are enforceable against me, and which are not open to the charge of being fraudulent against my creditors, my unsecured creditors are bound, and they cannot attach that trust property. In that sense these schemes become very important indeed to unsecured creditors; and, although it is true in one sense they are not bound, yet in another sense it is quite true they are very seriously affected by them.

That being so, it becomes necessary and important to consider the objections which the unsecured creditors may have, and if a scheme were prepared—I do not say for the purpose of cheating the unsecured creditors, because that is too gross to require comment—but if a scheme were prepared which would have the effect of leaving them out in the cold and preferring other creditors to them, the court would be very slow indeed to confirm such a scheme as that. It is said by Mr. Byrne that that is really the effect of this scheme. If it were, I should think the scheme ought not to be confirmed; but let us look at it a little further. Let it be borne in mind that, unless such a scheme as this is confirmed, the position of unsecured creditors will be an uncommonly bad one—there will be immediately a competition and rush for priority, which will be extremely disastrous for everybody except those who are fortunate enough to get it. That is an evil which we, at all events, are quite able to appreciate.

The position of this company is such that by next July, what are called the free assets of the company would be, if not wholly swept away, to a very large extent swept away long before the opposing unsecured creditors would be in a position to put in force any judgment which they might get. They have not got judgment yet. It is not, so far as I can see, to their interest to prevent any scheme being carried out. It would not be to their advantage to leave this company to struggle with its creditors at the risk—and the imminent risk so far as they are concerned—of being left out in the cold by reason of other creditors getting priority in a rush for payment. Although the scheme, therefore, does affect the property of the company, and does therefore affect the unsecured creditors, we must look at the other side and see what the scheme does for them. The great feature of this scheme is that it prevents the rush and competition and struggle for priority to which I have alluded, and which would be perfectly fatal to the company, and fatal to everybody who was not first in the field. Those creditors, who are in a position to issue fi. fa.'s and execution against the company, suspend their rights for a good long time—for ten years—and other persons who will be in a position next July, if nothing is done, to execute judgments against the company, suspend their rights for the same period. That is an immense set off against any withdrawal of assets from persons like Messrs. Kirk & Randall.

Looking, therefore, at the thing as a whole, as I think we ought to do, and not looking at and deciding against the scheme simply because some unsecured creditor, however large, is affected by it, but looking at it as a whole, we must ask ourselves, in the language of section 17, whether any sufficient objection to the scheme has been established; and the conclusion at which I have arrived, after attending to Mr. Byrne's and Mr. Moulton's very able arguments on behalf of their clients, is that this is a thoroughly honest scheme and intended to do the best, and, so far as I can see, doing the best, for all concerned in the very unfortunate circumstances with which the company and the court have to deal and to grapple.

With reference to the point made, that under clause 7 of the scheme the company may give a preference to some of the unsecured creditors and issue deferred debenture stock to some and refuse to issue it to others, I do not think that we ought judicially to suppose that the company will be guilty of that which would be something very like unfair dealing. One sees why the power is framed in this way; it is because some of the unsecured creditors may prefer not to have deferred debenture stock—they may prefer to go without it, and exercise such rights as they may be entitled to exercise. But I am not prepared to suppose that if an unsecured creditor comes and asks for deferred debenture stock in pursuance of the scheme the company will say, "No; we had a quarrel with you; we shall not give it to you." It is not likely; it is not business-like; and I am not prepared to withhold my consent to the scheme because it is just possible that the power conferred by the scheme will be abused. I shall assume it will be acted upon in the spirit in which it is asked for, and with which, as far as I can judge, it is likely to be carried out.

Upon the whole, therefore, it appears to me that this is a scheme which we ought to confirm, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I have only to say that I believe this scheme likely to be beneficial to all concerned, secured and unsecured creditors. It appears to me to be a reasonable scheme, and I can see no sufficient objection that has been made against it which would justify this court in refusing to confirm it.

Appeal dismissed.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 383, 24 Q. B. D. 186), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, reported ante, p. 383, 24 Q. B. D. 186.

At the election of county councillors for the administrative County of London in January, 1889, the defendant acted as presiding officer at one of the polling-stations in the City of London electoral division of the county. The plaintiff was duly registered as an elector both in the Greenwich electoral division and in the City of London electoral division of the county. The plaintiff having voted in the Greenwich division, demanded a ballot paper at the polling-station where the defendant was presiding to enable him to vote in the City of London division. The defendant, upon being informed by the plaintiff that he had already voted in the Greenwich division, refused to supply him with a ballot paper, upon the ground that each elector was only entitled to vote in one division. The plaintiff having brought an action in the City of London Court to recover damages for such refusal, the judge gave judgment for the defendant. The Queen's Bench Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.) affirmed this judgment.

The plaintiff appealed.

Russell Griffiths (Finlay, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.

Hens Collins, Q.C. (J. V. Austin with him), for the defendant.

LORD EHER, M.R.—This action is admittedly brought to try the right of the plaintiff to vote at an election for county councillors in more than one division of the same county. Upon one side it is said that an elector may vote in each division in which he is registered; upon the other side it is said that, though registered in more than one division, he can only vote in one. The question depends upon the true construction of the Local Government Act, 1888, and the Acts incorporated in it. The first section that it is necessary to look at is section 2 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and by sub-section 1 it is enacted that the council of a county and the members thereof shall be constituted and elected in like manner as the council of a borough divided into wards. We must therefore see what is the mode of election in a borough divided into wards. Section 75 for this purpose incorporates part 3 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, so far as the same is consistent with the provisions of the Act. Section 45 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which is contained in part 3, prescribes the mode of arriving at the electors in the different wards. The ward roll gives the name of every elector entitled to vote in that particular ward. The ward rolls taken together constitute the burgess roll. If I understand the procedure rightly, it is this: the burgess roll is laid before the revising barrister, and if the name of the same voter appears upon more than one of the ward rolls, the name is not struck out of each ward roll but one, but a note is placed against the name in those ward rolls in respect of which the voter has elected not to vote. Then section 51, sub-section 2, enacts that no person shall vote in more than one ward, and by section 59 the presiding officer is authorised to ask a person offering to vote whether he has already voted in that or any other ward. An elector, therefore, can only vote in one ward in a borough. All those sections of the Act of 1882 are contained in part 3, and are therefore incorporated in and made part of the Local Government Act, 1888, unless it can be shown that they or any of them are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act. The way it is sought to make out an inconsistency is this. Section 2, sub-section 4, of the Local Government Act, 1888, provides that the persons entitled to vote at the election of county councillors shall be the persons registered as county electors under the County Electors Act, 1888. Section 7 of the County Electors Act, 1888, deals with the register of county electors, and sub-section 4 provides that nothing in that section shall prevent a county elector from being registered in more than one division register. It is said that these sections give a person registered in more than one division the right to vote in each of those divisions, and are therefore inconsistent with section 51, sub-section 2, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. I can see nothing inconsistent in allowing an elector to be registered in several divisions and in preventing him from voting in more than one. The same thing, it seems to me, might happen in the case of a borough. An elector, therefore, though registered in more than one division of the same county, can only vote at the same election in one of those divisions. The judgment of the Divisional Court was right, and must be affirmed.

FAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The governing rule as to the election of county councillors is to be found in section 2 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and the material words are in sub-section 1: "The members shall be constituted and elected in like manner as the council of a borough divided into wards." The case of a borough divided into wards is set up as the model upon which the election of county councillors is to be moulded. In a borough divided into wards the electors can only vote in one ward. Therefore it would naturally follow that in a county the electors could only vote in one division. The sub-section, however, goes on: "Subject nevertheless to the provisions of this Act." By section 75 it is enacted that, for the purpose of the provisions of the Act with respect to county councils, part 3 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, shall, so far as the same is consistent with the provisions of the Act, apply as if they were therein re-enacted. In the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, I find two sections that are material. Section 51, sub-section 2, provides that no person shall vote in more than one ward. Applying that provision to a county council it must read, no person shall vote in more than one division. Then section 59 authorizes the presiding officer to ask an elector whether he has already voted in that or any other ward. The obvious intention of that provision is that, if the elector answers in the affirmative, he shall not be allowed to vote again. So far the matter is free from doubt. The only remaining inquiry is whether there is any provision in the Local Government Act, 1888, inconsistent with those provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. Section 2, sub-section 4, of the Local Government Act, 1888, enacts that the persons entitled to vote at an election of county councillors are to be the persons registered as county electors under the County Electors Act, 1888. By section 7, sub-section 4, of this latter Act it is provided that nothing in that Act shall prevent a county elector from being registered in more than one division register. The fact of being registered does not necessarily give the right to vote. I can see nothing inconsistent in saying a man may be registered in two or more divisions, and yet may only vote in one. Section 51, sub-section 2, of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, does not seem to me to be inconsistent with the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888. The appeal, therefore, fails.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Section 2 of the Local Government Act, 1888, prescribes those who are to be electors of county councillors, and section 75 of that Act incorporates part 3 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. Among the sections so incorporated are sections 51 and 59. Section 51 is the important section, as it prohibits an elector voting in more than one ward. Those sections seem to me to conclude the case. It is urged, however, that they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1888, and section 7, sub-section 4, of the County Electors Act, 1888. I can see no inconsistency in saying that a voter may be registered in more than one division register of a county, and at the same time may not vote in more than one division at the same election. The scheme of the Local Government Act, 1888, seems to have been to assimilate the mode of election in the divisions of a county with the mode of election in the wards of a borough.

It is a general rule in all cases that, in the absence of special circumstances, the successful party obtains the costs of an appeal and the unsuccessful party has to pay them.

Where, in an action for collision, the Court of Appeal (reversing the Admiralty Division) held that it was the result of inevitable accident,

Held, that this fell within the general rule, but that, having regard to the particular manner in which the case had been conducted, there were such special circumstances as to entitle the court to order that each party should pay their own costs in the court below.

The defence of inevitable accident was not at first set up by The Batavier, but her crew told a false story and set up a false defence. This naturally affected the conduct of the plaintiffs, and under these circumstances I think that each party must pay their own costs in the court below, but the appellants will have the costs in the Court of Appeal.

Practice—Filing notice of motion for attachment—Service where no appearance—Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 44, r. 2; ord. 67, r. 4.

The defendant, a trustee, had not entered an appearance, and the writ and statement of claim had been filed. An order that the defendant should pay money into court within seven days, had been served personally upon the defendant, and was not obeyed. Notice of motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment had been filed.

Held, that the filing of the notice was sufficient service.

Motion for leave to issue writ of attachment.

The defendant was executor and trustee of the will of J. G. Morris; he was alleged to have misappropriated a sum of £231 5s.

The defendant had not entered an appearance, and the writ and statement of claim had been filed under the provisions of ord. 67, r. 4.

On the 1st of March, 1890, on motion for judgment in default of defence, the defendant was ordered to pay the sum of £231 5s. into court within seven days after issue of the order.

On the 3rd of April the defendant was personally served with the order of the 1st of March, with which order he failed to comply, and on the 15th of April notice of motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment was filed with the proper officer, under ord. 67, r. 4.

E. Brydges, for the motion.—There is great difficulty in approaching the defendant, and the order of the 1st of March was served upon him with much trouble. No injustice can be done. It is not necessary to effect personal service of notice of motion for attachment: Browning v. Sabin, 5 Ch. D. 511, 25 W. R. Dig. 185. All the documents have been duly filed under ord. 67, r. 4. 28 W. R. 529, 14 Ch. D. 152, explains Browning v. Sabin. The Master of the Rolls seems to have meant by notice, notice in the ordinary way.]

Chitty, J.—Notice of motion for a writ of attachment is well served by service on the solicitor where there is a solicitor in the action upon the record, and it is established that it is not necessary to serve it personally upon the person to be attached. Ord. 44, r. 2, provides that a writ of attachment shall be applied for on notice to the party against whom the attachment is to be issued. In the present case the defendant has not appeared, so ord. 67, r. 4, applies, which says that where no appearance has been entered, all writs, notices, orders, and other documents in respect of which personal service is not necessary may be served by filing them with the proper officer. The notice of motion has been filed. I have caused a search to be made in the office, but no precedent to the contrary has been found, so I hold that is good service, and make the order, with costs.

Will—Construction—Gift to next of kin of person dead at date of will—Period for ascertaining class.

A testatrix bequeathed a sum of money "to such person or persons as would have become entitled to my said husband's personal estate under or by virtue of the Statute of Distributions had he died intestate and without leaving any widow him surviving."

At the date of her death some of the persons entitled to her husband's estate under the statute were different from those entitled to it at his own death.

Held, that the clause must be read as if the words "at my husband's death" were inserted, so that the clause would read "To such person or persons as would, at my late husband's death, have become entitled," &c., and that the persons to take under the gift were, therefore, to be ascertained at the death of the husband.

Held, also (following In re Ham's Trust, 2 Sim. N. S. 106), that there was a lapse as to the share of one of the husband's next of kin, who died in the lifetime of the testatrix.

Adjourned summons.

This was an originating summons by one of the residuary legatees under the will of the testatrix, Mary Rees, for the determination of a question arising out of a bequest contained in the will.

The testatrix, who died on the 18th of October, 1888, by her will, dated the 20th of December, 1881, recited that she was entitled under the will of her late husband, the Rev. Josiah Rees, to a life interest in her said husband's personal estate, and was also absolutely entitled, as his widow, under the Statute of Distributions to one-half of the corpus of his said residuary personal estate; that her said husband died on the 18th of July, 1881; that his personal estate at the time of his death, after payment of debts, amounted to £12,000; and that she was anxious that the property of her late husband should return to his own family. She then gave and bequeathed £4,800 (which she stated was equivalent to the moiety of her husband's estate to which she was absolutely entitled after deducting therefrom the amount of an advance which she had made to him in his lifetime) and certain plate "to such person or persons as would have become entitled to my said husband's personal estate under or by virtue of the Statute of Distributions had he died intestate and without leaving any widow him surviving." Then, after certain other dispositions, she gave her residuary real and personal estate unto and to the use of the plaintiff Elizabeth Williams and the defendant Thomas Rhys Saunders absolutely in equal shares, and she appointed the defendant H. Davies and another person who did not act, to be executors of her will.

By a codicil dated the 17th of September, 1885, the testatrix gave a pecuniary legacy, and in all other respects she ratified and confirmed her said will.

She afterwards made another codicil which is not material to be stated.

The statutory next of kin of the Rev. Josiah Rees at the time of his death were, exclusive of his widow, his sister, Mrs. Mary Saunders, and his niece, the defendant Rosannah Rees.

Mrs. Saunders died on the 16th of June, 1882, in the lifetime of the testatrix, though after the date of her will, a widow and intestate, leaving the defendants Thomas Rhys Saunders and Eliza Saunders, her only children, her surviving, and they, together with Rosannah Rees, were the sole statutory next of kin of him (Josiah Rees) at the time of the death of the testatrix.

The question was, whether the persons to take the legacy given by the testatrix's will, were the persons who were the next of kin of Josiah Rees at his death, or those who were his next of kin at the time of the death of the testatrix? The summons asked for a declaration that, upon the true construction of the will, and in the events which had happened (i.e., the death of Mrs. Saunders in the lifetime of the testatrix), there was a lapse as regards one equal moiety of the £4,800 and plate, and that by reason of such lapse such one equal moiety fell into and became disposable as part of the residuary estate of the testatrix.

entitled to the husband's estate under the Statute of Distributions were different from those entitled under the same statute at his own death, and the question is, whether the persons to take under the gift are to be ascertained at the death of the husband, or at the death of the widow? The rule applicable to this case is stated thus by Lord Hatherley, when V.C., in Wharton v. Barker: "According to Philps v. Evans, a bequest to the next of kin of a person who is dead at the date of the will must, under ordinary circumstances, receive an interpretation analogous to that adopted in the case of a bequest to the testator's own next of kin as regards the period of ascertaining who are the persons intended, and if there is nothing in the context to make the words applicable to a class to be ascertained at any other time than at the testator's death, those who, at the testator's death, are the next of kin of the deceased person named in the will would naturally be the persons to take." This view of the law appears to be in accordance with the decision of Sir William Grant in Vaux v. Henderson, and of Lord Romilly in In re Philps' Will.

I have, then, to consider whether there is anything in the present case to take it out of the general rule, and it appears to me that the words "without leaving any widow him surviving" are sufficient to do so. One test appears to me to be conclusive. If the testatrix really contemplated that the class should be ascertained at her own death, it ought to be possible to insert in the gift words expressly defining this period without making the language of the testatrix inaccurate as regards the grammar, or repugnant or inconsistent as regards the meaning, and I invited counsel to do so. The first suggestion was to insert the words "at my death," so that the clause would run "to such persons as would, at my death, have become entitled to my said husband's personal estate under, or by virtue of, the Statute of Distributions, had he died intestate and without leaving any widow. Now this is not grammatically accurate; strictly it ought to run, "to such persons as would, at my death, become entitled," &c. A more serious objection, however, is this, that the words "without leaving any widow him surviving" become unmeaning; the testatrix was her husband's widow, and at her death there would be no widow entitled to share under the statute upon an intestacy. It was then suggested that the clause ought to be read thus: "to such persons as would have become entitled to my said husband's personal estate under, or by virtue of, the Statute of Distributions, had he died immediately before me, intestate, and without leaving any widow." This hardly mends the matter, for, in the first place, it appears to me to add something to the language of the testatrix, and, in the next place, to make it really inconsistent. The testatrix was her husband's wife at the time of his death, and what she is really thus made to say is, "had he died immediately before me, intestate, and without leaving me, his widow, him surviving." If the words "immediately after me" were inserted after "died," then, no doubt, the language would be consistent, but the words "without leaving any widow" would be superfluous, for it can hardly be supposed that the testatrix contemplated the possibility of her husband marrying in the brief interval between her own death and his.

On the other hand, if the words "at my husband's death" are inserted (so that the clause is read, "to such person or persons as would, at my late husband's death, have become entitled to my said husband's personal estate under or by virtue of the Statute of Distributions had he died intestate and without having any widow"), the language of the will becomes both grammatical and self-consistent, and every word has its natural force and meaning.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the persons to take are to be ascertained at the husband's death.

Now it is laid down in Bullock v. Downes that where there is a gift to persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions the statute regulates the interest taken as well as the parties to take, and, further, that that rule applies even where the persons to take are not all the next of kin according to the statute, but all entitled as being members of that class and entitled to property which the next of kin would have taken under the statute.

That case related to a gift to persons entitled under the Statute of Distributions to the personal estate of the testator, and no case has been cited in which it has been applied to a gift to the statutory next of kin of a person dead at the date of the will, but I can see no valid ground for drawing any distinction. In my opinion, therefore, the gift must be read, "to such persons as would at my husband's death have been entitled to his personal estate under the Statute of Distributions had he died intestate and without leaving any widow him surviving, in the shares and proportions in which they would have taken under that statute." I think, therefore, that (as was held in In re Ham's Trusts, and for the like reasons) there is an intestacy as regards the share of that one of the husband's next of kin who died in the lifetime of the testatrix.

It was, indeed, suggested that the first codicil revived the will or operated as a fresh gift in favour of the next of kin then living. Even if the language of the will admitted of such a construction (which I do not think it does), there is no evidence that the testatrix knew who her husband's next of kin were, or that any of them had died.

I make a declaration as asked by the summons. The costs of all parties to come out of the residuary estate, and, if the residuary legatees consent, as between solicitor and client.

In re Thompson and Holt's Contract. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Mortgage to building society—Power of sale—"Due"—Three months' notice—Waiver—Title contracted for—Specific performance—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 19, sub-section 1; s. 20, sub-sections 1, 2—Costs of parties concurring.

By a building society's mortgage it was provided that, if default should be made in the performance of any of the covenants, then the total sum for which the mortgage should then be redeemable should be considered as actually due and payable, and the power of sale given to mortgagees by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, should apply and be exercisable by the trustees of the society. The mortgagor neglected to pay one of the instalments, and the trustees contracted to sell the property.

Held, that the statutory power of sale, whether applicable to a building society mortgage or not, was incorporated in the mortgage by the act of the parties; that the money had become due; and that the power was exercisable.

The contract for sale was dated within less than three months of default, and no notice of the proposed sale had been given to the mortgagor nor to a second mortgagee under section 20, sub-section 1. The purchaser ascertained the want of notice, and required the concurrence of the mortgagor, which was agreed to, and the second mortgagee was ready to do the same. The conditions of sale stated that the property was being sold by mortgagees under a power of sale, and that the assignment was to be taken without the concurrence of other parties.

Held, that, if the mortgagor and second mortgagee had not waived the notice, they had waived the right to object to the want of it; that want of notice did not prevent the vendors from exercising their power of sale; that the purchaser would get the title he had contracted to take; and that the vendors must bear the costs occasioned by the concurrence of the mortgagor and second mortgagee.

Motion.

This was a motion by a purchaser to discharge an order made by the chief clerk on a vendor and purchaser summons, and to have it declared that a good title had not been shown, on the ground that the vendors had no power of sale, inasmuch as the power given by the Conveyancing Act could not apply to a building society's mortgage, and that, if it could, they had not given the statutory notice to the mortgagor; that the mortgagor had not waived the notice, that his concurrence would alter the title, and that the purchaser could not be compelled to take a title other than that which he had contracted for.

By a mortgage dated the 29th of March, 1889, and made between J. H. Brown, of the one part, and the trustees of the Second Equitable Permanent Benefit Building Society, of the other part, Brown, in consideration of £5,000 advanced to him as the ultimate value of his 100 shares therein, covenanted to pay all subscriptions, fines, &c., payable by him under the rules of the society in respect of his shares, and, as beneficial owner, conveyed to the trustees certain leasehold property, subject to a proviso for redemption on performance of the covenants. The mortgage contained a declaration that, if default should be made in the performance of any of the covenants, then the total sum for which the mortgage should then be redeemable, according to the rules, should be considered as actually due and payable, and the power of sale and other powers, rights, and remedies given to or conferred upon mortgagees by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, or any other statute should apply to the mortgage and vest in and be exercisable by the trustees accordingly.

By a deed-poll of the same date the mortgagor gave to other persons a charge on the mortgaged premises for moneys therein mentioned.

Rule 41 of the society's rules provided that every member of the society should pay a subscription of 12s. 6d. per share per quarter, and so in proportion for any fractional part of a share, until he should require an advance; and that, upon requiring an advance, he should pay an additional subscription of 12s. 6d. per share per quarter, and a further sum of 5d. per quarter on each 12s. 6d. to meet expenses of management. The shares were of the value of £50 each.

The first instalment was due in April, and this was paid by being deducted from the amount of the advance. On the 14th of June Brown was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the instalment due by him on the 4th of July was not paid.

The trustees of the society, on the 18th of July, with the consent of Brown's trustee and the second mortgagees, put up the mortgaged property for sale by auction, subject to conditions of sale. The property was not sold, and the trustees entered, without informing the mortgagor or the second mortgagees, into a contract, dated the 25th of September, to sell it to J. Holt for £4,250, subject to such of the conditions as were applicable, including the following:—"The vendors being mortgagees selling under a power of sale, the assignments shall be accepted from them under such power, without the concurrence of any other person or persons, and no covenants for title shall be required except the statutory covenant implied by expressing in the conveyance of the property to the purchaser that the vendors convey as mortgagees."

By his requisitions the purchaser, on learning that no notice had been given, required the concurrence of Brown's trustee in the conveyance, and this was agreed to, and a draft assignment was prepared and approved. The purchaser was subsequently taken ill, and endeavoured to avoid completion.

He took out a summons to have it declared that the vendors had not made a good title.

The vendors offered to procure the concurrence of the second mortgagees at the purchaser's expense, but this was declined, and the chief clerk decided in favour of the vendors, without costs.

H. Terrell, for the purchaser.—The mortgagees had no power of sale under section 19 of the Conveyancing Act. That power exists when "the mortgage money has become due," and the mortgage money never becomes due in a building society's mortgage, or, at all events, not till all the instalments are in arrear. The Act does not say "the money or any part of it." If it does apply, they ought to have given notice to the mortgagor under section 20, sub-section 1, of their intention to sell, and three months after service of that notice the power would have become operative. But three months had not elapsed between default and the contract for sale, and it is admitted that no notice was given. So there was no power in existence under the Conveyancing Act which they could exercise. We are affected by the want of notice, as we were informed of it by the answers to requisitions. There was no interest due so as to bring the case within section 20, sub-section 2. In a building society's mortgage the mortgagor does not pay interest, but he pays compensation for the advantage he obtains over the other members by the advance. We contracted for a title through the mortgagees only, and they cannot force us to take a different title: In re Bryant and Barningham's Contract, ante, p. 469; Buckle v. Lordonney, 35 W. R. 360.

Bowden, for the vendors.—Part of the instalment represented interest, so the power of sale became exercisable in two months. The power existed because money was due. The whole became due on default. We are making a title under the power of sale. It is not a new title. The want of notice is of no consequence, as the other parties will waive it and concur in the conveyance, and we agree that that should be done at our expense: Selwyn v. Garfit, 36 W. R. 513, 38 Ch. D. 273.

Terrell, in reply.—That is not waiver, but confirmation, and makes it a different title. The waiver ought to have been before the sale, otherwise the power was not exercisable. The change in the title will cause delay and expense, and it cannot be forced on us: In re Bannister, Broad v. Munton, 27 W. R. 826, 12 Ch. D. 131.

Kekewich, J.—Several points have been made on this motion, and one of them seems to be of some little importance. The purchaser insists that the power of sale in the Conveyancing Act does not apply to a building society's mortgage in the ordinary form, and that where the mortgage is in that form and there is no express power of sale, there is no power of sale by the mortgagee. That is a point I need not deal with, as there is an express proviso in this mortgage that the power of sale given by the statute shall arise in certain cases, one of which has happened; therefore, it is incorporated by the act of the parties, whether it was applicable by force of the statute or not; and it became exercisable in July on default being made in payment of the instalment. But it is said that, admitting that the power of sale is applicable, it is not properly exercisable until after three months from the date when the July instalment became due, and that as that period did not expire until after the date of the contract, the power of sale could not be exercised at all. The primâ facie answer to that is that the restriction on the use of the power of sale is for the benefit of the mortgagor as between him and the mortgagee, and is not intended to prejudice the purchaser if a good title is made independently of the contract between the parties, whether by statute or by private arrangement.

But the purchaser had notice in this case that no notice had been given, so that answer is not very material.

Then arises the point to which I have referred as being of some importance. The mortgagor has become bankrupt and his trustee in bankruptcy has already agreed to be a party to the conveyance. In addition to the trustee, another party was required—second mortgagees—and they have also agreed to concur and confirm the sale. But Mr. Terrell says if he gets the concurrence of these two parties he will, it is true, get a good title, but not the title for which he contracted, and that he is entitled to that and no other. What he has contracted for is a title under the mortgage, and a conveyance from the mortgagees only, without any other parties. So far as that is concerned the difficulty may be got over by the second mortgagees and the trustee confirming the sale by an independent deed. But a more important matter is whether he will really get something different from what he has contracted to take. He says he will really get a conveyance by the mortgagees and the owners of the equity of redemption, and that that is not a conveyance by mortgagees with those covenants which mortgagees usually give. That proceeds on an incorrect notion of the function of a power of sale in a mortgage deed. These mortgagees will exercise the power of sale and convey as mortgagees and enter into the covenants usual for mortgagees. It will not make any substantial difference to that conveyance that other persons are also made parties in order to confirm the conveyance. If they convey their conveyance will pass what interest they have. If they confirm by an independent document they will confirm what the others have done. Anyhow, the conveyance will be by the mortgagees under their power of sale. Therefore it is the same title, and the objection falls to the ground.

Then it is said that there was no waiver of the notice. That is not a very accurate, though it is a convenient form of expression. In other words, the owners of the equity of redemption did not waive the right to receive the notice which the Conveyancing Act, s. 20, subsection 1, says shall be given to them. I am not sure that they did, in the sense in which the word "waiver" has been used. They were consulted as to the sale of the property by auction, but not as to the sale by private contract. However, I need not go into that. In Selwyn v. Garfit Bowen, L.J., says that waiver is consent to dispense with the notice; but what is waiver or equivalent to waiver may exist in other circumstances. I think in that sense there was a waiver. It is quite competent for the mortgagor to say after the sale, "True I did not get a notice, but I do not object to that; I accept the sale, and I shall not interfere to prevent the title being accepted." It is not strictly waiver of notice, but it is waiver of the right to object on the ground that notice was not given. The difference is only a difference of words. Here he comes afterwards and says, "I confirm this title." I think there is nothing in the point raised by the purchaser. He will get a good title with a confirmation by the mortgagor, and he will get it under the power of sale. If I had drawn up the order I should have inserted before the declaration of good title some words to show under what circumstances the case came before the court, but I have heard an affidavit read which states the facts, and is entered in the order, and the order proceeded on that affidavit. I have asked Mr. Rowden whether he is willing to procure the concurrence of the parties at his own cost, and he has admitted that he is bound to do so. If that concurrence is necessary to supply a defect in his title the defect must be remedied at his cost. If the purchaser requires to be convinced that the second mortgagees are second mortgagees, or any expense is incurred in tracing the devolution of the title, the vendors must pay the costs; but that must not be an excuse for throwing on the vendors costs which, fairly, they ought not to bear. I propose to refuse the motion, but to preface the order with the words, "It appearing that the second mortgagees and the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor are willing to concur in the conveyance to the purchaser or otherwise to confirm the same, and that the vendors are ready to procure such concurrence and confirmation at their own costs."

Motion refused, with costs.

MURTAGH v. BARRY. (a.)

County court—New trial—Power of judge to grant—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 93.

A judge of a county court can only grant a new trial upon the grounds on which a new trial can be granted in the High Court, and he is bound by the principles laid down by the High Court as applicable to the granting of new trials, notwithstanding the terms of section 93 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Stonor sitting at the Brompton County Court.

Upon an action brought in the county court for an alleged misrepresentation as to the value, on the sale of a medical practice, the jury found a verdict for the defendant, for whom judgment was entered. In an application for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, the judge granted the application for the reasons as stated—viz.: "I granted the application on the ground mentioned in the application, and also under the absolute power to grant a new trial given to judges of county courts by section 93 of the County Courts Act, 1888."

The defendant now appealed against this order.

J. E. Fox, for the defendant.—The judge had no jurisdiction to make this order on such grounds as he has stated. The county court judges are bound by the same limitations as to granting new trials as the judges of the High Court.

A. W. Donald, for the plaintiff.—Section 93 of the Act of 1888 gives an absolute power to the judges of the county courts to grant a new trial upon any grounds which they may think fit. Section 93 of the County Courts Act, 1888, runs as follows: "The judge shall also in every case whatever, have the power, if he shall think fit, to order a new trial to be had upon such terms as he shall think reasonable, and in the meantime to stay proceedings."

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This appeal must be allowed. A high duty is laid upon judges of the county court in granting new trials, and it is important, if there is any doubt as to their discharge of this duty, that that doubt should be set at rest. It seems to have been supposed by the learned judge in this case, that he had an absolutely unfettered discretion in the grant or refusal of a new trial. That is not the law. He, as all judges of the inferior courts, must be found to follow the law as laid down in the superior courts and the House of Lords. It has been decided for forty years by overwhelming authority that a judge cannot grant a new trial merely on the ground that he is dissatisfied with the verdict of the jury. There is nothing in this section of the last County Courts Act to override the established authority of the courts on this matter, nor is it likely that the Legislature could have contemplated endowing the county courts with such unlimited freedom. The grounds on which new trials can alone be granted are well established, and the inferior courts, so long as they are subject to our control, must be bound as we are, by the principles laid down in the highest courts of the realm, limiting the granting of new trials to certain specific grounds.

MATHEW, J.—The judges of the county courts, like other people, must submit to the principles and rules of the common law, as long laid down by the High Court, and I see nothing in the recent Act which tends to elevate them to this supposed pinnacle of independence.

Appeal allowed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THEOBALD. (a.)

Inland revenue — Account stamp duty — Voluntary settlement — Retrospective operation of statute — Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), s. 38—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), s. 11.

Section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889, is retrospective in its operation, and the words of sub-section 2 of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, are now to be construed as if the words of section 11 of the Act of 1889 were therein incorporated; and this construction is to be applied even though an information to recover an account stamp duty under the sub-section has been filed, and all the pleadings closed before the date of the passing of the Act of 1889.

Information presented by the Attorney-General, praying for a declaration that certain trust funds and property included in a marriage settlement became chargeable with stamp duty under sub-section 2 (c) of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12).

Under a marriage settlement made in 1873 the property of the intended wife, being personalty, was settled upon trust to pay the income to the wife for her life, and after her death upon trust for such of her children as she should by deed or will appoint, and in default of such appointment for all her children in equal shares, and if there should be no children, then upon trust, if the wife should survive her husband, for her executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely, but if the husband should survive the wife, then upon trust for such person or persons as the wife should by will appoint, and in default of such appointment upon trust for the next of kin of the wife under the Statutes of Distribution.

In the events which happened the persons entitled under the Statutes of Distribution as the next of kin of the wife became, in 1885, entitled in possession to the trust funds comprised in the settlement, which were valued at upwards of £7,000.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that these trust funds became liable to be included in an account chargeable with stamp duty under sub-section 2 (c) of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and that the funds also became liable to succession duty.

The defendants, who were the trustees of the settlement, refused to pay the stamp duty or to deliver an account pursuant to section 38 of the Act of 1881, but they were ready and willing to pay, and did pay, the succession duty upon the trust property under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and no question now arises as to the succession duty.

The demurrer and answer of the defendants in the case was filed on the 1st of May, 1889, and therefore the whole pleadings in the case were completed before the passing of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, which was passed and came into operation on the 31st of May, 1889.

Section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, provides:

(1) Stamp duties . . . shall be charged and paid on accounts delivered of the personal or movable property to be included therein according to the value thereof.

(2) The personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions:

(c) Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement . . . whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death, is reserved either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power, to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property.

Section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, provides:

"Sub-section 2 of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, is hereby amended as follows:—

"The description of property marked (c) shall be construed as if the expression 'voluntary settlement' included any trust . . . in favour of a volunteer, and if contained in a deed or other instrument effecting the settlement, whether such deed or other instrument was made for valuable consideration or not as between the settlor and any other person."

Henn Collins, Q.C. (Levett with him), for the defendants.—The next of kin take the property, and the Crown say that this is an event on which their right to this duty attaches, on the ground that the next of kin, who take under settlement, take as volunteers and may be described as volunteers. I submit that the settlement points wholly to a voluntary settlement in the ordinary sense of the word, where there has been no consideration, and where the husband has reserved to himself a life interest. A marriage settlement is a settlement for consideration, marriage being a valuable consideration, and those who take under such a settlement do not take as volunteers: Crossman v. The Queen, 35 W. R. 303, 18 Q. B. D. 256. The Act of 1889 does not affect the present case, as the pleadings were all completed before that Act came into force on the 31st of May, 1889.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Dicey, for the Crown.—Section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, is not an amendment of the provisions of the section in the Act of 1881; it is only a rule laid down with regard to construction, which is a declaratory rule throwing light upon the meaning of the Act of 1881, so that, in construing the Act of 1881, we are to do so as if the provisions in the 11th section of the Act of 1889 were incorporated in the Act of 1881.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

That is the construction which the court is now bound to put upon the section. The words in the section "shall be construed" mean shall be construed by any tribunal which has to construe it: The Attorney-General v. The Marquis of Hertford, 3 Ex. 670.

Levett, in reply.—The Act of 1889 is an amending Act and not a declaring Act. If it were a declaring Act I could not dispute the contention put forward by the Crown. When the Act was passed the Crown had not the right claimed. The section is not retrospective. Actions must be determined by the law at the time the cause of action accrued: Hough v. Windus, 32 W. R. 452, 12 Q. B. D. 224.

POLLOCK, B.—This is a matter of considerable importance, and the court should carefully consider the case, so as not in any way to infringe upon the rules laid down in Hough v. Windus. Each case must depend on the language used by the Legislature in the particular statute which is being construed, and that is a reason why I think that Hough v. Windus does not govern the present case. There is a strong authority in the Court of Exchequer, in the case of The Attorney-General v. The Marquis of Hertford, to show that if an Act is in its nature a declaratory Act, then the objection that it is taking away or giving a right which did not exist before, is not properly applicable, and I think that the present case is a stronger case in favour of the Crown than The Attorney-General v. The Marquis of Hertford, and for these reasons: that the Act of 1881, which provides what documents are to be stamped, describes the property to be included therein as "any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement." The words "voluntary settlement" gave rise to some doubt, and the Legislature in 1889, although they commenced by saying that the earlier Act "shall be amended as follows," use the words set out in section 11 of the Act of 1889. The material part, however, of that section is that a voluntary settlement is to mean what it is stated to mean by that section, and therefore in reading sub-section 2 (b) of section 38 of the earlier Act we ought now to read it in this way, "any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement, including therein any trust whether expressed in writing or otherwise, in favour of a volunteer, and if contained in a deed or other instrument effecting the settlement, whether such deed or other instrument was made for valuable consideration or not between the settlor and any other person." That is the way in which the Act of 1881 is to be read. If that were all, the matter would be absolutely clear. A distinction has been pointed out which we ought to consider; we must see whether these words in sub-section 2 of section 11 do affect the question: "A return of stamp duty shall not be made under sub-section 3 of the said section 38 by reason of, or in relation to, any account delivered on or after the 1st day of June, 1889." Now that refers to the provisions made in the Act of 1881 for a return of stamp duty paid on an account delivered, comprising property passing under a voluntary settlement, upon which, however, at the time of the settlement, ad valorem duty had already been paid, and therefore where such stamp duty ought not to have been received. In the present case quoad the settlor and the parties to the marriage, the settlement is not voluntary, and therefore there could be no ground whatever for returning any stamp duty that might have been paid. If it is paid it is paid in respect of the whole deed, and therefore it seems to me upon the whole of this case, that there must be judgment for the Crown.

There is one other question. It certainly has been considered in many cases that where a person had commenced an action he had a vested right, and that any subsequent Act of Parliament ought not to be construed as retrospective so as to take away that right. That is not the view taken in all cases, but that was the view taken by Parke, B., for many years to my knowledge; however, the other view has been taken now in a good many modern cases, especially those affecting the question of costs, such as the cases of Freeman v. Moyes, 1 A. & E. 338; Wright v. Hale, 9 W. R. 157; Kimbray v. Draper, 16 W. R. 539, L. R. 3 Q. B. 160.

Probate—Two wills—Property in England and South Africa—Separate executors—Incorporation—English will allowed—Form of grant.

A domiciled Englishman made and duly executed in England two wills on the same day, one disposing of his African, the other of his English property, and named separate executors in each. Each will was distinct, and excluded the property dealt with in the other.

On the application of the executors of the English will, and with the consent of the persons entitled in the case of intestacy, the court granted probate of the English will alone, with a note that an authenticated copy of the African will had been deposited in the registry.

Application by the executors of the English will of the deceased for grant of probate of such will alone.

The Rt. Rev. Henry Callaway, late Bishop of St. John's, Caffraria, died at Woodcote, Ottery St. Mary, on March 26, 1890. On the 17th day of January, 1888, being then domiciled in England and having resigned his bishopric, he made two wills. By the first he disposed of all his property in South Africa and elsewhere, except property in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and appointed two persons resident in South Africa executors of that will. By the second will he disposed of all his real and personal property in the United Kingdom, and appointed executors of that will. Each will contained a clause in almost identical terms referring to the other. By the clause in the second will the testator stated "this to be my last will and testament so far only as respects my real and leasehold estate (if any) situate and being in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and my personal estate constituting bona notabilia within the said United Kingdom, and not intended in any way to operate as a disposition of my real and personal estate in South Africa or elsewhere than in the said United Kingdom, as to which I have made a separate and independent will dated the day of the date hereof and hereinafter called my African will," and the testator appointed Cornelius Hanbury and C. C. Moreland trustees and executors of this will. The African will was sent out to South Africa for probate immediately after the death of the testator. The executors of the English will applied in the registry for probate of the English will alone, but the registrar refused to grant probate unless the second will was brought in.

Deane, in support of the motion, stated that he appeared for all parties interested in obtaining probate of the English will, and that all parties interested in an intestacy had consented. [He referred to In the Goods of Coode, L. R. 1 P. & D. 449, 16 W. R. Prob. Dig. 11, which he distinguished; In the Goods of Smart, 32 W. R. 724, 9 P. D. 64; and In the Goods of Astor, 24 W. R. 539, 1 P. D. 150.] His clients did not wish the African will incorporated in the English.

BUTT, J.—The only question in my mind is whether I should take the same course as in In the Goods of Astor. It is unnecessary to incorporate the African will, but an authenticated copy of it should be filed in the registry, verified by affidavit, and on that being done probate of the English will may go, the probate to contain a statement that the copy of the African will has been so filed, but the African will not to be incorporated in the probate.

The purchase-moneys of lands belonging to a lunatic and taken by a railway company had been paid into court and invested in Three per Cent. Consols. Held, also, that the railway company should pay the costs, as the re-investment was rendered reasonably necessary by the Act of the Legislature, and was not occasioned by the mere caprice of the holder.

Lunacy petition.

This was a petition presented by the committee of a lunatic, asking that a sum of cash standing in court to the account of the lunatic and ex parte the Midland Railway Co. might be invested in preference stock of the Great Northern Railway Co.

Part of the sum in question represented the purchase-money of land belonging to the lunatic compulsorily taken in 1884 by the Midland Railway Co., and which originally had been paid into court under section 69 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and had been invested in Three per Cent. Consols. The committee had not assented to the conversion of the stock into the New Two and Three-quarter per Cent. Consols, and accordingly, on the passing of the National Debt Redemption Act, 1889, the stock then invested in the Three per Cent. Consols was redeemed by the Government, and the cash now in court to the above account represented the redemption-money.

The petition first came on for hearing before Lindley and Bowen, L.JJ., on April 23, when an order was made for an investment of the sum in court as asked for by the petition, the Midland Railway Co. to pay the costs of the application and of the investment, except so far as the costs of investment might be increased by the redemption-money being in excess of the amount of the purchase-money originally paid by the company; the latter part of this order as to costs, following the form laid down in the case of Attorney-General v. Rochester (Mayor of), 15 W. R. 765, and Seton, 4th ed., vol. 2, part 2, p. 1441.

Before the order was drawn up the petition was, by the direction of the court, restored to the paper for re-argument on the questions as to whether there was any power in the court to sanction the investment sought to be made, and also as to the liability of the railway company for costs. The petition was accordingly again set down, and came on for hearing on May 7.

Section 80 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, so far as material, provides: "In all cases of moneys deposited in the bank under the provisions of this or the special Act . . . it shall be lawful for the court . . . to order the costs of the following matters, including therein all reasonable charges and expenses incident thereto, to be paid by the promoters of the undertaking—that is to say, the costs of the purchase of the lands . . . the costs of the investment of such moneys in Government or real securities, of the reinvestment thereof in the purchase of other lands, and also the costs of obtaining the proper orders for any of the purposes aforesaid . . . and for the payment out of court of the principal of such moneys . . . and of all proceedings relating thereto . . ."

D. Sturges, for the petitioner.—The redemption-moneys represent moneys originally paid into court under section 69 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845; and money paid into court under the Lands Clauses Act is "cash under the control of the court" within the meaning of section 10 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38 (Lord St. Leonards' Act), and as such may be invested in any of the securities which have been sanctioned for investments by the Rules of Court: Ex parte St. John Baptist College, Oxford, 31 W. R. 55, 22 Ch. D. 93. R. S. C., 1883, ord. 22, r. 17, authorizes the investment of "cash under the control of the court" in preference stocks of railways in Great Britain or Ireland having for ten years next before the date of investment paid a dividend on ordinary stock or shares. The name of the Midland Co. is still on the account to which the redemption-money is standing, and under section 80 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, they are liable to pay the costs of this investment in accordance with the form given in Attorney-General v. Rochester (Mayor of). [COTTON, L.J.—The court has jurisdiction to order the company to pay the costs, but ought it to exercise its power to do so, under circumstances like the present, where, if you had not dissented from the conversion, these moneys would have been reinvested in New Consols?] The committee only acted for the benefit of the lunatic in refusing to accept the conversion.

C. H. Sargant, for the Midland Railway Co.—Ex parte St. John Baptist College, Oxford, was the case of an original investment, but this is not the case of an original investment, but it is a case of reinvestment. Section 80 does not say that the company are liable for the costs of every reinvestment; on the contrary, it says that it is only when the money is reinvested in the purchase of other lands that the company is liable, and the reason for allowing that, is that the name of the company is then taken off the account: In re Bristol Free Grammar School, 47 L. J. Ch. 317. [The Lord CHANCELLOR.—But this is cash under the control of the court; how, therefore, does the question of reinvestment arise?] It is the proceeds of an original investment.

Sturges, in reply.—Ever since the passing of the Lands Clauses Act, railway companies have always been made to pay the costs. As to In re Bristol Free Grammar School, there the fund was in the hands of the Official Trustee of Charitable Funds, who was treated as the absolute owner.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I think the order made on the former occasion was a right order. The case is covered by authority. Ex parte St. John Baptist College, Oxford, is an express actual ruling of the Court of Appeal that money paid into court under the Lands Clauses Act is "cash under the control of the court," and capable of being invested as such.

On the point as to costs, if it were a case of capricious change of investment the question might arise as to whether we ought then to require the railway company to pay the costs; but that is not the case here, and, in my opinion, the railway company ought properly be required to pay the costs of this investment.

COTTON, L.J., concurred.

LINDLEY, L.J.—As I had some misgiving as to whether there might not have been some oversight in making the order made on the previous occasion, I will add a few words, though it is not usual to do so in these cases.

The case of Ex parte St. John Baptist College, Oxford, which has been cited to-day, satisfies me that there is power to make the investment sought.

Then as to the costs. The question in the present case is a small one, but it is likely to be very important as a precedent, on account of the number of persons who may be affected by the scheme for conversion of the Three per Cent. Consols. I now think that the view taken by Bowen, L.J., and myself on the previous occasion was right. Where the change of investment has been rendered reasonably necessary by the Act of the Government, and not by any caprice of the holder, I think it is right that the company should bear the costs. The order will bear date as of this day.

SMART v. TRANTER. (a.)

Married woman—Choses in action of wife—Title of husband—Probate of will of married woman—Effect of grant in general form to executor of married woman—Probate Rules, 1887, r. 15.

A married woman—married before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—possessing no separate estate, and no testamentary capacity by assent of her husband or otherwise, made a will, by which she appointed an executor and bequeathed all her property to persons other than her husband. She died in July, 1887, and probate of the will was granted to the executor in the ordinary general form, in pursuance of rule 15 of the Probate Rules of March, 1887.

The husband brought an action in the Chancery Division against the executor to recover certain choses in action to which the wife was entitled at the time of her death.

Held, that the effect of the grant of probate in general form to the executor was to entitle the executor to get in all assets of the wife, including the choses in action which the wife had no power to dispose of by will, but that the husband was beneficially entitled to these choses in action, and was therefore entitled to have them transferred to him by the executors, subject to the same deductions as they would have been subjected to if the husband had taken out administration under the old practice.

Decision of Kay, J., 37 W. R. 213, 40 Ch. D. 165, reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Kay, J. (reported 37 W. R. 213, 40 Ch. D. 165).

The plaintiff in this action was married to his late wife in April, 1882, before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, came into operation. His wife was entitled to a legacy of £50, payable on the death of her mother, who was still living, and also to a sum of £100 due to her from her brother, but which had not been reduced into possession by the plaintiff. No marriage settlement had been made.

The plaintiff's wife died in July, 1887, leaving a will, whereby she appointed executors, and gave all her property upon trust for her mother for life, with remainder to her brothers and sisters. The wife had no testamentary power of appointment and no separate estate, and her husband, the plaintiff, had not assented to her will.

The plaintiff entered a caveat against the proof of this will, but afterwards withdrew it, and on the 14th of November, 1887, administration of the personal estate of the deceased wife was granted in the Probate Division to the defendant Tranter, one of the executors named in the will, he "having been first sworn well and faithfully to administer the same."

By the present action, instituted in the Chancery Division, the husband claimed that the defendant, the executor, should assign and pay to the plaintiff the £100 and interest, and should transfer to the plaintiff the £50 legacy, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from otherwise dealing with those sums.

Kay, J., dismissed the action, on the ground that the husband, by suing the executor in the Chancery Division, had treated the will as valid, and had, therefore, mistaken his remedy, and that the proper course for him to have taken was to apply to the Probate Division to recall the probate and to grant him administration.

The plaintiff appealed.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., and Barnard, for the appellant.—By rule 15 of the Probate Rules of March, 1887,* probate of the will of a married woman is now granted to the executor thereof in the ordinary form, without being limited to such property as the married woman had a right to dispose of: In the Goods of Amelia Price, 35 W. R. 596, 12 P. D. 137. The legal right, therefore, to these choses in action is vested in the defendant, but the defendant is in equity a trustee for the husband, who has the beneficial interest in the choses in action of his deceased wife.

They cited Humphrey v. Bullen, 1 Atk. 458; Elliott v. Collier, 3 Atk. 526; Squib v. Wyn, 1 P. Wms. 378; In re Lambert's Estate, 39 Ch. D. 626, 37 W. R. Dig. 88.

Whitehorne, Q.C., and Eustace Smith, for the respondent.—The will of this married woman either vested these choses in action in her executor, or it did not. If it did not, the action must fail, because there is then no legal personal representative in respect of those choses in action: Betts v. Kimpton, 2 B. & Ad. 273; if it did, then the will vested in the executor property which the married woman had no power to dispose of by will. The executor, if he takes the property, is bound to distribute it in due course of administration—i.e., to pay in the first place the testamentary expenses, and any debts for which the married woman's estate is liable (such as debts contracted before her marriage). The new Probate Rule is only a rule of procedure, and it does not vest the right to these choses in action in the executor at all. The plaintiff must obtain a grant of administration to himself in order to have a right to claim these choses in action. In re Lambert was a case of a disposition by will of separate property.

* The rule is set out in 31 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, at p. 409.

They also referred to In the Goods of Tharp, 26 W. R. 770, 3 P. D. 76.

Napier-Higgins, Q.C., in reply.—I admit that these choses in action are liable for testamentary expenses, but that is all.

COTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Kay, J., who decided that the plaintiff, the executors of whose deceased wife are defendants, was not entitled to any judgment or decree in his favour in this action, but that he must go to the Probate Court and get the general probate which has been granted to the defendants revoked, and get for himself a grant of administration in respect of any property which his wife could not dispose of by will. There has been a very learned and ingenious argument in the case, though the subject-matter is very small, the husband's claim being only to two choses in action of £100 and £50 which formed part of the wife's estate at the time of her death. She made a will naming two gentlemen her executors. The present practice of the Probate Court is not to grant probate of the will of a married woman to the executors in respect of such personal estate as she had power to dispose of by will, and to grant letters of administration cæterorum to the husband, which was the old practice, but to grant to the executors probate in general terms, and not to grant any administration to the husband. The Probate Court has in effect said: "The married woman had power to make a will which would pass separate estate and any estate that came to her after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, so, without entering into the question whether there was property which she could not dispose of, and which would go to the husband, we grant general probate, giving the administration of all her personal estate to her executors." The husband claimed from the executors the personal estate which the wife had no power to dispose of. Kay, J., says to him: "You cannot claim anything from the executors; they assert their title to the whole personal estate, and if you are desirous of asserting your claim to these choses in action you must go to the Probate Court and get that court to revoke the general probate and grant limited probate to the executors, and administration cæterorum to yourself." That was on the ground that the husband, after the death of his wife, could only claim her choses in action, not reduced into possession, on taking out administration to her, which he had not done, and that by bringing an action against the executors he admitted the title of the executors to all the estate of the wife which the probate purported to grant them. I think there is a fallacy in that. How was it that the husband could not get the choses in action of his deceased wife except by taking out administration? Because the choses in action not reduced into possession were assets of the wife to which a legal title could only be acquired by a grant of administration to her estate by a proper court, and the husband, until he had obtained such grant, had no power to give a legal discharge for them. But, as the wife had no power to dispose of them, the husband was beneficially entitled, there being a clause in the Statute of Frauds which prevented the Statute of Distributions giving any right to the next of kin as against the right of the husband, which existed previously to the Statute of Distributions.

Then how is the husband deprived of his wife's estate as against the executors? This is part of the wife's estate which (subject to the question I shall have to consider hereafter as to the right of the executors to get it in) was not disposed of by her will. It was undisposed of personal estate of the wife. If there had not been a husband surviving, the next of kin would have taken it under the Statute of Distributions, but, there being a surviving husband, he is beneficially entitled to it. Under the old practice, if the husband died without having taken out administration to his wife, administration was granted to the next of kin, but the beneficial interest of the husband remained undivested, and devolved on his personal representatives. So here the husband, not having taken out administration, cannot sue the debtors for these choses in action, but he is beneficially entitled to them, and if the executors under the grant of probate are entitled to sue for them, he can sue the executors in respect of them as being their cestui que trust.

It was argued most ingeniously by Mr. Whitehorne that the plaintiff has no right here, but must go to the Probate Court, and Kay, J., has determined that he must, on the ground that the appointment of executors is a disposition, to some extent, of the property of the person who makes a will appointing executors; that here a married woman makes a will and appoints executors, and that the grant of general probate of that will has in effect given to her by the action of the Probate Court power to dispose by will of this property; that the executors taking the property must dispose of it according to their oath—that is to say, in paying the debts and performing the other duties imposed on them by the will—that is, payment of the legacies and handing over the residue to the residuary legatees. This is a fallacy. The granting of probate to the executors does not recognize the right of the testatrix to dispose by will of the beneficial interest in all the property which the executors got in by virtue of the probate; it enabled them to get in all the assets of the deceased, whether beneficially disposed of by the will or not, but does not alter the beneficial title to the property. The husband could not himself get in these choses in action without taking out administration, but if the right to get them in is granted by the Probate Court to another person, that person, when they are got in, holds them as trustee for the husband.

In my opinion the grant of probate in the general form did not recognize the right of the testatrix to dispose beneficially of these choses in action, nor the right of the executors to dispose of them according to the directions of the will, but only recognized the executors as the persons who would represent the deceased and get in all her assets. In my opinion that ingenious argument, by which Kay, J., seems to have been persuaded, fails.

I am of opinion, then, that the plaintiff is entitled to say, "I am beneficially entitled to these choses in action when got in by the executors," but he must take them subject to the same liabilities as if he had taken out administration. If he had taken out administration he would have had to pay the costs of administration, and any debts there might be of his deceased wife. There might be debts existing which were contracted by her before the marriage, and those would be payable out of this property. It is said here that there were debts, but are they debts payable out of her assets? I am not dealing with liabilities contracted by her with reference to separate estate. Such liabilities are not her debts in the proper sense of the word — that is to say, they are not debts which must be paid by her administrator or executor out of her assets, but merely debts according to the peculiar doctrine of the courts of equity which enables a married woman (though not capable by law of contracting) to contract with reference to her separate estate so as to create liabilities payable out of it. Putting such liabilities aside, are there any debts of this married woman which are payable by her personal representative out of her assets? As far as the evidence goes, I think we ought to find that there are none. It is true that the husband, if he had taken out administration, might have had to pay something for his wife, for he is bound to pay for anything supplied to her in the way of proper provision for her, such as a nurse and medicine during her illness, and there are claims for matters of that kind, but those would have been his debts, not the debts of the wife, and he would not have paid them as her administrator.

Then there is a question as to the funeral expenses. Of course, the husband would be bound to bury his wife, but here, on the evidence, a portion of the funeral expenses has been paid by the husband, other portions, it is said, have been paid by the executors under the following circumstances:—A husband is not bound to pay unreasonable expenses in burying his wife, and there was an arrangement made between her mother and the husband that he should pay a certain portion of the expenses, and that the increase of expense occasioned by her being buried in some particular place in the country should be borne by the mother. If this extra expense is what the executors paid, and I understand such to be the case, they must look to the mother to repay them. Therefore, I think we ought to declare that the plaintiff is entitled to the disputed assets, subject to payment of probate and testamentary expenses properly incurred. We must, therefore, discharge the order of Kay, J., and we must order repayment to the plaintiff of those costs which, under that order, have been paid by him to the executors. Then we think that, as the defendants, no doubt by the ingenuity of the arguments put by them before Kay, J., persuaded him to make an order which we think erroneous, we cannot but give the plaintiff the costs of the appeal for setting that right.

[The Lord Justice then said that previously to the order of Kay, J., both parties were to blame in the course of conduct they pursued, and, consequently, that each party should bear his own costs below.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case unfortunately relates only to a small sum of money, but it has raised a discussion of considerable importance.

The action is brought by a husband against persons who have obtained probate in general form of the will of his wife. Part of the assets of the wife consists of choses in action which have never been reduced into possession. The husband says, in substance by his claim, hand those over to me. The defendants, the executors, oppose that, and they have contended very ingeniously as to the various aspects of their rights, but the last thing they thought of doing was to comply with the request of the husband. Kay, J., has taken the view that the husband has no locus standi at all in the Chancery Division, and that he cannot claim from the defendants these assets of his wife unless he can get the probate to them revoked, and get letters of administration granted to him of such parts of his wife's assets as she could not dispose of by will. It logically follows from that that the husband's action was dismissed, with costs. The plaintiff appeals from that decision, and, having considered the case and heard the argument, it appears to me that Kay, J., has taken an erroneous view of the husband's position.

The rights of the husband require for their elucidation some inquiry into old law. The position of the husband will be found explained accurately, I believe, and clearly by Williams, J., on Executors, 7th ed., vol. 2, p. 1,488. He says:—"It has been shown in a former part of this treatise that the husband is entitled to the grant of administration of his wife's effects, and, consequently, before the Statute of Distributions he was entitled, as all administrators were, to the exclusive enjoyment of the residue." As the law stood before that statute, the administrator took the residue for his own benefit. The Statute of Distributions was passed, altering that law as regards administrators generally, and there were some expressions in it which raised a doubt whether it had not altered the law as regards the husband. That doubt was set at rest by a clause introduced into the Statute of Frauds, which enacted that neither the Statute of Distributions nor anything therein contained "shall be construed to extend to the estates of feme coverts that shall die intestate, but that their husbands may demand and have administration of their rights, credits, and other personal estates, and recover and enjoy the same as they might have done before the making of this Act." That left the husband where he was before. But that gave rise to another doubt, and that doubt was this. It is clear that since the Statute of Frauds, if the husband takes out administration, he can get the reversionary choses in action of the wife, but if he does not, the Statute of Frauds does not in terms apply. That doubt was raised and solved very early in the case of Cart v. Rees, which is stated in the following terms by Cowper, L.C., when giving judgment in Squib v. Wyn, 1 P. Wms. 378, 381:—"A wife died possessed of choses in action, and the husband survived and died without taking out letters of administration to his wife, after which the next of kin of the wife administered to her, and Lord Parker held that the administrator to the wife was but a trustee for the executor of the husband, the right to the wife's choses in action being, by the Statute of Distributions, vested in the husband as next of kin to the wife; and whereas there is a proviso in 29 Charles II., saying that the Statute of Distributions shall not extend to the estates of feme coverts that die intestate, but that their husbands may have administration of their personal estate as before the making of the Act, his lordship said, this clause was made in favour of the husband, and not to his prejudice; so that it was intended by the Parliament that the husband should be within the Statute of Distributions so as to take the wife's choses in action as to his benefit, but should not be within the same as to his prejudice; and that this was a new point but had been settled, and upon very good reason, for, were the construction to be otherwise, the husband of the wife intestate would be in a worse case than the next of kin, though ever so remote, which was not the intent of the statute."

There are other cases which will be found in Williams, J.'s book at p. 1489 which are to the same effect, and there is now no doubt, as regards the choses in action of the wife not reduced into possession during the coverture, that if the husband survives he is beneficially entitled to them. If he takes out letters of administration he is entitled to them at law and in equity, but if he does not take out letters of administration the legal personal representative of the wife is the person to get them in, but, having got them in, holds them in trust for the husband. That appears to me to be the law as settled ever since the case in Pere Williams.

Now, pausing there for a moment, let us see how that affects the rights of the husband in this case. Until lately the practice in the Probate Court was to grant administration of the estates of married women in what may be called in a popular sense a double form. If a married woman left a will the executors would take out probate as to some assets and the husband would take out administration as to the rest. After the passing of the Married Women's Property Act that was found to be extremely embarrassing in practice, which is obvious enough if we consider the effect on people who have to pay money to the wife's representatives. Supposing there were two legal personal representatives of the wife and I owe money to the wife, to whom am I to pay? In order to get rid of that difficulty, and perhaps also for other reasons, the practice of the Probate Court was altered in 1887, and that rule which has been read, and which I will not read again, was made, and in conformity with that rule when a woman dies leaving a will, the Probate Court grants probate of that will to the executors named in it, and it does not and will not, as I understand, grant partial probate to one person and letters of administration as to the rest of her property to another. But it is manifest that this alteration in the practice of the Probate Court cannot affect the rights of parties to property. It is mere matter of machinery. The defendants have obtained general probate of the wife's will. What is the consequence of that? The consequence is that they are the persons, and the only persons, entitled in this country to get in the personal assets of the wife. It does not matter whether she can dispose of them by will or not. They are the only persons entitled in this country to get them in.

The next point is, what are the executors to do with these choses in action when they have got them in? If we bear in mind that this marriage took place before the Married Women's Property Act of 1882, the mode of dealing with these particular assets of the wife, I apprehend, is clear enough. They are assets of the wife, they belong to her husband; she cannot give them away without his consent. They belong to him on the authority of the cases to which I have already alluded. It is, however, conceivable that at common law, without reference to separate estate, there might be debts of the wife properly payable out of these assets. That would be the case if she had contracted a debt before marriage which was unsatisfied. Such a debt would be payable out of her assets in the event of her dying before the husband. That is one instance, and there might be others. She might, for instance, be a sole trader. Now, if any debts contracted by her and payable at law out of her assets exist, they would come out of her assets in priority to anything else. But it is clear that there were no such debts here, and that there is no use in having an inquiry on the subject. The existence of such debts is a mere theoretical possibility, with which we need not concern ourselves. The result, therefore, is this, that, subject to the payment of the testamentary and probate expenses, these assets belong to the husband. I think, therefore, that his action should not have been dismissed, but that he is entitled to a declaration that, subject as I have said, these assets belong to him. [His lordship then said that he agreed with Cotton, L.J., as to the costs.]

LOPES, L.J.—The form in which probate is granted does not in any way alter the rights of beneficiaries. When that is borne in mind I do not think that this case is so difficult to deal with as it at first appears. I propose to say only very little with regard to it, and only very shortly to state what to my mind the result in the circumstances of this case is. It appears to me that the executors are the proper persons to get in these outstanding choses in action of the wife, and that the husband subsequently gets payment from the executor, subject to the same deductions as those choses in action would have been subjected to if the husband had taken out administration under the old practice. I agree with what has been said by the rest of the court in all respects, and also I agree with what has been said with regard to the proper mode of dealing with the costs in this case.

MINUTES OF ORDER.—Reverse the order. The court, being satisfied that there are no debts of the plaintiff's wife payable out of her assets claimed by the plaintiff, declare that, subject to the payment of the probate and testamentary expenses properly incurred by the defendant, other than the costs of this action, the plaintiff is entitled to those assets. Liberty to apply with respect to the probate and testamentary expenses and generally. The defendant to repay the costs paid by the plaintiff, and pay the costs of the appeal; each party to pay their own costs of the action.

An application under section 13 of the Solicitors Act, 1888, to strike the name of a solicitor off the rolls may be made by a person who has not employed the solicitor in a professional capacity.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 507) affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mathew, J.), reported ante, p. 507, where the facts are fully stated.

A solicitor, having become bankrupt, was examined before the official receiver, and in the course of his examination he made certain statements which the official receiver laid before the Incorporated Law Society and on which the official receiver applied to strike the name of the solicitor off the rolls. Objection was taken that the official receiver had no locus standi to make the application, and a case was stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division.

The Divisional Court held that the application might be made by the official receiver, and directed the case to proceed.

The solicitor appealed.

Winch, Q.C., and Stock, for the appellant.—The application to strike a solicitor off the rolls can only be made by a person who has been or is a client of the solicitor. This is shown by the form of affidavit given in the schedule to the rules of the 31st of January, 1889, made under the Solicitors Act, 1888: "I, A. B., of ———, make oath and say as follows:—(1) C. D., of ———, solicitor of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England, has been employed by me in a professional capacity for the last ten years (or as the case may be)."

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver, and Hollams, for the Incorporated Law Society, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The Act of Parliament under which the rules were made is perfectly clear. An application under it may be made by anyone to strike a solicitor off the rolls, and is not confined to clients of the solicitor. The rules are to the same effect. The appellant's counsel do not dispute this, but they say that both Act and rules are restricted by the form of affidavit given in the schedule. That form, no doubt, gives, as an instance, the case of an application by a client, but the words "or as the case may be" show that this is not the only instance. I do not think that the form in any way restricts the Act and rules, and if it does derogate from them, it is altogether void and ultrà vires, because the judges by whom it was made had no power to derogate from an Act of Parliament. Therefore, in my opinion, the judgment of the Divisional Court was perfectly right, and must be affirmed.

FRY and LOPES, L.JJ., concurred.

COOK v. WHELLOCK. (a.)

Practice—Security for costs—Action against tenant for rent—Bankrupt plaintiff—Security for costs of action—Application to make trustee plaintiff.

The plaintiff having brought an action to recover rent of certain premises demised by him to the defendant, the defendant discovered that, at the time of the lease, the plaintiff was a bankrupt, and that his discharge had been made conditional upon his paying his creditors 5s. in the pound. This sum had not been paid. The defendant thereupon applied that the trustee in bankruptcy should be made plaintiff, or that the defendant should be ordered to give security for the costs of the action.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the defendant was estopped from denying the plaintiff's title and setting up the title of the trustee; that the mere fact of bankruptcy was not of itself sufficient ground for ordering security for costs; and that the plaintiff was not a mere nominal plaintiff suing on behalf of his trustee in bankruptcy, as he would gain a benefit if he succeeded in the action, and that he could not be required upon that ground to give security for costs.

Rhodes v. Dawson, 34 W. R. 240, 16 Q. B. D. 548, followed.

Appeal from chambers.

In 1887 the defendant became tenant to the plaintiff of certain premises, and entered into possession. In 1889 the plaintiff brought an action to recover rent in arrear, and the defendant discovered that the plaintiff had been adjudicated bankrupt in 1885, and that his discharge had been made conditional upon his paying his creditors 5s. in the pound, which sum had not been paid. The defendant thereupon applied for security for the costs of the action, and the master made an order that the plaintiff should give security for the defendant's costs in the action in the sum of £60, and that in the meantime all further proceedings be stayed, unless within seven days the official receiver be made plaintiff in the action. The judge in chambers referred the matter to the court.

S. Lynch, for the plaintiff.

Yelverton, for the defendant.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The order of the master cannot be supported. Where a plaintiff is an undischarged bankrupt suing in respect of a cause of action arising subsequent to the bankruptcy, the plaintiff cannot be called upon to give security for costs, or to make the trustee plaintiff. Section 142 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, only applied to a cause of action which had accrued before bankruptcy: Stanton v. Collier, 2 W. R. 197, 3 E. & B. 274. The plaintiff is not a nominal plaintiff if he sues in respect of a cause of action accrued pending the bankruptcy. Herbert v. Sayer, 5 Q. B. 965, decides that to plead the bankruptcy alone is not a good plea; and that, unless the trustee interferes, the bankrupt has a good cause of action, and is entitled to sue. In Buchan v. Hill, W. N., 1888, p. 233, 33 S. J. 92, North, J., held that an undischarged bankrupt could sue without his trustee, and that, unless there was some suggestion that the action was brought on behalf of the trustee, the undischarged bankrupt need not give security for costs. If the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in Rhodes v. Dawson, 34 W. R. 240, 16 Q. B. D. 548, is looked at, it is clear that the rule as to security for costs only applies where the plaintiff is a mere nominal plaintiff. In a case like this, the bankrupt's position is much like that of an agent who has made himself liable for an undisclosed principal. He has a right to sue, subject to the right of the principal to intervene. The order made by the master must, therefore, be discharged.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred.

The defendant appealed.

Yelverton, for the defendant:

S. Lynch, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Sections 20 and 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; Cowell v. Taylor, 34 W. R. 24, 31 Ch. D. 34, 886; Rhodes v. Dawson, 34 W. R. 240, 16 Q. B. D. 548, were cited.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the judgment of Vaughan Williams, J., accurately states the law. The plaintiff granted a lease of certain premises to the defendant, and the defendant entered into possession. The plaintiff now sues for rent in arrear. The first point taken is that the plaintiff is not the right plaintiff, as he is an undischarged bankrupt, and that the trustee in bankruptcy ought to sue. The answer to that is that the plaintiff was a bankrupt when he granted the lease, and the defendant is therefore estopped from denying the plaintiff's title and setting up the title of the trustee in bankruptcy. It was next said that, the plaintiff being bankrupt, the defendant is entitled to security for the costs of the action. In my opinion the defendant at the trial would not be allowed to give evidence of the plaintiff's bankruptcy, as that fact would, under the circumstances, be wholly immaterial. Can he, then, be allowed upon a preliminary summons to show that the plaintiff is a bankrupt, so as to get an order for security for the costs of the action? If that were allowed it would be very strange, but it is not necessary to decide the point, because not only is mere poverty not sufficient ground for ordering security, but in Rhodes v. Dawson this court laid it down that bankruptcy of itself was not sufficient reason for such an order. It was then said that the plaintiff was a mere nominal plaintiff, not indeed in the usual sense as being put forward by some person behind him, but upon
